The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Before the House proceeds to business, Sir, I hope you will allow me, with the permission of the House, to express on behalf of the House—as I am sure I may do—our deep sympathy with the Honourable the President in his illness and to express also the hope of the House that he may speedily return to those labours in the performance of which he has earned, if I may say so, with all respect, both the admiration and the affection of this House.

Mr. Deputy President: Honourable Members of the Assembly, in the regrettable absence of the Honourable the President, through ill-health, it has fallen to me to preside over the Assembly and to welcome the Honourable Members of this House. The Honourable Sir Frederick Whyte, you will be glad to learn, is making steady progress towards recovery, and I am sure every one of us will wish him completely to recover before long and to be able to take the Chair in the course of the next few days. I trust I am voicing the feelings of this House in welcoming amongst us the Honourable Sir Basil Blackett as our colleague. He comes to us as Finance Member of the Government of India, the portfolio of which high office was until quite recently in the capable hands of the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey, whose indefatigable energy and high talents are now transferred to the Home Department. Sir Basil comes to us with a great reputation in finance, both on its theoretical and on its practical side. I am confident that this House will extend to him the assistance and co-operation which his wide experience and knowledge entitle him to claim for himself in the discharge of his new duties.

In conclusion I may be permitted to refer to a personal matter. Honourable Members are well aware that we have long and arduous work before us in this Session. I feel assured, however, that, in view of the traditions which the Assembly has to its credit established in the past two years, we shall be able to go through it in a spirit of harmony and useful good-will. I am certain that I can with confidence rely on Honourable Members for help and support in the discharge of the duties of the Chair in the same measure in which they have vouchsafed them to me ungrudgingly and unstintedly in the past.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: On behalf of my friends I desire to associate myself, and I am sure every non-official Member of the Assembly does so, with the expression of regret which has fallen from the Leader of the House and you (Mr. Deputy President) in connection with the illness of the President. His has been very strenuous work, not confined to Delhi and Simla by any means, but all over the country, and I am afraid he is paying the penalty. We all hope that he may soon recover and come back to us. In welcoming you to the Chair in the President's absence, we promise you all the support and assistance that you require in the difficult work before you. And, Sir, I desire to convey to you the congratulations of my friends and I am sure of the whole House, on the high honour that was conferred upon you while you were away from us. You have been away for some time and I am sure you have brought back knowledge and traditions that will be helpful in carrying on the work of this House. There has been a re-arrangement in the Front Bench and we hope it will be all for the good and for advancement of work. In Sir Malcolm Hailey we have a leader, not new by any means. He led the House when it was first started and has come back to the leadership. Sir Muhammad Shafi is now Vice-President of the Executive Council and has taken over the Law portfolio. I am sure that from Sir Malcolm Hailey and from Sir Muhammad Shafi we shall have all the consideration we had before and a little more.

Sir Basil Blackett we all welcome. I hope he will put our names right and that there will be no reason for us to quarrel with him in the same way as we have sometimes quarrelled with his predecessors.

I am sure, Sir, that the House would like also to express its appreciation of the honour which has been conferred upon its Secretary, upon Sir D. Waghorn, Sir Campbell Rhodes and others. They have all well earned them, and not the least by their work in this Assembly.

Mr. Deputy President: I thank the Honourable Member—Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary especially—for his kind reference to me.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

ALLEGED ABUSE OF LALLA GULZARI LALL BY COLONEL CROFTON, NEEMUCH.

1. Mr. Pyari Lal: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article published in the Cantonment Advocate of 30th June, 1922, under the heading "Alleged abusing of a member of Cantonment Committee at Neemuch"?

(b) Is it a fact that Lieut.-Colonel Crofton, the President, Neemuch Cantonment Committee, insulted and abused Lalla Gulzari Lal, a member of the Cantonment Committee, Neemuch, in a meeting of that Committee for his having signed a public Memorial for the postponement of the transfer of a local Doctor?

(c) Is the Government aware that as a protest against his "abusing" Lalla Gulzari Lal tendered his resignation of the membership of the Cantonment Committee and this resignation was accepted by the Secretary, Cantonment Committee?

(d) If the reply to the above be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to quote the "law" under which a Secretary of the Cantonment Committee is authorised to accept the resignation of a member?

(e) Is the Government aware that the Central Provinces District Headquarters, Mhow, in their letter No. 978-B-Q-3, dated 3rd May, 1922, wrote to Lalla Gulzari Lal that Colonel Crofton will see him and come to an understanding?

(f) Will the Government be pleased to state if Colonel Crofton has since come to an understanding with Mr. Gulzari Lal?

(g) If not, will the Government state what action it has taken or it proposes to take in the matter?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) Yes.

(b) The Government of India have received conflicting versions of the affair, but it is clear that on a certain occasion Lieutenant-Colonel Crofton made use of forcible language to Lala Gulzari Lal, and that the latter resented it.

(c) Yes.

(d) The action of the Cantonment Committee in accepting the resignation tendered by Lala Gulzari Lal was ultra vires, and orders have been issued directing that the acceptance of the resignation should be regularised.

(e) Yes.

(f) and (g). While not admitting that he insulted Lala Gulzari Lal, Lieutenant-Colonel Crofton has expressed his willingness to apologise, and he has been directed by Government to do so.

SALE OF LAND IN AMBALA TO PANDIT S. RAMLALL.

2. Mr. Pyari Lal: (a) Is the Government aware that a large open piece of land used by the milk-sellers (Ghosis) of Ambala, ever since the establishment of the Cantonment, was recently given to one Bipat Ramlal on lease, for construction of quarters for the cantonment syees?

(b) Is it a fact that on the day the lease was registered, the transfer of this land, for a consideration of Rs. 7,000 was effected under a separate Deed, registered by the then Cantonment Magistrate, to one Pandit Sompatt Ramlall, a relative of the Head Clerk of the Cantonment?

(c) Is the Government aware that Mr. Ramlall Somdatt has made a formal agreement with Bipat Ram in case of Government making any claim for recovery of Rs. 7,000?

(d) Is it a fact that on the land thus secured by Ram Lall, a large number of residential houses are being constructed and that the land and buildings really represent the interests of the Head Clerk of the Cantonment Committee, Ambala?

(e) Is the Government aware that by leasing this plot of land the Cantonment fund has lost a substantial amount in rent?

(f) Is the Government aware that there is considerable discontent among the milk-sellers on account of their being deprived of this piece of land? If so, how does the Government propose to satisfy the grievance of the milk-sellers?

(g) Is the Government aware that Mr. Bipat Ram in his written statement, a copy of which has been sent to the Cantonment Magistrate, denies having received the sum of Rs. 7,000?

(h) Will the Government enquire into the truth or otherwise of this statement?

(i) Will the Government be pleased to state if the quarters now built are used as a syce line?

Mr. E. Burdon: The Government have ascertained that a piece of land in the Ambala Cantonment was recently granted on lease to Mr. Bipat Ram. The land in question had been used for many years by the milk-sellers of the place. Mr. Bipat Ram is said to have intended to use the site for the construction of houses for syces but this was not actually stated in his application for the lease.

(a) The answer is in the affirmative except that Government do not know whether Pandit Somdatt Ram Lall is related or not to the Head Clerk of the Cantonment Office.

(b) Government have received a document which purports to be a copy of the agreement mentioned. They cannot say whether such an agreement was actually made or not.

(c) It is reported that houses are being constructed on the site in question. The allegation that the land and buildings represent the interest of the Head Clerk has been made but so far as Government are aware has not been substantiated.

(d) The loss in rent is said to be Rs. 30 per annum.

(e) The milk-sellers have submitted petitions on the subject to the local authorities and they have been offered an adjoining piece of land for their use. Government do not propose to take any further action in the matter. The terms on which the milk-sellers previously occupied the site transferred to Mr. Bipat Ram required them to vacate it immediately on receipt of notice.

(f) Government have been informed that Mr. Bipat Ram has made such a statement.

(g) Enquiries have already been made by the Cantonment Magistrate who reports that the money was paid to Mr. Bipat Ram in the presence of the Sub-Registrar.

(i) No.

STANDING ARMY IN INDIA—AUTHORITY FOR.

3. Mr. P. P. Ginwala: Will the Government be pleased to state under what statutory or other authority the Governor General in Council maintains a Standing Army in India, especially in peace times?

Mr. E. Burdon: The right of the East India Company to maintain permanent forces was recognised in the Charter of 1698 and again in the East India Mutiny Act, 1754, and the Government of India Act, 1833. By section 56 of the Government of India Act, 1858, the forces of the Company and the right to maintain them were transferred to the Crown.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Are the Government of India aware that His Highness the Agha Khan said the other day, before he had started from England to India and landed at Bombay, that the major portions of the revenue of India are spent for the upkeep of the Army in India, and for the utilization of the Army outside India, just as it was a few years ago in France and other places, and also in South Africa some time ago, and its object is to keep India under the control of Britain rightly or wrongly?

Mr. E. Burdon: I should like notice of that question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is not that a matter in issue, to elicit further facts?

Mr. Deputy President: The Member in charge wants notice from the Honourable Member.

Mr. K. Ahmed: According to the rules, is that not a matter in issue to elicit further facts on the subject?

Mr. Deputy President: No.

STANDING ARMY IN INDIA—PURPOSE OF.

4. Mr. P. P. Ginwala: (i) Will the Government be pleased to state whether the Standing Army in India is maintained (a) for the purpose of preserving internal peace and order, (b) for the defence of India against external aggression?

(ii) If the answer to part (i) is in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state the strength, and cost of the field and covering troops, maintained under heads (a) and (b)?

Mr. E. Burdon: (i) The Standing Army in India is maintained both for the purpose of preserving internal peace and order and also for the defence of India against external aggression.

(ii) The proportion of the army detailed as field and covering troops and for the maintenance of internal peace and security is constantly changing. Any part of the Standing Army in India may be employed either for one purpose or the other.

As regards the cost of the Army in India, I would refer the Honourable Member to the Budget estimates for 1922-23.

Mr. K. Ahmed: 60 per cent. of the revenue is spent on the upkeep of the Army and you neglect sanitation, health and education?

EAST INDIAN RAILWAY—APPOINTMENT OF ANGLO-INDIANS AND DOMICILED EUROPEANS TO.

5. Sir D. P. Sarvadhikary: (a) Would the Government please state whether its attention has been called to statements in the correspondence column of some of the newspapers to the effect that the authorities of the East Indian Railway have received instructions that the Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans who came to the rescue during the strike on the East Indian Railway while His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was in India, but who were sent adrift as soon as the strike was over, are to have special consideration as vacancies occur and that a list of them is in the office of the Headquarters of the East Indian Railway?

(b) Would the Government please state whether there is any and, if so, what truth in the above statements?

(c) Would the Government please state whether the Government has sanctioned or countenanced such instructions?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The reply is in the affirmative.

(b) The facts of the case are that the Agent, East Indian Railway, has decided that, other considerations being equal, when vacancies occur in posts occupied by Europeans, Anglo-Indians or Indians preference should be given to those who worked during the strike whatever their nationality.

(c) The matter is not one with which Government has any concern. The employes are the Company's servants.

REDUCTIONS IN GARRISON IN INDIA AND HEADQUARTERS COMMAND.

6. Sir D. P. Sarvadhikary: (a) Would the Government please state whether its attention has been called to statements appearing in a London telegram published in some of the newspapers to the effect that the Sub-Committee of the Imperial Defence Committee does not favour substantial reduction of the garrison in India beyond those now being carried out, while the Military Requirements Committee recommends the elimination of certain British units, and that the Whitehall Committee points out methods of reducing expenditure by substantial reductions in the Headquarters Command and staffs which are now reducible to the normal level?

(b) Would the Government please state whether it has received any information to the above effect?

(c) Would the Government please state the amount of the total expenditure of the staffs mentioned in the above statement and what the total expenditure would be when reduced to the normal level?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) Yes.

(b) The Government are at present unable to make any announcement as regards the findings of the Military Requirements Committee or the decisions to be taken thereon.

(c) The cost of the staff employed at Army Headquarters, as fixed for the current financial year, will be found in the Budget estimates under head IV— "Army Headquarters staff of Commands, etc." The strength of the Headquarters staff, as so provided for, is that which was originally accepted as necessary in the scheme for the post-war reorganization of the army in India. Recently, however, owing to the need for retrenchment, the possibility of reducing the Headquarters establishments has been carefully investigated by a Committee presided over by the Honourable Commerce Member, and the same subject has engaged the attention of the Retrenchment Committee. In the result, certain curtailments have already been decided upon and others are contemplated. The amount of savings to be affected by reductions cannot yet be exactly stated.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Is it a fact that the reduction of British units, stated to have been already carried out, has been made up by a recent accession of strength of troops from England and Ireland?

Mr. E. Burdon: I am afraid I do not understand the Honourable Member's question. What reduction of British units is referred to?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: The Honourable Member will see that it is stated in this question that the Defence Committee did not favour a substantial reduction of the garrison in India beyond that which was then being carried out. My question relates to this portion of the question, and it is this. Has the portion of the British garrison, stated to have been reduced while the Committee was considering the matter, been made up by a recent accession of strength from England and Ireland?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member will see that he is first of all asking us to disclose the recommendations of the Military Requirements Committee. He is then asking us to state how far those recommendations have been carried out or other measures taken in place of them. My Honourable friend behind me informed him that he was not prepared at present to state what were the recommendations of the Military Requirements Committee nor the attitude of the Home Government in respect of them and we must maintain that reply. But I can inform my Honourable friend, in regard to the suggestion in the latter part of his question, that such replacements as have taken place have been purely in the ordinary course of sending out drafts to fill shortage in existing units.

PURCHASE OF SLEEPERS BY NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

7. Dr. Nand Lal: Is Government aware:

- (a) that the North Western Railway has advertised, inviting tenders for the supply of a large number of sleepers, to be supplied in five years, and purporting to say that the tender should be for the whole supply;
- (b) that there are many Indian timber and sleeper contractors, who individually cannot afford to undertake to make the entire supply;
- (c) that this advertisement and the conditions laid down therein have given rise to feelings of a great grievance amongst the Indian timber merchants against the character and terms of the advertisement and the contract;
- (d) is Government prepared to see that the terms and condition in regard to the character of tenders and contract be altered?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) In their original call, the North Western Railway invited tenders for 10 lakhs of sleepers in whole and not in part, but subsequently modified this so as to permit of the submission of part tenders.

- (b) The answer is in the affirmative.
- (c) The modification in the call for tenders was made to meet the circumstances of the smaller timber merchants.
- (d) Under the circumstances, Government have no grounds for taking the action suggested.

STAFF SELECTION BOARD CANDIDATES—APPOINTMENT TO VACANCIES.

8. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the passed candidates of the Staff Selection Board are appointed in various departments of the Government of India in leave and other vacancies for long or short periods and are spared on the expiry of their term, if there is no other vacancy available in that department?

(b) Is it also a fact that even when they get a vacancy in some other department of the Government of India without any break of service, their previous service is not taken into account in determining their position among similar temporary men already working in that department?

(c) Is it also a fact that temporary men have got no service book of any kind in which to keep a record of their services as long as they are temporary?

(d) Do the Government propose to prescribe a brief service book or open sheet which should remain in the possession of every passed candidate of the Staff Selection Board, moving as a temporary hand from one department to another?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The answer is in the affirmative.

(b) This is the ordinary practice but there is no actual bar to the placing of a particular person above the temporary hands already working in a department if such person has superior qualifications.

(c) The answer is in the affirmative.

(d) The Government of India will adopt the suggestion made by the Honourable Member.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Having regard to the large retrenchments that are going on and must go on, is it advisable to make these temporary appointments now; and if they have to be made, should they not be made from amongst those whose services are being dispensed with?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are endeavouring to make as few temporary appointments as possible, and I think that the consideration which has been put forward by the Honourable Member is the only means of effecting any temporary replacements of those hands.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Having regard to the answer of the Honourable the Leader of the House, is it necessary or desirable to keep up the Staff Selection Board and hold examinations which bring so much disappointment to those who sit for these examinations and do not have any chance of obtaining employment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We have under consideration the question of holding further examinations. I shall subsequently be able to make an explanation to the Honourable Member in that respect.

INDIAN SUPERVISORS OF MILITARY DAIRY FARMS.

9. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what is the total number of candidates approved by the Controller of Farms for probation as Indian Supervisors of Military Dairy Farms and how many of them have passed the Matriculation Examination?

(b) Will the Government also say how many of the Matriculation passed candidates have been tried and with what results?

(c) What is the pay and future prospects of the posts?

(d) What minimum educational qualification was fixed for selection of candidates for the posts?

(e) Do the Government propose to instruct the officer in charge of the Department that as far as possible only those should be appointed who have passed at least the Matriculation Examination?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) 310. Of these, 225 have passed the Matriculation examination.

(b) 53 of the candidates who had passed the Matriculation examination were tried, and out of this number 11 candidates either resigned, or did not join, or left the department without giving notice; 5 were considered unsuitable and were discharged. The remainder have only been employed for a few months and up to date their service has been satisfactory.

(c) A statement giving details of the scheme is laid on the table.

(d) and (e) The minimum standard of education generally insisted upon has been that the candidate should have passed the matriculation examination. For special reasons, exceptions have, in the public interest, been made. It has now been definitely laid down for the future that, so far as possible only those should be appointed who have passed at least the matriculation examination or its equivalent.

Details of Scheme.

(a) Candidates within the age limits prescribed in the Civil Service Regulations will be entertained as probationers on a salary of Rs. 60 a month and will be placed under instructions for a period not exceeding one year. They will then undergo a departmental examination, and those who pass it and are otherwise satisfactory will be appointed overseers on probation on a salary of Rs. 100 a month, rising by biennial increments of Rs. 10 to Rs. 160 a month, the first increment being given after 3 years' total service, inclusive of the period of training.

(b) After two years' service on the maximum pay of this grade, that is Rs. 160 a month, they will be granted a further increment of Rs. 15 a month, and this increment will be continued biennially until a maximum of Rs. 250 is reached. There will be an efficiency bar at Rs. 150 and another at Rs. 190. Men employed as stock-yard overseers will receive an allowance of Rs. 20 a month. These men will have the charge of extremely valuable cattle and will have to attend not only to the general work of the cattle-yard but also to the breeding management and rearing of stock. The duties of a stock-overseer require special aptitude, which only a small proportion of the men are likely to possess.

(c) On completion of four years' service from the date of their first engagement, men who have proved satisfactory will be confirmed in their appointments and those found not to be satisfactory will be discharged without delay.

(d) Men who after completing four years' service, have been confirmed in their appointment and, in addition, have been specially selected, will undergo a further course of higher training for one year, and at the close of that year will be examined to see whether they are fit for admission to the higher appointments of managers. Appointments to this grade will be made as vacancies occur.

(e) The pay of the managers will be fixed according to their length of service. They will start on Rs. 200 (not sooner than their 6th year of service) and will receive biennial increments of Rs. 30, rising to a maximum of Rs. 500. There will be efficiency bars at Rs. 290 and Rs. 410.

(f) For the purposes of pension, leave and allowances, the whole establishment will be subject to the Civil Service Regulations and will be allowed to subscribe to the General Provident Fund.

DOUBLE JOURNEYS BY REGISTRARS AND CASHIERS.

10. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the Registrars and Cashiers of the Secretariat accompanied by a clerk or menial go from Simla to Delhi or vice versa a few days before the move of their Department and come back after a couple of days' stay to go again with the Department?

(b) Are the Government aware that it costs a large amount twice every year on account of the travelling, daily and other allowances of these officers in addition to the loss suffered by the Departments owing to their absence from duty?

(c) Do the Government propose to consider this question with a view to economy and see whether only one junior man going in advance of the Department would be quite sufficient for the purpose?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The practice referred to by the Honourable Member is followed in only a few of the Departments of the Government of India.

(b) The cost in travelling and other allowances is not very appreciable.

(c) This is already the practice in most departments, and those Departments which follow the practice referred to in part (a) of the question will now consider whether it is possible to adopt this suggestion in lieu of their existing practice.

STAFF SELECTION BOARD—EXTENSION OF SCOPE.

11. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Do the Government propose to consider the advisability of extending the scope of the Staff Selection Board to the Accounts and other offices under the Government of India?

2. The total number of candidates who were allowed to appear for the examination was 883.

3. The number of candidates for the Upper Division of Attached Offices was 440.

A very large number of these candidates applied also to be registered for other posts, e.g., in the Lower Division of the Secretariat and as clerks in Attached offices, etc.

4. Of the 440 who applied for posts as Assistants in Attached offices 55 qualified at the written examination and were called up for interview in order to qualify in that capacity. Many others were called up for interview in connection with other appointments for which they had qualified at the written examination.

5. Of the 55 interviewed for Assistantships 48 were declared successful.

(b) The Army Headquarters are treated as a Secretariat office for this purpose.

(c) Yes.

STAFF SELECTION BOARD—METHOD OF MARKING.

13. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Will the Government please state how the marks were allotted under each head by the Staff Selection Board for each of the following at their last examination held in July, 1922, for outside candidates?

(1) Written examination, (2) War services, (3) Special qualifications and experience, (4) Interview.

(b) Will the Government please state if any limit has been fixed by the Board for the number to be passed? If so, is the examination intended to be more a competitive than a qualifying test?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) A maximum of 300 marks were allotted for the written examination and 50 marks at the interview. The marks allotted at the interview were divided under three heads, viz., up to 10 for "Appearance," up to 10 for "Service" and up to 30 for "Intelligence." For active war service the maximum number of marks under "Service" was granted, viz., 10 marks. For other classes of war service marks were granted according to the length of such service. No marks were allotted for special qualifications as such, since no special qualifications were called for, but those who had special qualifications or experience secured marks either under Intelligence or Service.

(b) The examination is a qualifying one, and no limit as to the number of candidates to be passed was fixed.

STAFF SELECTION BOARD—EMPLOYMENT OF PASSED AND UNPASSED MEN.

14. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Will the Government please refer to the reply given to unstarred question No. 350 on the 28th March, 1922, regarding the unpassed men in the Secretariat and attached offices being replaced by passed candidates of the Staff Selection Board and state how far the promise made therein has been carried out?

(b) Will the Government please lay on the table a statement showing the number of unpassed candidates (including those who have appeared at the recent examination) employed in the Upper and Lower divisions of all the Departments of the Secretariat and the attached offices?

(d) How many of the passed candidates were not in service on 1st September, 1922, and how many unpassed candidates were in service on the same date?

(e) What steps do the Government propose to take with a view to replace unpassed men by passed men?

(f) Will the Government please call for a list of all unpassed men in service in the various Departments of the Secretariat and the attached offices and state the definite dates by which they will be replaced by passed candidates?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information is being collected and will be laid on the table when ready.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The ordinary probationary period is one year.

16. Mr. P. L. Misra: Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the number of clerks and assistants—officiating and temporary—serving in the Government of India Secretariats together with their length of service?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: A statement giving the information required has been prepared and I will send it to the Honourable Member.

PROBATIONARY CLERKS IN SECRETARIAT.

17. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that some clerks have been serving for the last several years, but have only been drawing probationary pay?

(b) Why have the Government not given them annual increments?

(c) Do Government propose to confirm the clerks and assistants mentioned in (a) and give them annual increments according to time-scale?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The answer is in the affirmative.

18. *Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the Government had promised to compensate the villagers in the Bannu District, who were raided during the past 2 years, out of the allowances paid to the Wazirs?

(b) If so, have the villagers been paid?

(c) If not, why not?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) No.

(b) and (c) therefore do not arise.

RAIDS IN NORTH-WEST FRONTIER PROVINCE.

19. *Mr. P. L. Misra: Has the attention of Government been drawn to a letter dated 26th July, 1922, printed at page 8 of the Tribune news paper headed "Raids in the North-West Frontier Province"? If so, will Government be pleased to state:—

(a) The composition of the gang that committed the dacoity;

(b) The particular section it belonged to;

(c) If the Political Agent or the Resident took any active steps to obtain release of Mussamat Maksudi, wife of Baksha Koja, who has been kidnapped by the gang; or

(d) The restoration of about 80 cattle, including agricultural stock;

(e) If the redress or reparation has not been made, have any reprisals been resorted to, to punish the offenders;

(f) Does this gang also trade in British India;

(g) If so, why has a blockade not been enforced against it?

Mr. Denys Bray: Yes.

(a) and (b) The gang responsible for the Kot Walidad raid on the 30th June last was 24 strong and composed partly of outlaws from British territory under the leadership of Baksha of Kulachi, and partly of Abdur Rahman Khel Mahsuds under the leadership of Tarmacha, a Jalal Khel living with the Abdur Rahman Khels.

(c) The Political Agent and the Resident made all possible enquiries regarding the whereabouts of Mussamat Maksudi, and her relations effected her release by a payment of Rs. 100 to the outlaw Baksha.

(d) The cattle were not restored.

(e) Reprisals against the Abdur Rahman Khels were resorted to in the following August, and consisted of continuous and intensive bombing until that section came to terms and effected a settlement with Government.

(f) As the Abdur Rahman Khels were in open hostility at the time, they did not trade with British India.

(g) The Abdur Rahman Khels were under blockade from 1919 up to the date of their making a settlement with Government.

KOT-WALIDAD KHAN.

20. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the village Kot-Walidat Khan is an exposed one on the border?

(b) Is it also a fact that the villagers submitted petitions to the Deputy Commissioner for grant of Government rifles on their furnishing proper security for safe custody, and that these petitions were supported by Police and Constabulary officials?

(c) If so, will Government be pleased to state reasons for not granting their prayers?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) Yes.

(b) No such petitions were received till after the raid of the 30th June last, when the villagers were allotted fifteen Government rifles.

(c) Does not arise.

ARTICLE IN "TRIBUNE" ON N.-W. F. PROVINCE.

21. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a letter printed in the Tribune of the 28th July, 1922, headed "Raids in the North-West Frontier Province"?

(b) If so, what action have the Government taken to remove the grievances stated therein?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) Yes. The letter in question deals with four cases of kidnapping of Hindus and is inaccurate in many details. All kidnapped persons concerned, except one who was shot dead while attempting to escape, were returned by their captors to British territory without payment of ransom.

(b) It is for the protection of British subjects in the settled districts against such dastardly outrages that the Mahsud Operations were undertaken. The trans-frontier tribesmen responsible for these particular raids were Jalalkhel Mahsuds working in collusion with bad characters from within the Dera Ismail Khan border. This section have been under blockade since 1919. Owing to the inaccessibility of their country effective action against them is difficult but they have been severely punished from the air. In addition to operations within Waziristan the Police and Constabulary in the Dera Ismail Khan District were increased in last July by 410 rifles and 300 Government rifles have been issued for village defence. By these measures a series of successful encounters with trans-frontier raids has been brought off in which captives have been rescued, stolen property recovered, and several raiders killed and wounded.

RANSOMS PAID IN N.-W. F. PROVINCE.

22. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the following "Force Routine Order", dated Dera Ismail Khan, the 19th April, 1922, was issued by Major-General T. G. Matheson, C.B., C.M.G., Commanding Waziristan Force:

"The Field Cashier, Dera Ismail Khan, is authorised to pay to the Resident in Waziristan the sum of Rs. 10,000, being the amount of ransom paid to tribesmen for rescuing two aviators who had a forced landing at Wana on 7th April, 1922?"

(b) Will Government be pleased to state the names of the two aviators and the tribesmen who rescued them?

(c) Will Government be also pleased to state the total amount of ransom paid to tribesmen during the last 2 years, in case of Indians who were kidnapped during these 2 years?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) Yes.

(b) The names of the two aviators are:

Flying Officer Brown.

Flying Officer Jackson.

The names of the principal rescuers are:

Asmat

Sher Ghanni

Bat

Watakai

(c) Nothing has been paid by Government. Amounts paid by private persons are not known.

- (4) Captain G. L. Mallam,
- (5) Captain C. S. I. Berkeley,
- (6) Captain G. Kirkbride, and
- (7) Captain I. Brookman?

(b) If so, when and what examinations have they passed?

(c) Is it a fact that all these officers have been exercising first class and summary powers?

(d) If the answer to (b) be in the negative and to (c) in the affirmative will Government be pleased to state why these officers have been invested with such high powers?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) No.

(b) Does not arise.

(c) Two of the officers have exercised first class and summary powers. Three have exercised first class powers, but not summary powers. The other two have exercised neither.

(d) Owing to the shortage of officers due to the War, arrangements are now being made to withdraw junior officers for the usual training in a major province.

24. Mr. P. L. Misra: Will Government be pleased to give a statement showing:

- (a) The number of Saloon Carriages especially built during the last 3 years for the use of Railway Officials;
- (b) The total cost of Saloons so built;
- (c) The rank and position of Railway Officials who use these Saloons; and
- (d) To what head has this expenditure been charged?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The number of saloon carriages built during the last three years for the use, or part use, of railway officials is 40.

(b) The total cost of these saloons is Rs. 7,42,529.

(c) Six are for officers of the rank of Agent, Head of a department or Government Inspector, 21 are for the use of District officers or Assistant officers, 8 are for Inspecting subordinate officers and 5 are of the type used by District officers but are not exclusively reserved for railway officials.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Were there any special saloon carriages built during this period for officials other than railway officials?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I should like to have notice of that question.

- (d) How will the old buildings be utilised?
- (e) Are any new quarters under construction for the use of Indian officials? If so, will Government be pleased to state their cost and number?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government are not prepared to ask railway administrations for the information required for the statement as they consider that the labour involved in the preparation of the statement will be out of all proportion to its value.

SWIMMING BATH IN AJMER.

26. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the Loco Department at Ajmer has provided or is about to provide a swimming bath for the use of European employees?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to state the cost of the swimming bath?

(c) To what head has this expenditure been charged?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: (a) The reply is in the negative.

(b) and (c) Do not arise.

B. N. RAILWAY—CONSTRUCTION OF TALCHER RAILWAY.

27. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the telegram in the Pioneer, dated 15th September, 1922, from its Calcutta Correspondent, stating that the Bengal Nagpur Railway Company have already commenced the construction of the Talcher Railway?

(b) If so, what sum is the Bengal Nagpur Railway Company going to devote to the work during the current year, and from what source is it to be derived?

(c) Was the Central Advisory Council invited to express their opinion on the construction of the Talcher Railway by the Bengal Nagpur Railway? If so, when and what opinion did they express?

(d) Have the Central Railway Advisory Council approved of any proposal to devote any portion of the Thirty Crore Railway allotment of the present year, to purposes other than rehabilitation and betterment of the existing railways? If so, in what cases and for what reasons?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: (a) Yes.

(b) Rs. 6 lakhs from Railway Programme funds.

(c) and (d) The reply is in the negative, but the Honourable Member's attention is invited to paragraph 13 of the report of the Railway Finance Committee.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: May I ask a Supplementary question, Sir? When an allocation has been made to a particular Company, is it necessary or obligatory for it to come up for sanction regarding detailed expenditure either to the Advisory Board or the Assembly or is it free to appropriate or re-appropriate as it chooses?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Do I understand this is in connection with this particular question or is it a general question?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Generally.

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: I should like to have notice.

REPORT OF PRESS ACT COMMITTEE.

28. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) Was the report of the Press Act Committee of 1921 forwarded to the Secretary of State with a covering despatch from the Government of India? If so, when?

(b) Was any reply received from the Secretary of State to the said despatch? If so, when?

(c) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table the despatches, if any, that passed between the Secretary of State and the Government of India in this connexion?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The report was forwarded to the Secretary of State under cover of a letter dated the 30th June 1922.

(b) and (c) It would be contrary to Standing Orders of the Secretary of State to publish the correspondence referred to.

PRESS LAW REPEAL AND AMENDMENT ACT.

20. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether the Press Law Repeal and Amendment Act of 1922 was forwarded to the Secretary of State under section 69 of the Government of India Act? If so, when?

(b) Is it a fact that the Secretary of State viewed with disfavour certain aspects of the Press Law Repeal and Amendment Act of 1922? If so, on what grounds?

(c) Is it a fact that the Secretary of State made a definite suggestion for the enactment of a legislative measure giving protection to the Indian Princes and Chiefs against seditious attacks in the Press in British India?

(d) Is it also a fact that the Secretary of State intimated the possibility of His Majesty in Council signifying his disallowance of the Press Law Repeal and Amendment Act of 1922, under section 69 of the Government of India Act, if a legislative measure giving protection to the Indian Princes and Chiefs against seditious attacks in the Press were not enacted?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) Yes, on the 22nd September, 1921. As regards (b), (c) and (d), the Honourable Member is referred to the correspondence published in the Gazette of India Extraordinary of the 25th November, 1922, which gives an account of the genesis of the Bill. The Government of India do not propose to ask permission to publish any further correspondence between the Secretary of State and themselves on the subject.

INDIAN STATES (PROTECTION AGAINST DISAFFECTION) ACT.

30. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to lay on the table the correspondence that may have passed between the Secretary of State and the Government of India, regarding the legislative enactment giving protection to the Indian Princes and Chiefs against seditious attacks in the Press in British India?

Mr. Denys Bray: The Honourable Member is referred to the answer to his question No. 29.

RESPONSIBILITY TO PASSENGERS BY THE BRITISH INDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

31. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether attention of the Government has been drawn to the fact that in the Notice to Passengers issued by the British India Steam Navigation Company there is a clause as follows:

"The Company will not be responsible for and shall be exempt from all liability in respect of any detention, loss, damage or injury, whether fatal or otherwise, if or to the holders of tickets issued by this Company or their Agents, his property or effects belonging to or carried by or with him, whether the same shall arise from, or be occasioned by the act of God, the King's enemies, dangers of the seas, rivers or navigation, collision, fire, thefts or robberies, whether by a person in the employment of the Company or by others, accidents to or by machinery, boilers or steam, accidents by sea or by land, unskilful, improper or careless navigation, or any other acts, defaults or negligences of the Company's Agents, servants or employers of any kind whatsoever, etc."?

(b) If so, is the Government aware that great harm is done to Indian commercial interests from the operation of such clause and what action do the Government intend to take about this?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes.

(b) It is understood that the clause referred to, or an adaptation thereof, appears in all notices to passengers issued by Steam Navigation Companies in India and as there is nothing to show that harm is caused to commercial interests thereby the Government of India do not intend to take any action in the matter.

Mr. K. Ahmed: May I ask a Supplementary question, Sir? Is it not derogatory to the principle of legislation in this country?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: That is a matter of opinion.

EMPLOYEES IN THE OFFICE OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA.

32. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to inform:

(1) how many persons are employed under the High Commissioner for India in London; and

(2) their pay, allowance, nationality and educational qualifications?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (1) The staff under the High Commissioner in London, including therein all messengers, labourers, etc., and all departments numbered 567 on September 21st, 1922.

(2) The Government has no detailed information about the educational qualifications of the each individual, but the clerical staff is required to be of the same educational standard in each grade as that fixed for employment in the corresponding grade in the Home Civil Service. The Government would be pleased to show to the Honourable Member the High Commissioner's establishment list, in which the other particulars asked for are given, but do not consider the expense of printing it to be necessary.

RESOLUTIONS IN THE ASSEMBLY.

33. Mr. B. N. Misra: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of:

(a) Resolutions sent by (i) Official, (ii) Non-official Members of the Assembly during 1921 and 1922, respectively?

(b) The number of the Resolutions admitted by the Hon'ble the President?

(c) The number of (i) Official, (ii) Non-official Resolutions that came up for discussion before the Assembly during each year?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: A statement is laid on the table which gives the information asked for by the Honourable Member.

Statement showing the number of resolutions (official and non-official) received, admitted and actually moved in the Legislative Assembly since its inauguration in 1921.

Session.	TOTAL NUMBER OF RESOLUTIONS OF WHICH NOTICE RECEIVED.		Total number of resolutions admitted. (Official and non-official).	TOTAL NUMBER OF RESOLUTIONS ACTUALLY MOVED.
	Official.	Non-official.		Official.	Non-official.
Delhi session, 1921	0	175	129	8	25
Simla session, 1921	0	220	104	8	20
Delhi session, 1922	3	204	224	3	35
Simla session, 1922	7	255	236	6	9

N.B.—In cases where several Members gave notice of the same Resolution the notice by each Member has been counted as a separate Resolution.

RESOLUTIONS NOT DISCUSSED IN THE ASSEMBLY.

34. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state how many of the admitted Resolutions could not come up for discussion before the House and the reason why they could not be reached?

(b) If for want of time the Resolutions could not come up before the House for discussion, will the Government be pleased to allow sufficient time this Session so that all the Resolutions may come up and be discussed before the House?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) The number of admitted Resolutions which did not come up for discussion can be ascertained from the Statement which I have just laid on the table in answer to the preceding question. The figures are as follows:—

1921	{ Delhi term	95	Resolutions.
	{ Simla term	176	"
1922	{ Delhi term	186	"
	{ Simla term	221	"

It is obvious that the reason why these Resolutions did not come up for discussion is that there was not possible to allot sufficient time for the discussion of so many Resolutions.

(b) Under rule 6 of the Indian Legislative Rules the power to allot time for the discussion of non-official Resolutions is vested in His Excellency the Governor General and not in the Government of India, and I would invite the Honourable Member's attention to the instructions contained in rule 6 for the exercise of that power. I may also state for the Honourable Member's information that there are now more than 250 admitted Resolutions undisposed of.

Mr. W. M. Hussainally: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? Is it contemplated by the Government to extend the time for non-official business?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Governor General—the power is not in the Government, but in the Governor General—has to have regard to the public interests in allotting time. I have just told the House that there are 250 Resolutions waiting to be disposed of. If three days a week were allotted for the disposal of Resolutions, those 250 Resolutions would take the House 30 weeks of continuous sittings to dispose of. I think the Honourable Member will therefore see that it is impossible to provide that all Resolutions of which notice is received should come up for discussion.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is not this House specially meant for the benefit of this country and its representatives to bring forward Resolutions, and is it not the duty of the Government to allot more days for non-official Resolutions in preference to Government business for the benefit of the Government?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I was not aware that this House was created as solely a Debating Society.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Did I say, Sir, that it was a Debating Society? My question is whether in a week's time or taking all the working days of the Assembly together, the major portion of it is meant for official business only or for non-official business affecting the country and its representatives?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Is the President of this Assembly consulted in allotting days for non-official business?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The President is invariably consulted in regard to the allotment of days for non-official business before the Governor General's orders are taken.

INDIANS IN THE INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

35. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Is the Government aware that a large number of qualified Indian Medical men are still in temporary Indian Medical Service waiting for appointment by nomination to the permanent cadre of Indian Medical Service?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to state if there are any more Indians to be taken into the permanent cadre of Indian Medical Service and, if so, the dates about which the selection is to be made?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) There are still many Indian officers temporarily employed in the Indian Medical Service but the Government are unable to say how many of these desire to obtain permanent commissions.

(b) More Indians will be taken into the Indian Medical Service but no precise date can be given. During the last four years 91 Indians have received permanent appointments.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: May I ask a Supplementary Question, Sir? In making these thirty appointments recently by the Secretary of State, were the claims of those who had already served as Temporary Officers taken into consideration in the way that the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey has been good enough to tell us to-day that temporary services are taken into consideration in making permanent appointments in the departments of which he spoke?

Mr. E. Burdon: The number of permanent officers at present in the Service, when the thirty officers to whom the Honourable Member just referred have been appointed, would be less than the authorised cadre in the Indian Medical Service.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: I am afraid, Sir, that is not my question. I shall repeat it. In making these 30 appointments, did the Secretary of State take into consideration the claims of those who had served as temporary officers and whose services had the first claim on the Secretary of State according to the proposition to which the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey has agreed in answering another Supplementary Question this morning?

Mr. E. Burdon: The claims of the temporary officers were taken into consideration.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Of these 30 people who will soon be coming in, would any of them replace the existing temporary officers who have been promoted from the Provincial Service; would any of these 30 men replace the men already in the Provincial Service?

Mr. E. Burdon: I cannot say definitely off hand. I should like to have notice of the question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: It would be a burden on the revenue, would it not, Sir?

MEMORIALS FROM MEMBERS OF THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

33. *Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the references that have been made in the Indian newspapers as to the memorials submitted by the members of Indian Civil Service from different Provinces to the Secretary of State for India in Council?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to place copies of the memorials on the table together with the remarks, if any, of His Excellency the Governor General thereon?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The Government are not sure what references in the newspapers the Honourable Member has in view. Memorials have been submitted by members of the Indian Civil Service in the various provinces to the Secretary of State in Council and there have been numerous references in the Press to questions relating to the all-India services including the Indian Civil Service.

(b) The answer is in the negative.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: A Supplementary Question, Sir? Has there been any reference to the Secretary of State without any reference to the Government of India from any province? If so, what action has the Secretary of State or the Government of India taken on that?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: -I shall be able to answer that question if the Honourable Member will inform me as to what he means by a representation to the Secretary of State and on what matter?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Representation regarding grievances of the services from any particular province or jointly?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member asks me whether there has been any representation from the services to the Secretary of State. As far as I am aware, memorials sent direct to the Secretary of State are invariably returned by him for submission through the proper channel. If any such memorials had reached the Secretary of State and had not been so returned to the memorialists for submission through the proper channel, I should naturally have been unaware of the fact.

PASSED CANDIDATES OF THE STAFF SELECTION BOARD.

37. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Is it a fact that the passed candidates of the Staff Selection Board are appointed in leave and other temporary vacancies in some Department of the Secretariat and are spared when there is no vacancy available in that Department?

(b) Is it also a fact that even when they get a vacancy in some other Department of the Secretariat without any break of service, their previous service is not taken into account in determining their position among similar temporary men?

(c) Is it a fact that temporary men have got no service book in which to keep a record of their services as long as they are temporary?

(d) Do the Government propose to prescribe a brief service book (or open sheet) which should remain in the possession of every passed candidate moving as a temporary clerk from one Department to another?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to-day to Mr. B. N. Misra's question on subject No. 8.

UNPASSED CANDIDATES OF THE STAFF SELECTION BOARD.

38. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Will the Government please lay on the table a statement showing the number of unpassed candidates employed in the Lower and Upper divisions of the Foreign and Political Legislative and Commerce Departments of the Secretariat?

(b) What was the total number of outside candidates passed by the Staff Selection Board in 1921 and how many of them were in Secretariat service on 1st September, 1922?

(c) How many of the passed candidates were not in service on 1st September, 1922, and how many unpassed men were in service on the same day?

(d) What steps do the Government propose to take with a view to replace unpassed men by passed men?

(e) Will the Government be pleased to call for a list of all unpassed men in the various Departments showing also definite dates by which they will be replaced by passed candidates?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The information is being collected and will be laid on the table when ready.

STAFF SELECTION BOARD EXAMINATION.

39. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Will the Government please state the following facts about the last examination of the Staff Selection Board for outside candidates:

- (1) Total number of candidates who applied for all the examinations.
- (2) number of those who applied for the upper division of the attached offices (Assistants).
- (3) number of those allowed to appear and of those who actually appeared for it.
- (4) how many of them are likely to be called for interview at Simla?

(b) Are the Government aware that some of the Departments of the Secretariat and Army Headquarters are dismissing more men, on account of reduction or otherwise, than can be taken in by other Departments and that it is causing great hardship on those who have to remain unprovided at Simla?

(c) How do the Government propose to provide the additional number of 110 outside candidates who are to be declared successful by the Board on the result of the examination which was held in July last and when is the result likely to be published in the Gazette of India?

(d) Is the Army Headquarters establishment in receipt of pay and allowances of the Secretariat and is it considered to be a Secretariat or attached office for the purposes of recruitment by the Staff Selection Board?

(e) Is it a fact that the Board has re-examined the Departmental men in view of the rumour that the questions had leaked out?

(f) Does the Board intend to hold a second or short additional test in drafting and office routine for such of the outside candidates as pass the first examination?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) (1) The total number of outside candidates who applied for permission to sit for the examination was 1,012

(2) The number who applied for the Upper Division of Attached Offices was 440.

(3) The number of those allowed to appear was 420 and of those who actually appeared was 338.

Most of these men also appeared for other categories of appointments.

(4) The number of those shown in answer (3) above who were called for the interview in Simla was 80.

(b) and (c) The position does not appear to be as stated, and it is assumed that the men whose services are being dispensed with are men without permanent appointments.

(Altogether 105 outside candidates passed the Board's examination but there are still a few left who, owing to absence, have not completed the test). The Board have already been able to offer employment to several of the candidates who had passed the recent examination, e.g., of the 10 candidates who qualified as Typist in the Secretariat, every one has either secured or been offered employment. The results have been published in the Gazette of India, dated the 30th December, 1922.

(d) The Army Headquarters establishment is not in receipt of the pay and allowances of the Secretariat proper but for purposes of recruitment by the Staff Selection Board, it is treated in the same way as the establishment of the Secretariat.

(e) Yes.

(f) No.

DISTURBANCES IN THE WAZIR FORCE.

40. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state briefly the present condition of disturbances in the Wazir Force as compared with that 6 months back?

(b) Do the Government propose to keep all the additional troops and establishments in the Wazir Force? If so, how long?

(c) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing expenditure on Military establishments and troops in the Wazir Force for 1914-15 and 1919-20?

(d) Do the Government propose to reduce this increase of expenditure? If so, in what way and when?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) There was a decided improvement in the situation in Waziristan during the six months June to November, 1922, as compared with the period December, 1921 to May 1922, as the following statistics will show:—

During December 1921 to May 1922, the number of military casualties was 183, whereas during the period June to November 1922, our casualties only numbered 70, while the number of hostile actions decreased by 26. As regards outrages against the civil population in the Administered Territory (Derajat and Bannu Districts) these number 110 during the period December 1921 to May 1922, as compared with 57 during June to November 1922. During the month of November 1922, however, a more definitely hostile attitude was adopted in South Waziristan by some sections of Mahsuds and Wazirs in consequence of which punitive measures, in the shape of bombing by aeroplanes, were undertaken commencing from the 17th December 1922.

(b) and (d) The Government cannot, at the present time, make any statement in regard to this. It would be contrary to the public interest to do so.

(c) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given in the Council of State on the 7th September last to question No. 64.

SERGEANTS IN ARMY HEADQUARTERS.

41. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Will the Government lay on the table a statement showing the number of Sergeants and Staff-Sergeants employed in the various Branches and Directorates of the Army Headquarters on clerical and assistant's work?

(b) What is the minimum pay of an Indian Lower Division clerk and what is that of the women clerks employed in the Army Headquarters?

(c) What are the total pay and allowances (including regimental) of a Staff-Sergeant employed in the Army Headquarters on clerical work?

(d) Do the Government propose to consider the necessity of replacing the Military and women clerks by Indian clerks and assistants as early as possible?

(e) If so, when?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) A statement is laid on the table.

(b) The minimum pay of second (or lower) division clerks whether European (civilian) or Indian, is Rs. 75 for new entrants and Rs. 90 on confirmation, and that of women clerks Rs. 100 during probation and Rs. 120 on confirmation.

(c) A British soldier who enters the Upper Division starts on the same rate of pay, namely, Rs. 175 as civilian members of that division. A British soldier entering the Lower Division starts on Rs. 140 since it is necessary to give an initial rate which shall be higher than the pay and allowances admissible to the soldier if employed regimentally. On confirmation such soldiers formerly became staff-sergeants; now they become civilians. After confirmation they are promoted on the prescribed incremental scales, namely, Rs. 90—8—250 (special grade Rs. 250—25—300) for second division clerks, and Rs. 200—12—440 (lower time scale) and Rs. 200—12—344—350—20—450 (Upper time scale) for first division assistants. Soldier and ex-soldier clerks do not draw regimental rates of pay.

(d) and (c) The question of restricting the number of soldier and ex-soldier clerks employed at Army Headquarters is under consideration and has not yet been finally decided. It is necessary to retain a certain proportion of clerks of this class on account of the knowledge and experience of military matters gained by service in the ranks of British units.

The employment of women clerks on the present scale is in the main a result of the war. Their numbers will diminish with time but there are certain kinds of clerical work which it has been held can most suitably be entrusted to women clerks.

INTER CLASS ACCOMMODATION IN MAIL TRAINS.

42. *Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (a) Do the Government propose to connect Delhi, the capital of India with Calcutta, Bombay and Peshawar by through Mail trains providing Inter Class accommodation for the benefit of Secretariat and other people and their families?

(b) Is it a fact that both the Bombay Mail trains carry Inter Class up to Lahore only?

* Including temporary and officiating.

(c) Will the Government consider the desirability of having Inter Class accommodation provided in Bombay Mails up to Peshawar for the convenience of middle class people on long journeys?

(d) Is it a fact that both the Bombay Mail trains via Bhatinda and via Saharanpur leave Delhi for Lahore at practically the same time in the evening thus diminishing their utility?

(e) Will the Government consider the desirability of instructing the authorities concerned to so arrange that there should be a difference of at least 3 hours in their timings?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) (b) and (c). Inter class accommodation is provided on the Punjab Mail between Delhi and Howrah (Calcutta).

Government does not propose to press the Great Indian Peninsula Railway to make such provision on their mail trains between Bombay and Delhi as the brakes and postal mail vans with other classes of accommodation make up the full load of these trains.

A fast express with inter accommodation runs between Delhi and Bombay leaving Victoria Terminus at 22 hours and arriving at Delhi at 8 hours on the third day. The train is practically run at mail speed and does the journey in 34 hours from Bombay to Delhi and in 30 hours and 40 minutes from Delhi to Bombay.

In view of the number of passengers using Nos. 3 Up and 4 Down which are the only mail trains running between Lahore and Peshawar it does not appear to be feasible to make such provision on these trains also. It is true that at present intermediate class accommodation is provided on the Bombay, Baroda and Central India and Great Indian Peninsula Bombay Mails over the North-Western Railway to the extent of one and two intermediate class bogie carriages respectively as far as Lahore, but beyond Lahore owing to the graded section the loads of the mail trains with single engines are now at their maxima. The provision of inter class accommodation between Lahore and Peshawar would entail the use of an extra engine on each of these trains.

(d) It is true that the two Up Bombay Mail trains leave Delhi for Lahore within an hour and a half of each other but as, apart from Lahore Station, these two trains serve two distinct sections of the North-Western Railway, this fact does not in any way diminish their utility for the passengers for whom they are intended.

(e) It is not possible to allow a larger margin between the arrival of both the Punjab Mails at Delhi because these two trains are amalgamated at Lahore and they must arrive at Delhi at about the same time.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhiary: Having regard to the difficulties just mentioned, would the Railway Administration consider the desirability of providing greater and better facilities for reserved accommodation in the Intermediate and Third class on the Express trains for the members of the public and of the Secretariat? I ask this question, particularly in view of the recent decision that clerks getting Rs 100 will get third class allowance and therefore will have to travel with menials.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I think all I can say in reply to that is that the suggestion, I believe, is under consideration by some of the Railway Administrations.

Mr. M. M. Joshi: May I ask, Sir, what will pay the Government more, whether to carry First and Second class carriages or third class carriages with the mail?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I am quite unable to give an answer to that, Sir. It is a matter of statistics which I have not got with me.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, before the House proceeds with the business on the agenda, I should like to ask your permission 12 Noon. to ask a question, an important question, of which I have given private notice to the Honourable Member for Revenue and Agriculture. I may inform you, Sir, that the Government have kindly consented to answer this question at short notice. Have I your permission to ask it. (Here the Deputy President nodded assent) The question runs thus.—Has the attention of the Government of India been drawn to a report in the Press that the elections to the Legislative Council in Kenya will be held in February? In view of the fact that no decision has yet been announced on the general question of franchise in that Colony, and the grave concern which is felt by the Indian community both in Kenya and in this country over the matter, will the Government be pleased to press for an early decision so as to enable the Indian community to participate in the elections?

Mr. J. Hullah: Yes. The Government of India have telegraphed to the Secretary of State asking him, if necessary, to obtain the postponement of the next general election until Indians are able to participate.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Can the Government throw any further light on this question? Is it likely that the elections will be postponed?

Mr. J. Hullah: I have no official intimation to that effect, but I see in this morning's Reuters telegram a statement that "it is thought that it will be in the interests of all parties to delay the elections for the Kenya Council in order to give ample time for the consideration of the proposals and for holding the next election on any new electoral basis which may be adopted."

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

VACANCIES ON ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY

1 Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state how many vacancies or new appointments in the superior service occurred on the Assam-Bengal Railway during the last 10 years and how many of them were filled by public advertisement and how many pure Indians were appointed in the different departments?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Forty seven new appointments to the superior service of the Assam Bengal Railway were made during the last ten years. Of these nine were Indians who were appointed as follows.

5 to the Engineering Department.

1 each to the Traffic and Audit Departments and 2 to the Medical Department.

Most of the appointments were made by the Home Board in London, and the Agent of the railway is unable to say whether the appointments were filled by public advertisement or not.

PROBATIONERS ON ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY.

2. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state the number of pure Indian probationers in the Loco. and Traffic departments of the Assam-Bengal Railway and how many of them are under probation for the Senior Subordinate Grades and when the first probationer was admitted?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: One Indian Traffic Probationer for the superior service was appointed on 1st August 1918 and he is now acting as an Assistant Traffic Superintendent. No Indian Locomotive probationer of the same class has been appointed. During the last ten years there have been 500 Indian probationers in the subordinate grades of various departments.

A probationer of this class, with abilities, if confirmed, is able to rise to the top grade of the subordinate cadre.

ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY: ENGINEERING DEPARTMENT.

3. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state how many European officers were recruited for the Engineering department of the Assam-Bengal Railway during the last three years and how many of them have left the service and how many were sent back to England at railway expense?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Five European officers were appointed in the last three years. One resigned and received a return passage back in terms of his agreement.

ADMINISTRATIVE POSTS IN RAILWAY BOARD.

4. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state (a) whether any of the administrative posts at the headquarters of the Railway Board requiring engineering qualifications have ever been filled by officers of the Company-worked State railways and whether any were held by Indians, (b) if the reply is in the negative, why not?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) It is not clear what precise information the Honourable Member wants but if, as is assumed, he refers to the selection for appointment as Chief Engineer with the Railway Board the reply to both parts of this question is in the negative..

(b) The reason is that the appointment is borne on the State Railway Engineer cadre and that senior and fully qualified European State Railway Engineers were available and selected for the appointment.

VACANCIES ON RAILWAYS.

5. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it the normal practice on railways to reserve vacancies in substantive appointments as they occur to be filled by probationers on the satisfactory completion of their stipulated probationary period?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Probationers are taken on in accordance with an estimate of the vacancies which will admit of their permanent appointment on the termination of their probationary period.

WATERWAYS ON BENGAL RAILWAYS.

6. Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: (a) Has the Government any information as to the insufficiency of the waterways in the line of the Eastern Bengal Railway and the Railways connected with it, in northern and north-eastern Bengal, to afford a rapid and free outflow of water in times of extraordinary floods, such for example, as came about towards the end of September, 1922? Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the opinion of Dr. Bentley published in the daily papers of Calcutta in October last, in this connection?

(b) Do the Government propose to take any steps with a view to collect accurate information as to the impediments caused by the said Railways to a free and rapid outflow of flood-water at times of excessive flood, and to remove them by providing larger escapes in the said railway alignments?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Immediately after the floods of September last an investigation into the adequacy, or otherwise, of the waterways in the railway embankments chiefly concerned was undertaken by the Senior Government Inspector of Railways in consultation with the Bengal Government and the Eastern Bengal Railway Administration. Subsequently the Railway Board decided to obtain the services of a fully qualified and independent authority to report on the question, and with the permission of His Highness the Maharaja of Patiala, the Chief Engineer of that State, Rai Rala Ram Bahadur, C.I.E., I.S.O., was deputed for this purpose. His report was received in December, and arrangements were made immediately to give effect to his recommendations. A copy of the report will be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

The attention of Government has not been specifically drawn to the opinion expressed by Dr. Bentley, but they are aware of it from the Press reports.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT MAGISTRATE, DELHI.

7. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state if it is true (a) that the present post of an additional District Magistrate of Delhi is being held by an Englishman or an Anglo-Indian?

(b) That he is not a member of the Indian Civil Service but belongs to the Provincial Civil Service?

(c) That he is also drawing Rs. 100 a month as a local allowance?

(d) That two of his subordinate officers—the City Magistrate of Delhi and the Revenue Officer of Delhi—also belong to the same Provincial Civil Service and both these officers are also senior to him in their services?

(e) That no local allowances are being given to both these officers?

(f) That last year a City Magistrate of Delhi was posted as his subordinate, but he soon got himself retransferred from Delhi on account of the same?

(g) If the above statements are true, will the Government be pleased to state the reasons which led the Government to overlook the seniorities and services of other officers before the appointment of the Additional District Magistrate of Delhi, and what special qualification does the present Additional District Magistrate hold?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a), (b) and (c) The answer is in the affirmative.

(d) The two officers named are not subordinate to the Additional District Magistrate. The Additional District Magistrate is merely one of the staff of 1st class Magistrates who is gazetted under section 10 (2), Criminal Procedure Code, to exercise the powers of the District Magistrate to relieve the latter of a certain amount of work. All three officers are equally subordinate to the District Magistrate and Collector.

(e) No allowance is attached to the post of Revenue Assistant, but the City Magistrate draws a duty allowance of Rs. 50 per mensem for discharging the additional duties of Secretary to the Notified Area Committee.

(f) The facts are not as stated. The officer named held the post of City Magistrate during the absence on leave of the permanent incumbent and was transferred on the latter's return to duty.

(g) In view of the facts as stated above this part of the question does not arise.

COMMITTEES.

-9. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: (a) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the Committees appointed (1) by a Resolution of the Council of State, or (2) the Legislative Assembly, or (3) appointed by order of the Government, with their dates of appointment, their personnel in each case, the money spent on each of these Committees and its result in each case?

(b) Are the findings of the Committees in any case kept confidential and not laid on the table of the House or otherwise made known to the members of the Indian Legislatures? Are the Government prepared to publish such reports?

(c) In how many and what cases were the reports of any such Committees laid before the Government and orders passed finally without the consultation of the Indian Legislature?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the statement laid on the table on the 6th September, 1922, by my predecessor in reply to a question asked by Lieutenant-Colonel Gidney regarding the cost of Committees appointed by the Government of India. The Government of India do not consider that any sufficiently useful purpose would be served by undertaking the labour involved in amplifying that statement to give the further information asked by the Honourable Member. If he will refer to the list of Committees included in those statements he will probably be able himself to decide in the cases of such Committees as he was interested in whether the Report has been published and as to whether action has been taken upon it.

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA.

10. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: (a) For what period was the present High Commissioner for India in London appointed? (b) Is an Indian debarred from being appointed to that post? (c) In whose hands does the appointment rest? (d) Have the Government of India decided to appoint a suitable Indian for the post in future?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Under the terms of His Majesty's Order in Council dated the 12th August, 1920, which was published in the notification of the Government, No. 6634, dated the 2nd October, 1920, the person appointed as High Commissioner for India in the United Kingdom is to hold office for a period not exceeding five years, but is at the same time eligible for re-appointment. The Order in Council also prescribes that the appointment of High Commissioner shall be made by the Governor General in Council with the approval of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council. An Indian is not debarred from holding the appointment. No decision has yet been arrived at on the question of a permanent successor to the late Sir William Meyer.

RETRENCHMENT PROPOSALS.

11. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a summary of the proposals for retrenchment as prepared by the Government to be laid before the Retrenchment Committee and also the proposals of the said Committee so far as possible?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The House will be fully informed on this subject at the earliest opportunity.

SECTS, CREEDS AND APPOINTMENTS IN MADRAS.

12. M. K. Reddi Garu: Will the Government be pleased to collect the following information regarding the Presidency of Madras and place it on the table:

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA SUPERIOR POSTS.

15. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: How many persons belonging to the United Provinces have been employed under the Government of India, in any superior post within the last one year and how many have been taken from Bengal and the Punjab during that period?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information asked for is given in a statement which is being sent to the Honourable Member.

TOLLS ON MUTHRA RAILWAY BRIDGE.

16. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: What steps have the Government taken or propose to take to free the Muthra Railway Bridge from tolls on wheel and passenger traffic? Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table all correspondence on the subject?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Government of the United Provinces have announced that as soon as their financial position improves they propose to make the bridge free of tolls. There the matter rests for the present. Until the Government of the United Provinces agree to the payment of compensation to the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway for the loss occasioned by the abolition of tolls, no further action can be taken. The Government regret that the correspondence cannot be placed on the table.

TELEPHONE CONNECTIONS WITH DELHI AND SIMLA.

17. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state which of the official permanent capitals of the Provinces are connected by telephone directly with Delhi and Simla?

(b) Is Allahabad the official permanent capital of the United Provinces and is it directly connected by telephone with Delhi and Simla. If not, is it proposed to be so connected?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) Lahore is the only official capital of a Province in direct telephonic communication with Delhi and Simla.

(b) Allahabad is the official capital of the United Provinces and when the Automatic Exchange now being set up there is completed, telephonic communication between Allahabad and Delhi will be open to the public. Owing to the distance, commercial speech will not be possible between Allahabad and Simla until repeaters are fitted in Delhi, and it cannot be stated at present when this will be done.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

18. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Have the Government taken or do they propose to take any steps (a) to set at liberty persons imprisoned for political offences; and

(b) to withdraw the Criminal Law Amendment Act from the localities to which it had been made applicable about the time of the Royal visit and thereafter?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Government of India do not propose to interfere with the discretion of local Governments in either matter.

STATE-OWNED RAILWAYS WORKED BY COMPANIES.

19. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a list of the State-owned Railways worked by Companies, with the respective dates of the expiry of their contracts and to state which of these Companies have mostly Indian capital?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The information asked for by the Honourable Member in the first part of his question will be found in the "History of Indian Railways" a copy of which is in the library of the House.

The capital of the railway companies under consideration is in sterling and the Government of India are not in a position to state whether and to what extent Indian capital has contributed to it

PAY OF HIGH COURT STAFF, UNITED PROVINCES.

20. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: 1. Have the Government seen a paragraph in the Pioneer of Allahabad, dated 29th November, 1922, at page 9, column 4, headed "High Court staff's pay"?

2. Will the Government be pleased to state what action, if any, have they taken within the last 5 years in the exercise of their powers of control over the High Court at Allahabad under section 6 of the Letters Patent as amended with regard to the remuneration of the clerks and ministerial officers of the aforesaid High Court?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: 1. The Government of India have seen the paragraph in question.

2. Under clause 6 of the Letters Patent establishing the High Court of Judicature at Allahabad the salaries of officers and clerks of the Court are such as the Honourable the Chief Justice may appoint and the Government of the United Provinces, subject to the control of the Government of India may approve of. The control referred to is exercisable in accordance with the provisions of the general orders governing expenditure from provincial revenues. In fact under the present orders the control is control by the Secretary of State in Council, and, so far as individual salaries are concerned it only comes into operation when it is proposed to increase the salary of an appointment which is fixed or is proposed to be fixed at above the rate of Rs. 1,200 a month. The Governor General in Council is therefore not primarily concerned with the remuneration of these persons, and under the orders referred to no reference in the matter has recently come before him. The local Government has full power to decide questions connected with the remuneration of these persons subject to such limitations as I have indicated and presumably no question which could not be decided by the local Government has arisen.

PAY AND PROSPECTS OF CLERKS AND MINISTERIAL OFFICERS.

21. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a comparative statement showing the scales of pay, rates of promotion and prospects of the Clerks and Ministerial Officers attached to Allahabad High Court and the Calcutta High Court and Imperial Secretariats?

CLERKS AND MINISTERIAL OFFICERS, UNITED PROVINCES.

22. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Has the following principle laid down by the Right Hon'ble the Secretary of State for India for regulating the salary of the establishment been applied to the Clerks and Ministerial Officers of the Allahabad High Court:

"It is highly desirable that the remuneration of all ministerial establishment employed at any particular station whether their salaries fall on the Military, the Imperial, Civil or Provincial budget, should be pitched, either directly or indirectly by means of allowance, as to give such equality of remuneration for similar labour as will prevent just cause of discontent"?

REPRESENTATION FROM CLERKS, ETC., UNITED PROVINCES HIGH COURT.

23. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Did the Hon'ble the Chief Justice of the Allahabad High Court receive any representation from the Clerks and Ministerial Officers of the said High Court regarding the increase in their pay and forward it to the United Provinces Government with a letter of recommendation to His Excellency the Governor of the United Provinces in or about July, 1922? If so, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of all the correspondence on the subject?

Have the Government of India been approached in the matter referred to above, if so, when and with what result?

DISCONTENT AMONG CLERKS, ETC., UNITED PROVINCES HIGH COURT.

24. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: What action have the Government taken or do they propose to take to "prevent just cause of discontent," among the Clerks and Ministerial Officers of the High Court at Allahabad in the exercise of their powers of control under Section 6 of the Letters Patent as amended?

INCREASE TO PAY OF UNITED PROVINCES HIGH COURT CLERKS, ETC.

25. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Is it a fact that the Allahabad High Court yields a profit of nearly 2½ lacs a year and that the increase claimed by the Clerks and Ministerial Officers of that Court or proposed by the Hon'ble the Chief Justice of that Court would create no additional burden on the general Provincial Revenues?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Government of India have no information as to the scales of pay, rates of promotion and prospects of the clerks and ministerial officers of the Allahabad High Court. They are not primarily concerned with these matters. They have therefore not called for the information from the local Government and they are accordingly unable to supply the statement or information asked for in this and the following questions 95 to 98.

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT, 1870.

26. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state if the Foreign Enlistment Act of 1870 is operative or enforced in British India?

(b) If the answer is in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state what statute in India or England makes this Act operative in the whole or a part of India, many parts of which were not then even under the British Crown?

(c) Is there any distinction in the 1870 Act in respect of Asiatic Nations and European Nations?

(d) Is this Act operative in the British Colonies?

(e) At what moment does this Act begin to operate?

(f) At what stage does the "consent or license"—as given in this Act—from His Majesty become necessary?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a), (b) and (d). The Honourable Member is referred to Section 2 of the Act.

(c) No.

(e) The Honourable Member is referred to Section 3 of the Act.

(f) The Honourable Member is referred to the relevant provisions of the Act.

POLITICAL PRISONERS AND SERVICE IN LEGISLATURE.

27. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Will the Government be pleased to remove the restriction which debars persons, who have undergone imprisonment, from election to serve in a Legislative Council or in the Indian Legislature and permit all such persons to stand in the Reformed Council Election who have undergone simple or rigorous imprisonment on account of their political views or deeds? If the Government is not prepared to remove such restrictions will it be pleased to state the reason why?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Under sub-rule (2) of rule 5 of the Electoral Rules a person against whom a conviction by a criminal court involving a sentence of transportation or imprisonment for a period of more than six months is subsisting is not eligible for election for five years from the date of the expiration of the sentence unless the offence of which he was convicted has been pardoned. I would remind the Honourable Member that a pardon, which would have the effect of removing the bar where it exists, is granted by the Governor General and not by the Governor General in Council. I am not aware whether the Honourable Member has the authority of the persons affected in suggesting that the Governor General should exercise his powers on their behalf.

POLITICAL PRISONERS IN DELHI JAIL.

28. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: (a) How many political prisoners are in Delhi jail at present?

(b) How many of them are treated as special class prisoners?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information has been called for and will be supplied when available.

MOULANA QUTBUDDIN, EDITOR OF THE "CONGRESS."

29. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Are the Government aware that Moulana Qutbuddin, Editor of the "Congress" and a prominent Muslim of Delhi who is undergoing 3 years' rigorous imprisonment in Delhi jail, is not given the preferential treatment to which he is entitled by reason of his good social status, education, etc.? If he is not treated as a special class prisoner will the Government be pleased to state the reason and do the Government propose to issue immediate instructions to the effect mentioned above?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information has been called for, and will be supplied to the Honourable Member when available.

DUTY ON MOTOR SPIRITS.

30. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state if it is true:

(a) that an Act in 1917 was passed to impose a duty of six annas per gallon on all motor spirits produced in India and Burma,

(b) that this Act still applies to petrol consumed in India and Burma,

(c) that there is no tax at all on petrol exported to foreign countries—the Governor General in Council having exempted exported petrol from such tax.

(2) What is the amount of petrol exported to foreign countries from Burma since this Act was passed?

(3) What is the reason for not taxing the petrol exported from Burma to foreign countries?

(4) Is it true that the Oil Companies at Burma themselves value petrol at one anna and six pies per gallon while the petrol charges at Bombay are charged two rupees per gallon for exactly the same petrol?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: 1. (a) and (b) Yes.

(c) The position is as stated by the Honourable Member. Excise duties being duties on consumption, a refund of excise duty is granted in the case of all commodities subject to such duties in order to enable these goods when exported, to compete on equal terms with similar goods of foreign origin in foreign markets. In exempting exported petrol from this excise duty, the Government of India followed this general principle.

2. The export of benzine and petrol from Burma since 1917 was as follows:

	Gallons.
1917-18	18,934,711
1918-19	22,600,932
1919-20	36,222,584
1920-21	18,856,639
1921-22	20,156,329
1922-23 up to October 1922	12,872,217
Total	129,643,435

3. Attention is invited to the answer to (c) above.

4. No. The Honourable Member has probably been misled by the figures of total value published in the returns of Sea Borne Trade of last and previous years, calculations from which do give his figure. Those were not, however, the figures reported by the Oil Companies. It is not known how this old conventional rate became established but it was of long standing. The Collector of Customs, Rangoon, noticed the discrepancy and ~~abolished~~ ^{abolished} it in March 1922 and if the Honourable Member will refer to the volumes of Sea-borne trade published every month from April last, he will see correct figures of value have been given. The same applies to the last published volume of Annual Returns.

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE, PUSA.

31. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Adverting to the ad interim reply and subsequent informations given to Question No. 70 asked on the 6th September, 1922, regarding the Agricultural Research Institute and College at Pusa, will the Government be pleased to give the following additional informations :

- (e) Is it a fact that a sum of Rs. 76,46,000 has been spent from the year 1903-04 up to 1921-22 over the education of students, numbering 123, in Post-Graduate training class, 223 in short course training class and 23 in the class of special study in Laboratories?

Mr. J. Hullah: The information asked for is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

WAITING ROOM AT MOHESHKHUNT.

32. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what steps have been taken in regard to the providing of a Waiting Room at Moheshkhunt Station on the Bengal and North-Western Railway?

(b) Will the Government be further pleased to state if any new Waiting Room has been constructed on the Bengal and North-Western Railway line ever since September, 1922, and if so, where and what is the number of first and second class passengers booked to and from those stations?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: (a) A reference in this matter has been made to the Bengal and North-Western Railway who now state that a first and second class waiting room at Moheshkhunt Station will be provided as soon as possible.

(b) No waiting room on the Bengal and North-Western Railway has been constructed since September 1922.

DR. GOUR'S CIVIL MARRIAGE BILL.

33. †Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Will Dr. Gour, M.L.A., be pleased to state whether he has received a copy of the resolution adopted at a meeting of the Parsees held on the 26th November, 1922 protesting against the Honourable Member's Civil Marriage Bill and if so, will he be pleased to place a copy of the same on the table?

†The reply to this question will be printed in a later issue of these Debates.

REPRESENTATION AGAINST CIVIL MARRIAGE BILL.

34. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Have the Government received any representation from the Council of Parsee Central Association praying that the Bill to amend Act III of 1872 (Civil Marriage Bill) be not enacted into law, at least so as to affect the Parsee community in any way?

• Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The answer is in the affirmative.

SIR MONTAGU WEBB AND A BARONETCY.

35. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the rumour published in many papers that Sir Montagu Webb, Kt., of Karachi had written a letter to an English paper in England to the effect that some time ago the Home Department had suggested to him to contribute some 20 thousand pounds towards a particular fund and on payment of this sum the Home Department would get him the title of "Baronet"?

(b) If the above statement is true, what action do Government propose to take in the matter?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) The Honourable Member is no doubt referring to a letter written by Sir Montagu Webb to the London "Morning Post" and reproduced in various Indian papers. This letter contains a reference to the Home Government, i.e., His Majesty's Government, but none, of course, to the Home Department of the Government of India.

(b) Does not arise.

LECTURES BY MR. RUSTOMJI IN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

36. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state if the Government of Bombay or the Government of India is paying any remuneration to Mr. Rustomji in the United States of America for his lectures, etc., about India in the United States of America?

(b) Was the said Mr. Rustomji connected with any paper at Bombay some time ago?

(c) What was the reason for his leaving the paper?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Mr. Rustomji is in receipt of certain allowances towards which the Government of India contribute.

(b) and (c) Government are not prepared to give any information.

MEDICAL RESEARCH CHAIRS IN CENTRAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE, DELHI.

(b) If not, do the Government propose to take any such step in near future?

(c) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a detailed account of what has been done and of what is going to be done in the said Institute?

Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a), (b) and (c) The scheme for the establishment of an Imperial Medical Research Institute has not yet been finally settled. For information on the subject the Honourable Member is referred to my speech in the Assembly on the 23rd September 1922.

SPECIAL RECRUITMENT FOR INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

38. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether it is a fact that the Government propose to recruit 30 Europeans to the Indian Medical Service every year and on special terms?
- (b) What would be the cost of each recruit for serving in India for 5 years?
- (c) Why was this unusual step taken and the necessity therefor?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) No. The present proposal is to obtain 30 European officers during this year only.

(b) The officers will serve under the ordinary Indian Medical Service regulations as regards pay and allowances, etc., except that a special gratuity will be granted in lieu of pension.

(c) I invite the Honourable Member's attention to the reply given to the question asked by Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal, No. 81.

EXODUS TO SIMLA.

39. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the statement of Sir Edwin Lutyens that "the Government could if it liked stay down in Delhi most if not the whole of the hot weather and that he was sure the personnel would keep better health than they did at Simla"?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to reconsider the possibility of materially reducing the expenditure of Simla Exodus?

(c) What would be the savings to the Indian Exchequer, if Exodus to Simla is wholly stopped?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: (a) Yes. It is assumed that the statement refers to the period after the new capital has been completed.

(b) The matter is now receiving the attention of the Retrenchment Committee and their recommendations will be duly considered.

VIZAGAPATAM HARBOUR SCHEME.

40. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) At what stage is the financial progress of the Vizagapatam Harbour scheme?

(b) Whether the Bengal Nagpur Railway company made any proposal towards the solution of the financial difficulty?

- (c) And if so, whether they were accepted by or acceptable to the Government of India?
- (d) Whether the Government of India has any alternative proposal to effectuate the said purpose?
- (e) What was the amount already spent towards acquisition of land for Harbour purposes?
- (f) Whether any steps are being taken to proceed with the Railway construction for the completion of Vizagapatam Raipur line and Kottavalsa Baster Durg line along with Harbour construction?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a), (b), (c) and (d) The question of the method of financing the Vizagapatam Harbour Scheme is under consideration and no decision has yet been reached. The Bengal Nagpur Railway Company has not made any definite proposal on the subject.

(e) The amount spent towards acquisition of land for Harbour purposes to the end of 1921-22 is Rs. 11,80,175.

(f) The harbour project is still under investigation and no special steps are therefore being taken for the completion of the railway projects referred to.

SETTLEMENT OF INDIAN ARMY OFFICERS IN VICTORIA.

41. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether any guarantees have been given by the Government to the "Australian farms Limited" Melbourne in connection with the Settlement of Indian Army Officers on land in Victoria?

(b) And if so, will the Government be pleased to place on the table papers relating to it and to state the eventual cost that will be involved thereby?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) and (b) The facts which have apparently given rise to the Honourable Member's question are as follows:

Last year, a Director of the Australian Farms Company, Limited, visited India with a view to making known to surplus officers of the Indian Army who were at that time about to be released from service a scheme of land settlement in Victoria. An important feature of this scheme was that any officer who wished to take advantage of it should, before entering into possession of the land, deposit a certain sum of money for the purchase of stock, implements and so on. As those surplus officers who had accepted the option of deferring for 3 years the receipt of their gratuities were not likely to be in a position to pay at once the sum required, the company expressed their willingness to accept in lieu of immediate payment, where necessary, an assignment, up to the amount required, of the gratuity of any officer who wished to enter the scheme. At the same time, the company requested that, in order to safeguard the ultimate payment to the company of the amount assigned to it by the officer, the Government of India should undertake to hold the assigned portion of the gratuity and arrange for its being paid to the Company when the payment fell due. As the arrangement described cost Government nothing and ensured important facilities to officers who had unfortunately for themselves been deprived of a career in Government service, it was agreed to by the Government of India with the approval of the Secretary of State.

The facts being as stated the Government do not consider it necessary to lay the papers on the table.

HIGH AND TRADE COMMISSIONERS.

42. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether the power of appointing the High Commissioner for India in England vests in the Government of India?
- (b) Whether any Commissioner of Trade for India is appointed in Australia and if so, what are his duties?
- (c) Whether there is any near chance of enlarging his duties to include the safeguarding of Indian interests in Australia, Newzealand, Fiji and other Islands in the Pacific Ocean?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Under the terms of His Majesty's Order in Council dated the 13th August 1920, which was published in the Notification of the Government of India, No. 6634, dated the 2nd October 1920, the appointment of High Commissioner for India is made by the Governor General in Council with the approval of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council.

(b) No. (c) Question (c) consequently does not arise.

EMIGRANTS FOR FIJI.

43. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state the circumstances under which emigrants are recently permitted to leave Bengal to Fiji?

Mr. J. Hullah: No emigrants, as defined in the Indian Emigration Act, 1922, have been permitted to leave Bengal recently. I may, however, add, for the Honourable Member's information, that 781 Indians, travelling as ordinary passengers outside the Indian Emigration Act, left Calcutta for Fiji during 1922. This number included 152 return emigrants, who proceeded to Fiji defraying the cost of passages themselves.

INCHCAPE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

44. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state whether the report of the Inchcape Committee is to be placed for discussion in the Legislative Assembly before any final orders are passed by the Government?

45. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether any and if so, how many Indians are being trained in the Supply and Transport and the Artillery branches of the Army and Air Service?
- (b) What was the total number of Indians trained for the higher posts in the Army, and what proportion does it bear to the total Army Officers paid for by the Indian exchequer?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) There are at present 19,279 Indian officers and other ranks employed with the Supply and Transport Corps, 12,300 with the Royal Artillery, and 104 Indian other ranks with the Air Force in India.

(b) All officers holding the King's commission, whether British or Indian, are trained with a view to their being rendered fit to hold the highest posts in the Army. Of the total number of King's commissioned officers in the Indian Army, 3,925 are British officers and 108 are Indian officers. This latter figure includes 44 Indians who hold temporary or honorary commissions.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE.

46. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the fact that 70 Million £. were reduced in Civil Departments in England?

(b) What was the reduction contemplated in Civil Departments in India?

(c) What was the total Military expenditure in India both ordinary and extra-ordinary from 1914 up to day, or as far as figures are available and what was the total Imperial Revenue raised during that period?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) I cannot identify the figure of £70,000,000 mentioned in the question. According to the statement of Sir Robert Horne when introducing his Budget for 1922-23 on the 1st May 1922, the total estimate for supply services for 1922-23 showed a reduction of £218,500,000 below the adjusted Budget estimate for 1921-22. It must however be remembered that a considerable part of this reduction was the almost automatic outcome of reduced prices and the winding up of certain special War Accounts.

(b) The amount cannot be stated until the report of the Luchape Committee has been received and considered.

(c) The required statement is laid on the table.

Statement showing the total net Military Expenditure in India from 1914-15 to 1921-22 and the Revenue of the Central Government in the same years.

Year.	Net Military Expenditure.	Central Revenue (excluding Military Receipts).

EXPENDITURE ON DEFENCE.

47. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state what proportion of the total revenues of India has been spent on defence during the last two years?

Mr. E. Burdon: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

DEBT AND TAXATION.

48. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: (a) What was the total national debt of India before 1914, and what was it by the end of 1922?

(b) What was the amount of additional taxation levied during the said period?

(c) Whether any and what amount is spent on productive purposes by the Imperial Government during the same period?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The national debt of India amounted to 447 crores on the 31st March 1914 and to 781 crores on the 31st March 1922.

(b) During the above period additional taxation estimated to yield 20½ crores a year was imposed. This is exclusive of the excess profits duty which actually yielded 11½ crores during the short time it was in force.

(c) The total amount spent on productive purposes during the same period was 105 crores.

FOREST RESEARCH INSTITUTE, DEHRA DUN.

49. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state whether they have organised in the Forest Research Institute, at Dehra Dun, a course of instruction to qualify the students for Imperial Posts?

Mr. J. Hullah: No such course has yet been organised. The question as to the future place of training of the Imperial Forest Service probationers is under consideration at present and no final decision thereon has been arrived at.

FORESTRY SCHOLARSHIPS.

50. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of Scholarships given by the India Office for the study of Forestry during the last three years and to whom they were awarded and how many Indians were the recipients thereof.

Mr. J. Hullah: There is only one scholarship for Indian Forest probationers, namely, the Currie scholarship, which is awarded annually by the India Office on the results of the final examination held after the period of training. During the last three years it has once been awarded to an Indian.

RESEARCH AT DEHRA DUN AND PUSA INSTITUTES.

51. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state whether any and what facilities are given to students to undertake research at the institutes at Dehra Dun and Pusa, and whether they are merely confined to teachers and lecturers?

Mr. J. Hullah: Forest Research Institute, Dehra Dun.—It is not possible for students to spare any time for independent research during the period of two years covered by the course at the Forest Research Institute. Even now the syllabus is with great difficulty carried out. The research officers take part in the instruction and students are made familiar with the main problems under or awaiting investigation.

The time for research work is in reality after students have obtained their certificates. It then rests with local Governments to depute selected men for special courses or research work. As yet this has not been done but as soon as the new buildings are fully equipped facilities will be available for post-certificate courses or research.

Agricultural Research Institute, Pusa.—The conduct of research at the Pusa Institute is not merely confined to teachers and lecturers but qualified students are accepted for training in specialised branches of agricultural science and are encouraged to undertake research. They are given free all available facilities, e.g., the use of the Library, the laboratories (apparatus, chemicals, etc.), the benefit of expert advice, accommodation, etc.

BACTERIOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT.

52. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state whether any and if so, how many qualified Indians were appointed in the Bacteriological department during the last three years and the total number of persons appointed during the said period?

Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: During the last three years five officers have been appointed permanently to the Bacteriological Department. Two of these officers are Indians.

VETERINARY SCHOLARSHIPS.

53. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state whether any veterinary Scholarships were given by the Government during the last three years and how many out of the total were allotted to Indians?

Mr. J. Hullah: Five scholarships were granted all to Indians.

DISABILITY ON INDIAN OFFICERS ENTERING TRAINING CORPS, ETC.

54. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state whether the War Office objected to the admission of Indians to the 'Officers training corps,' and whether the Admiralty objected to the entry of Indians in naval Schools in England while admitting foreigners (other than British subjects) and whether the Government of India propose to take any steps for the removal of the disability?

Mr. E. Burdon: (i) The Army Council have held that the Officers Training Corps exists for the training of potential officers for the British Army and Territorial Force, and that consequently it is not open to Indian students, who cannot, under present regulations, become officers in either of these two forces.

(ii) The Government have no knowledge that the Admiralty have objected to the entry of Indians to Naval Schools in England, nor do they know that the Admiralty have admitted foreigners, other than British subjects, to such schools.

(iii) The Government of India have at present under their consideration certain proposals which aim at securing the admission in future of Indian students to the Officers Training Corps and they are also considering proposals which relate to the training of Indian boys at certain nautical institutions in the United Kingdom.

MILITARY COLLEGE FOR INDIANS.

55. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Is it a fact that at present 10 Indians were being nominated each year for Sandhurst out of a total of about 60 appointments to the Indian Army? Whether there is any prospect of starting at an early date a well equipped military college in India?

Mr. E. Burdon: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, and to the second part that there is no prospect of the establishment in the near future of a Military College in India on the lines of the Royal Military College, Sandhurst.

INDIANS IN COMMISSIONED RANKS.

56. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: What is the number of the Commissioned Officers in the army in India—would it be between four or five thousand? How many Indians were appointed out of them; whether it would be more than fifty?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total number of commissioned officers in the Indian Army^a is as follows:

British officers with the King's commission	3,925
Indian officers with the King's commission	108*
Indian officers with the Viceroy's commission	3,129
Total	7,162

* Includes 44 who hold temporary or honorary commissions.

INDIANS FOR WOOLWICH.

57. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Is it a fact that no Indian cadet had been nominated for admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, which trained cadets for the Artillery and Engineers? Whether the Indian exchequer is contributing any amount to that institution either directly or indirectly?

Mr. E. Burdon: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. As to the second part, India pays, through the capitation payment for British troops, a share of the cost of the Royal Academy, Woolwich, based on the number of recruits she takes from the institution annually to maintain the sanctioned establishment of Royal Engineers.

COST OF MILITARY COLLEGES.

58. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: (a) What was the capitation rate paid to the War Office in respect of each soldier sent to India?

(b) Whether it is a fact that before 1890 the share of the cost of the Military Colleges which was allotted to India was £1,122 for Sandhurst, £7,582 for Woolwich and £15,000 for the upkeep of the Army Medical School, School of Gunnery and School of Military Engineering?

(c) In lieu of contribution of lump sums was the capitation rate fixed at £7½ per man?

- (d) Whether it was increased to £11½ in 1908?
 (e) Whether since 1920 it was increased nearly 2½ times the latter sum?
 (f) What was the total cost on that head in 1920 and 1921?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) The capitation rate paid at present to the War Office in respect of each British soldier on the Indian establishment is £25-13-0.

(b) The figures quoted in this part of the question are not quite correct. The contribution paid by India towards the cost of the Military Colleges was as follows:

(i) Royal Military College, Sandhurst	11,223
(ii) Royal Military Academy, Woolwich	7,582
(iii) Army Medical School, School of Gunnery and School of Military Engineering.	12,256
(iv) Artillery College	3,178

(c) The answer is in the affirmative. The rate of £7-10-0 had effect from 1890-91.

(d) The rate was increased from 1st May 1908 to £11-8-0 (not £11½).

(e) During 1920-21 and 1921-22 the payments made to the War Office in respect of British Troops were made on the basis of 2½ times the rate of £11-8-0, so as to allow for the general rise of pay and prices. From the year 1922-23, however, the capitation rate has been reduced tentatively to 225 per cent. of £11-8-0 or £25-13-0.

(f) The total expenditure in each of the years 1920-21 and 1921-22 amounted to £1,896,000, which allowed for a reduction in the pre-war establishment of British Forces in India by one-eighth. Provisional payments of £100,000 in 1920-21 and of £92,000 in 1921-22 were also made to the Air Ministry in respect of the charges in connection with the raising, training, etc., of the Royal Air Force serving in India.

NAVY AND AIR FORCE.

59. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Is it a fact that admission to the Navy and Air force is confined to those of European descent?

Mr. E. Burdon: The answer is in the affirmative.

INDIANS IN SUPERIOR RAILWAY POSTS.

60. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: How many Engineers are appointed in the State Railways, and how many of them are Indians and whether there was any obligation to employ Indians by company managed Railways? Whether Indians were appointed to any superior posts of the Wagon and Locomotive Departments and if so, in which proportion?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: There are at present 197 officers in the Indian Service of Engineers and the Provincial Engineering Service, State Railways. Of these 50 are Indians and the proportion of Indians is yearly increasing. The Company-worked Railways are under no contractual obligations to employ any fixed proportion of Indians in their establishments but they have been informed of the policy of the Government of India and are increasing the recruitment of Indians as vacancies occur. In the latest agreement—one between the Secretary of State and the East Indian Railway Company—the following clause finds a place:—

5. The Company so long as this contract remains in force will continue its present policy of extending the employment of Indians in the Superior Establishment as suitable candidates offer themselves and can be trained.

* * * *

There are at present 84 superior officers employed in the Locomotive and Carriage and Wagon Departments of State Railways. Of these, two are Indians. Both were appointed by the Secretary of State after qualifying in England. Two more Indians, now in training in England, are likely to be appointed this year.

INDIAN RECRUITMENT TO HIGHER RAILWAY SERVICE.

61. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Have the Railway Board made any recommendation for any definite proportion of Indian recruitment in the higher posts of Railway Service?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: It has been decided by the Government to recruit Indians, as qualified men become available up to 50 per cent. of the total Superior appointments in all departments of State Railways, as recommended by the Public Services Commission.

The Company-worked railways have been informed of the policy adopted by the Government in the matter and have been asked to increase their Indian recruitment.

INDIANS IN PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

62. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: How many Europeans were recruited since 1919 for the Public Works Department and whether any and what proportion of the total number recruited were Indians—whether the Industrial commission report recommended 50 per cent. of the recruits to be Indians?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: 84 Europeans and 51 Indians (including statutory natives of India) have been recruited since 1919 for the Indian Service of Engineers in the Public Works Department. The excess in the number of Europeans is due to the greater recruitment in Europe beyond the normal figure during these years in order to make up for short recruitment during the period of the war. The total number of officers recruited to the service since 1914 inclusive comprises 105 Europeans and 118 Indians.

The Public Services Commission, and not the Industrial Commission, recommended that 50 per cent. of recruitment for the service should be effected in India.

SHIPBUILDING, AERONAUTICS, ETC.

63. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Do the Government of India contemplate providing facilities for training in Ship-building, aeronautics and marine Engineering?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: A committee will shortly be appointed to consider, among other things, the question of providing facilities for the training of Indian apprentices as officers and engineers of ships, (the encouragement of ship-building and the construction of dockyards and engineering workshops in this country. The question of training of Indian youths in the United Kingdom for admission into the engineering branch of the Royal Indian Marine is also under consideration. The Government of India have had under consideration a proposal for training Indians in aeronautical engineering but it has been found impossible to pursue the matter further owing to the present financial stringency.

INDIANS IN SUPERIOR RAILWAY POSTS.

64. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: How far is the Railway Board trying to help Indians qualified to enter the superior posts in the Railway service? Is it a fact that 3 Indians and 15 Europeans are entertained every year on the average since 1915?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The answer to the Honourable Member's question will be found in the comparative statistics given in a reply to Mr. N. M. Joshi on 6th September last in this House.

So far as State Railways are concerned, the average number appointed annually since 1915 to superior posts of all departments except Audit is 9 Indians and 17 non-Indians respectively.

INSTITUTES OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS.

65. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Is it a fact that there are Institutes of chartered accountants in Canada and Australia? Is there any similar institute of chartered accountants in India and if not why do not the Government start one in Delhi?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Government have no definite information as to whether Institutes of Chartered Accountants exist in Canada or Australia. There is no such Institute in India but the services of the Sydenham College of Commerce and Economics, Bombay, are utilized by the Government of India as a central examining body for conducting examinations at various centres and for awarding a Diploma in Accountancy.

ALLOCATIONS TO RAILWAYS.

66. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to make a statement showing the allocations made to the different Railways out of the provision for capital expenditure in the current year under the recommendation of the Railway Finance Committee?

(b) What is the probable total allotment to be made to each of these Railways during the period of five years for which the capital expenditure programme is to be prepared?

(c) With reference to the said allotment for capital expenditure in the current year, what amount is to be spent in the case of each Railway—

(i) in rehabilitating existing lines, and

(ii) in completion of lines under construction prior to the report of the Railway Finance Committee; and how much of (ii) approximately represents expenditure on the improvement of the conditions of travel of third class passengers?

(d) Has any amount out of the said allotment for the current year, in the case of any Railway, been, or is proposed to be, spent in undertaking extensions of existing lines or in constructing new lines, contrary to the recommendation of the Railway Finance Committee? If so, what is the amount in each case, and what is estimated to be the ultimate total cost of each such project?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (c) The Honourable Member is referred to the Statement of Demands for capital expenditure on railways for 1922-23 being Appendix C to 'Detailed Estimates and Demands for grants' which were presented to the Assembly in March last.

It is not possible to separate expenditure intended to benefit 3rd class passengers alone. The Honourable Member will, however, find in Chapter VII of the Administration Report for 1921-22 just published a great deal of information in respect to the measures which are contemplated with this object on all lines.

(b) The probable annual allotment to be made to each of the railways for open line purposes during the remaining four years of the quinquennium will be approximately the same as in 1922-23 with possibly slight modifications in certain cases. The Demand Statement for each year will be duly presented to the Assembly in the usual course.

(d) The reply is in the negative.

BRITISH INDIA POLICE ASSOCIATION.

67. Beohar Raghubir Sinha: (a) Is it a fact that the Government of India have refused to accord recognition to the British India Police Association?

(b) If the reply is in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state the reason of such refusal?

(c) Are the Government aware that a feeling of uneasiness has now been caused in the country and that it is apprehended that the Police Amendment Bill recently passed by this House was really directed against the legal activities of the Associations inasmuch as the Bill protected only the Associations recognised by Government?

(d) Are there any rules and regulations for recognising such Associations framed by the Government of India? If so, what are these?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Yes.

(b) The constitution of the Association was not in accordance with the rules, but the real reason for declining to accord recognition was that it was impossible for the Government of India to recognize an All-India association of purely provincial services.

(c) The Government of India are aware that feelings of uneasiness exist in certain quarters, but they are without foundation. The bill to which the Honourable Member refers is in no sense designed against associations lawfully constituted and recognized. It is open to provincial services to form provincial associations and to apply to the local Government for recognition.

(d) I will show the Honourable Member the rules on the subject.

DEPOSITS IN POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

68. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) Whether it is a fact that deposits in Post Office Savings Banks in England are not liable to attachment for judgment debts of the depositor?

(b) Whether there is no such immunity in India as the deposits in the Savings Banks are attachable under section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code?

(2) Will the Government be pleased to consider the desirability of introducing this protection in India for the encouragement of thrift?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (1) (a) Yes.

(b) No.

(2) The question will be considered.

AMNESTY TO POLITICAL PRISONERS.

69. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Do the Government propose to consider the desirability of granting amnesty to all political offenders, convicted within three years who have not caused injury to the person or property of anybody?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Government are not prepared to consider the desirability of granting a general amnesty.

PETROL.

70. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) the quantity of petrol annually produced in Burmah consumed in India and exported to other countries?

(b) the quantity imported into India from other countries?

(c) the average producing cost per gallon in Burmah, United States, and cost price per gallon for the consumer in India, United States and England?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) The export of petrol from Burma to India in 1920-21 amounted to 15,998,291 gallons. Figures for subsequent years are not available. The quantities exported from Burma to other countries were 36,222,584 gallons in 1919-20; 18,856,640 gallons in 1920-21; and 20,156,323 gallons in 1921-22. The production of petrol in Burma is about 32 million gallons.

(b) The imports of petrol from other countries into India were 16,448 gallons in 1919-20; 2,052 gallons in 1920-21; and 1,348 gallons in 1921-22.

(c) The Government of India have no information as to the average producing cost per gallon of petrol in Burma and the United States, or as to the cost price per gallon for the consumer in the United States. The retail price of petrol in London is 2 shillings per gallon and in Calcutta Rs. 1-14 per gallon, i.e., the same as the rate obtaining in London plus six annas on account of excise duty. The price at Rangoon of the two brands sold there is Rs. 1-10 and Rs. 1-12 per gallon.

"SERVICE" POSTAGE STAMPS FOR LEGISLATURES.

71. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Do the Government propose to issue instructions to issue "Service" postage stamps to the members of the Legislative Assembly and Council of State on payment?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Government do not consider it necessary to issue the instructions suggested.

REPORT OF ARMS RULES REVISING COMMITTEE.

72. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state when the Report of the Arms Rules Revising Committee (held at Simla in August last) will be published and when will the new Rules be enforced?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Report of the Arms Rules Committee will be published on the 20th January next. The various recommendations contained therein are under the consideration of Government but it is not yet possible to say when effect will be given to such of them as are accepted.

DEMOLITION OF HINDU TEMPLES IN DELHI.

73. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state if it is true that in connection with the proposal of building a Railway Station at Delhi, it is being proposed that three Hindu temples will be pulled down?

(b) If it is true, are the Government aware that no consideration of the Hindu sentiments and their religious susceptibilities has been given over this matter?

(c) That Sanatan Dharma Sabha of Muzaffarnagar has also protested, and a copy of the resolution has also been sent to His Excellency the Viceroy?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) (b) For the comfort and convenience of the general public who will use the new station now under construction at Delhi it is desirable to move from their present site three Hindu temples which seriously interfere with the approaches to the station. Friendly negotiations are in progress and it is hoped that the desired object may be attained in such a way as to avoid all possibility of hurting the religious feelings of Hindus.

(c) The answer is in the affirmative.

PROFESSOR SKINNER.

74. Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) whether it is a fact that Professor Clarence Skinner of Tufts College, United States, wanted to go to India for a year and study Indian conditions;

(b) whether the British authorities refused to visé his passport;

(c) whether Dr. Sudhindra Bose, lecturer in Political Science at the University of Iowa, wanted to go to India after 16 years' absence to see his aged mother;

(d) whether his passport also was not viséd;

(e) whether there are any other cases of Americans being refused to visit India, whether Indian authorities are consulted in the matter and the reasons for refusal of admission into India?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) and (b) The Government of India have no information.

(c) and (d). The Government of India understand that Dr. Sudhindra Bose's application for a visa for India was refused by the Secretary of State. Attention is invited to the reply given by Sir William Vincent on the 10th January, 1922, to a similar question No. 112 put by Mr. Beohar Raghubir Sinha, in the Legislative Assembly.

(e) The Government of India are not aware of any cases at present in which Americans are being refused permission to visit India. Applications from foreigners other than ex-enemy foreigners and Russians are disposed of by the British Consuls abroad, and a previous reference is only made to the Government of India in cases in which domicile in India is alleged by the applicant and the Consul has reason to doubt the allegation.

MUNSHI IMAM ALI, CHITTAGONG P. O.

75. Munshi Abdul Rahman: (1) Are the Government aware that Munshi Imam Ali who was appointed as an unpaid probationer, Chittagong Head Post Office on 1st December 1915 after an examinational test as required by Departmental rules and regulations and with the approval and sanction of the Post Master General, Bengal and Assam Circle and who after having served in that capacity for about 5 years to the entire satisfaction of his superiors was appointed a reserve clerk, Chittagong Head Post office with effect from the 1st February, 1920, has been summarily dismissed by the Deputy Post Master General on 4th January, 1921, without any sufficient ground and without any opportunity being given to him to show cause why he should not be dismissed?

(2) Will the Government be pleased to state if his summary dismissal was on the ground of his failure in examination in dictation in English taken in the midst of his official duty?

(3) Will the Government be pleased to state if the order of dismissal of a postal Department servant holding a permanent post without first requiring him to show cause why he should not be dismissed is according to Departmental Rules?

(4) Are the Government aware that all his petitions and memorials seeking for redress of his grievance in the matter sent to the Director General, Posts and Telegraphs, through proper official channel have been systematically withheld by the Post Master General, Bengal and Assam?

(5) Do the Government propose to issue instructions upon the Director General, Posts and Telegraphs to call for the record of the case and reconsider and revise the order of dismissal in question?

Colonel Sir Sidney Crookshank: The necessary information is being collected and will be supplied as soon as it is available.

EXPORT OF PETROL.

76. Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: (a) Have the Government noticed a leaflet issued by the Motor Trade Association (Western India) recently entitled "Petrol—four crores of rupees thrown away by the Government of India—an intolerable situation"?

(b) Is it a fact that the motor spirit exported to foreign countries is exempt from payment of the duty of six annas per gallon which is levied on such spirits produced and consumed in India?

(c) How much petrol has been exported from India and Burma free from such duty from the time of the passing of Act II of 1917 up to date?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: (a) and (b). Yes.

(c) The export of benzine and petrol from Burma and India since 1917 was as follows:

	From Burma.	From India.
1917-18	18,934,711	Nil.
1918-19	22,800,932	• 90
1919-20	36,222,684	Nil.
1920-21	18,850,633	2
1921-22	20,156,323	Nil.
1922-23 up to October 1922	12,872,247	Nil.
Total	129,643,435	92

ASSISTANT COLLECTOR, CUSTOMS, KARACHI

77 Mr. S. C. Shahani: Will the Government be pleased to state if it is contemplated to appoint a third Assistant Collector, Customs, Karachi?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: The appointment of a third Assistant Collector of Customs at Karachi was sanctioned by the Secretary of State in 1921, but owing to the financial stringency effect has not yet been given to the sanction.

CLAIM OF INDIAN MEDICAL DEPARTMENT TO MARRIAGE ALLOWANCE

78 Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: (1) (a) Will the Government be pleased to state if the marriage allowance sanctioned for British troops and other Departments in India is given to Assistant Surgeons of the Indian Medical Department in Military employ?

(b) If not, why not?

(2) If the answer is in the negative, will the Government be pleased to state why such distinction is made between the Indian Medical Department and other Departments of the Army in India who are also largely recruited in India?

(3) Is Government aware that great discontent and dissatisfaction exists in the Indian Medical Departments on this account and what steps does it propose to remedy this grievance?

Mr. E. Burdon: (1) (a) No.

(b) and (2) The matter is under consideration.

(3) The answer to the first part of this question is in the negative. As regards the second part, matter is as I have said under consideration by Government.

INDIAN COAL ON RAILWAYS

79 Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly lay on a table a statement shewing, for each of the Budget Lines, the quantity of Indian coal consumed by Locomotives during 1921-22, the quantity purchased and the amount of foreign line freight on the latter?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: A statement showing the quantity of Indian coal consumed by locomotives on each of the budgetted lines during 1921-22, including in certain cases the figures relating to non-budget lines also, is being sent to the Honourable Member. As regards the quantity of such coal purchased by each of the budgetted lines and the amount of foreign line freight paid thereon, the information is being collected and will be furnished to the Honourable Member direct as soon as ready.

CARRIAGE OF COAL ON RAILWAYS.

80. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer to starred question No. 25 printed at page 31 of the Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume III, will Government kindly state:

- (a) the date when the differential rates were introduced?
- (b) a few other items for which similar differential rates are allowed as between railway administrations?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) 1st April 1920.

(b) Railway materials and stores.

RAILWAY AUDIT AND CONTROL.

81. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer given on 6th September 1922 to my starred question No. 38, will Government kindly lay on the table a statement shewing for each of the non-Budget lines, worked by the Bombay, Baroda and Central India and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Companies; the rate charged for Government supervision, audit and control and amounts recovered during the year 1921-22?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: A statement containing the information asked for is placed on the table.

TENURE NATURE OF POSTS OF SECRETARY, ETC., IN SECRETARIAT.

82. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag:† Is it a fact that the posts of Secretary, Joint Secretary, Deputy Secretary, Under Secretary and Assistant Secretary in the Government of India Secretariats are all tenure appointments and if so, what is the maximum period fixed for such tenure appointments?

COSTS AND RETURNS OF RAILWAYS.

83. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer given on 6th September 1922 to my unstarred question No. 19, will Government kindly lay on the table a statement shewing:

- (i) the Budget lines at present under construction,
- (ii) their cost as per the latest estimate,
- (iii) the amount included in the estimate on account of leave allowances and pensions,
- (iv) the estimated annual return on (ii) during each year of the period fixed by the Secretary of State in Council, and
- (v) the return necessary to fulfil the conditions of a productive work?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The statement is under preparation and will be sent to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

PROBATIONARY SERVICE OF RAILWAY TRAFFIC OFFICERS.

84. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state whether the entire probationary service of Railway Traffic Officers counts for increments under the new time-scale, both on State-Worked and Company-Worked Railways?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: On State Railways, under existing orders only approved service from date of permanent appointment as Assistant District Traffic Superintendent or Assistant Traffic Superintendent counts for increment on the new time-scale.

Companies' railways have their own rules.

85. Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava: Are the Government prepared to consider the desirability of enhancing the weight of luggage allowed free of charge to the passengers travelling in the different classes of railway carriages?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government do not think that this is a suitable time to take up this question.

THE COTTON TRANSPORT BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I present the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the restriction and control of the transport of cotton in certain circumstances.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION) BILL.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, I present the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill further to amend the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act 1902.

†The reply to this question will be printed in a later issue of these Debates.

THE INDIAN BOILERS BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I present the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to steam-boilers.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. Deputy President: The motion for the consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State, is now before the House.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Before this Assembly takes up the Bill for its consideration and before Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith successfully moves the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, I have got some objections to make. First of all, as this House is aware, the report of the Racial Distinctions Committee is not just before the Assembly, and that involves Chapter XXXIII of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and it is, Sir, a part and parcel of the Bill which my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, proposes to place before the Assembly for its consideration. Therefore, what he purports to place before us is not full, is not altogether a complete Bill. Therefore, Sir, there seems to be something lacking, something wanting and it is not accurate to say that it is a complete Bill. Under the circumstances, therefore, unless and until he gets the whole Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, I do not think he will be in order to move for the amendment of the Bill.

Secondly, we are all aware that there are certain controversies going on in this country that, unless and until that Chapter of the Code of Criminal Procedure is given effect to and unless and until the racial distinctions questions are thrashed out in this Assembly, I do not think my Honourable friend will be in order in placing before the House the amendments further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1898. Then again, Sir, we understand that in the Provincial Councils Resolutions have been passed that there should be a separation of executive and judicial functions of the executive officers, and every one in the Committee formed for giving effect to it is thinking of how that can be done, that is to say, whether the powers of the Magistrates and the District Magistrates will be just the same as they are along with the Sessions Judges, or whether these Magistrates will be directly under the control of the Sessions Judges. If that is so, the whole amendment, that is, the amendment which my Honourable friend has taken so much trouble over, to bring before us in the Assembly will be of no use and his 'love's labour' I am afraid will be wasted. What is the use of putting up the same thing over again in another few days? Recently we were given to understand from the Government of India, with regard to this Racial Distinctions Committee's Report, that it is coming on before us sooner or later in the next few days. Therefore, unless and until we have got that before us complete, and, in view of the fact that there are so many difficulties which cannot be got over, you cannot begin from the other side when you have not got Chapter XXXIII completed. There are so many words to be changed, the whole thing will have to be recast again a few days hence, after a waste of paper, waste of energy and waste of thought, and again we shall have to begin it again. Everyone in this country was surprised the other day with regard to that case of Reid, Assistant Manager of the Khoreal Tea Plantation concern. It was an extraordinary judgment. There were nine jurors, one was Indian and the remaining eight were Europeans and the verdict was given by them in the High Court of Calcutta in its Quarter Sessions—the eight European jurors held that the Assistant Manager, Reid, was not guilty and only one, that is, an Indian, found that he was guilty. There was great commotion in this country with regard to this question. We have had only the other day the decision of an European Magistrate in the Madras Presidency with regard to the trial of Sergeant Andrews and five others. What is this judgment? It says that it might be the case that before the transmission of the Moplah prisoners took place, these 70 poor Moplahs might have been poisoned before the train was in motion and that is how the benefit of the doubt was given to all the accused. Sergeant Andrews and five others were discharged under section 253 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I hope I may be excused for interrupting the Honourable Member as I could not possibly allow that gross travesty of the judgment unchallenged. Whether he is in order or not in referring to these matters I leave it to your decision. In the meanwhile, my duty is to describe the Honourable Member's statement as a travesty of the judgment of the Magistrate.

Mr. Deputy President: When the Honourable Member rose to raise his objections, I thought they were of a technical character and I did not think at the time that he would go into such details. I shall have to stop him from going into details at this juncture.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I am not going into details. Nor am I of the same opinion as my Honourable friend, Sir Malcolm Hailey. Anyhow I want to make this quite clear that I am not criticising the judgment but that is the feeling in the country. There is a great commotion. Unless and until that Chapter is amended, I do not think there is much in the amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code. It will be better, quite worth while, and most desirable that the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith should make his time more useful; and unless and until he has got that Chapter amended at once, I do not think he can be in order to move successfully in this Assembly that the whole Procedure Code should be amended. I raise these objections and now move that there should be postponement of this motion and I should like the Honourable Member to point out why he has not got Chapter XXXIII in the Bill which the Assembly is going to consider.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): I rise, Sir, on a point of order. This Bill is a Bill which amends only certain sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure and we are now going to consider amendments only to some of the sections, the other sections remaining untouched. Now the question has been raised about the recommendations of the Racial Distinctions Committee. That is a question which is absolutely irrelevant to the discussion of the present Bill. I suppose the Honourable Member will not accuse me of not having predictions in favour of the view which he has put forward, because, as he knows, I was responsible for the Resolution which led to the appointment of the Racial Distinctions Committee. I am, therefore, as keen on that point as perhaps any Member here, but I do feel that no amendment outside the amendments proposed now in the Code can be rightly moved during the discussion of the present Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban). I wish to join issue with the statement made by Mr. Samarth. This is a Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code. . . .

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Only some sections.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It is not convenient to amend certain sections of the Code only. If the Honourable Member will read the history of this Bill, he will find that several Committees sat to revise the Criminal Procedure Code and this Bill is specially brought to amend the Criminal Procedure Code. I do not wish, Sir, that by making a statement like this the House should be tied down at this stage to making amendments only to certain sections. I think, Sir, the whole Bill is before the House. I have taken the liberty to suggest amendments outside the amendments proposed by the Committee and I do trust, Sir, that you will not accept the suggestion made by Mr. Samarth that this is a Bill merely to amend certain sections of the Code.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I suggest to you, Sir, that it is not necessary for you to give a ruling on this particular point at this particular moment. The motion before the House is whether the Bill as placed before the House should be taken into consideration and, Sir, if I may suggest it, the right moment for a ruling from the Chair as to the admissibility or otherwise of certain amendments is after the Bill has been taken into consideration and not at this stage.

Mr. Deputy President: I give my ruling that the further discussion on the motion that the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure Code be taken into consideration be proceeded with.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian): The point made is about the postponement of the consideration.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, until we get Chapter XXXIII completed.

Mr. Deputy President: That I would rule out of order.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian Rural): May I ask what is the motion before the House? We understood that Mr. K. Ahmed's motion was that the consideration of the Bill be postponed. Has that been ruled out of order or has the House to express its opinion on it?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Having allowed the discussion, how can that be ruled out of order?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I am only putting the point to the House.

Mr. Deputy President: After hearing the Members I have ruled that the motion before the House is that the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State, be taken into consideration.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: There is a motion before the House by Mr. Kabir-ud-din Ahmed that the consideration of the Bill be postponed and I venture to submit, Sir, that the postponement of the discussion is in the hands of the House and it is very doubtful whether it could be ruled out of order, if I mistake not, then I think it cannot. I should like to be enlightened as to whether we could discuss the postponement of the Bill or not.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Is there a motion before the House?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes.

Mr. Deputy President: I did not understand that the Honourable Member had actually moved any motion. Then the motion before the House is that the consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, be postponed.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, until we get Chapter XXXIII and the other Bills ready.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): If that is the motion before the House I do not think it has been sufficiently discussed. Whether it is proposed to be ruled out or has been ruled out rightly or wrongly is another question. But if the amendment for postponement is before the House, it has not been sufficiently discussed.

Mr. Deputy President: The question for postponement of the consideration of the Bill is now before the House.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): On this question of postponement there is one difficulty in the way and it is this. I remember when Sir William Vincent was leading the House, an amendment was sent in, if I remember aright, by Mr. Agnihotri asking for the inclusion of a number of sections along with the sections which have been reported upon; and if I remember aright the President who was then in the Chair and the Honourable the then Home Member had come to the conclusion that it is not desirable or possible to bring in amendments not relating to sections already before the House. There is that difficulty in the way. I do not know whether that would be regarded as barring this discussion but if it is not to be regarded in that light, I should like to say a few words in support of the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Kabir-ud-din Ahmed. It is this, Sir. This Bill contains a number of sections. At the same time, it omits cognate sections, sections which go into the sections which are before the House, which relate to the sections which would be discussed now, but which would become altogether useless, unless we have the other sections also before us. I will give you a few concrete instances. Take the Chapter relating to the Joinder of Charges. You deal first of all with section 235 and you go to section 239. Unless you have sections 233, 234, and 236 before the House, it will be impossible to move any amendment or come to any definite conclusion on the matter before the House. It is therefore in a very imperfect manner that the discussion of this Bill has been brought before the House, and it is undoubtedly desirable that the House should have before it a Bill which can be discussed properly and whose discussion would be of use to the Assembly. At present, Sir, by tinkering with some of the sections, we really are not advancing the cause which we have so much at heart. No doubt this Bill has been before the country for a long time, and it is desirable that this Bill should become law as early as possible. But the proper way of dealing with it is to bring in all the sections, at least, of the Chapter which we have to deal with. There is no use in bringing in one section of the Chapter and leaving aside the other sections of the Chapter, thereby rendering the whole discussion useless. Sir, there is a great deal to be said for the motion which has been brought forward by my friend, but there is also another matter, Sir. In Calcutta a report has been presented by a Committee which has been appointed that there should be a separation of judicial from executive functions. Now, if this is going to be given effect to, and if in other Provinces also we have similar results, the whole Bill will have to be recast: and what is the use of going on with a Bill which will be regarded as altogether useless when that question of separation of judicial from executive functions has been considered. For all these reasons, it seems to me, Sir, that we shall be right in delaying the business before the House; we all know that it will be a waste of time if the Member in charge presses for the consideration of this Bill. As I said, if there is a ruling, unless you rule that that ruling does not shut out this discussion, I would agree to the proposition which has been put forward to the House by my friend, Mr. Kabir-ud-Din Ahmed.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I think that the amendments which are before the House can be dealt with independently and without making a reference to those sections which are not within the scope of being amended, and I, therefore, oppose the motion for postponement, which has been put forward before this House. The Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has raised his objection to our now proceeding with the amendments, and the salient point, which has been referred to is that the separation of executive and judicial functions is being contemplated and that it would be better that this amendment may be taken in hand after that. I am afraid, Sir, there is no force in this argument. I myself am anxious to see those functions separated, but it will be seen when that question finally comes before the House. There is no guarantee that that question will, even within a year hence, be brought before this Assembly, in its final shape. Therefore there will be no good in delaying the present amendments for which the whole country has been waiting for the last three years. (A Voice: 'More.') Three years so far as I know, it may be more. (A Voice: 'Six years.') Then my argument becomes more forcible. Therefore, I very strongly oppose this motion for postponement. It would be better that we should take this important work in hand at once and do our level best to finish it, nothing will preclude us from suggesting fresh amendments, if necessary, hereafter.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): Sir, one of the questions before the House now is whether amendments referring to sections other than those referred to in the Bill can or cannot be taken into consideration. There is absolutely nothing on this point in our Rules of Business or Standing Orders. This question arose before this very House in the very first Session. That was with regard to some amending Act about the Land Acquisition Act. I would like to draw your attention, Sir, to that ruling, and it is with reference to that ruling that I would request you to decide the question. Therein, Sir, it was Rao Bahadur Rangachariar.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I interrupt the Honourable Member, purely in the interest of the House? The point of order now discussed refers to the admissibility or otherwise of amendments relating to sections of the Code which are not placed in the Bill. Do we understand, Sir, that that is open to discussion now, or has it been ruled out of order by you until the major question that the Bill be taken into consideration has been disposed of?

Mr. Deputy President: That question has been ruled out of order by the ruling which the Honourable the President gave on that case.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, may I point out that the situation seems to have a little changed after the speech made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has pointed out that a ruling has already been given by the Honourable the President at the last Simla Session that this amendment would be out of order.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Where?

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: If the Honourable the Leader of the House could enlighten us, I think it would be much better.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am very unwilling at this stage to enter into discussion regarding a point of order of this nature. I thought myself that the point of order had been ruled out of discussion by the Chair, until such time as the consideration of the major question had been disposed of. Since, however, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, considers that the situation has been altered by the considerations put forward by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, I will, with your permission, inform Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that he is incorrect in the statement of that consideration. I have here the September debates, and there is no reference to this matter in regard to the discussion on the Criminal Procedure Code. As Mr. Bhai Man Singh was pointing out, the point came—I won't say under discussion, but under mention in regard to the proceedings regarding the Land Acquisition Bill; but there was no formal decision on the matter at all; and I would again appeal to you, Sir, let us know whether we are to continue discussing this point of procedure now, or are to wait until we have disposed of our major question, namely, whether the Bill as drafted should be taken into consideration or not, or, as the motion now stands before the House, whether that consideration should be postponed. Its consideration was already once postponed in the September Session. I have my own views on the subject of further postponement. I do not intend to put them before the House until we are clear whether we are discussing the point of procedure or the point of postponement.

(Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary rose to speak.)

Bhai Man Singh: I was in possession of the House, Sir, and I had to stop because the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey rose to a point of order.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Before that matter comes up, I have a matter and we wish that it should be perfectly cleared.

(Bhai Man Singh rose.)

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: If, Sir, as the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey told us, it be quite clear that it has not been previously ruled out of order that other amendments may be moved, that do not arise out of or appertain to the ground covered by the Government amendments, then many that are anxious to move these amendments would not support the motion for postponement. If, on the other hand, it be absolutely clear on the ruling then given or that you may now give that this cannot be done, the case for postponement will be strong. If it is given to Bhai Man Singh to differ from Mr. K. Ahmed, it may be given to me to differ from Mr. Samarth, and we do not all take the same view of the situation regarding the admissibility of other amendments. If it be absolutely clear that other amendments can be moved, then there is very little case for postponement. But that brings up another difficulty. Many, under the belief that under the previous ruling no amendments of the kind we are discussing are admissible, have refrained from sending in such amendments. What is their position? From all points of view it seems that the issues must be clearly defined before we proceed, even to vote on the motion for postponement.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I submit that my Honourable friend is not in order. The proposition now before the House is whether. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. I wish to give my ruling on each amendment as it comes up before the House. It is impossible to lay down in a general manner what amendment is in order and what is not. I think before an amendment is before the House, it is impossible for the Chair to decide whether it is in order or not. We will therefore now proceed with the question regarding the postponement of this motion.

Bhai Man Singh: Of course in deference to the Honourable Chair's ruling that we are not to discuss the point whether such amendment would be in order, I defer my arguments on that point for a future moment.

Now, I have only to submit one point before you, Sir, and that is whether the consideration of the Bill should or should not be postponed. So far as this question by itself is concerned, the Bill has been before the Legislature for the last six years; it had to be postponed during the last summer Session and therefore one naturally feels inclined to say that it should not be postponed any further. But I think the point raised by my friend on the left is really a very strong one; when we are revising practically the whole Code, why should most important matters be left out? These matters, I might say, have been the burning questions before the public for many years; they are questions, not of rules and procedure, but touching on the substantial injustice that is being done in many cases; they are vital questions and they should not be omitted from discussion when we are practically revising the whole code. And because these important questions are being shelved and kept out of the discussion, I should say that the consideration of this Bill should be postponed.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal (Jullundur Division; Non-Muhammadan): Sir, from the copy of the Bill as passed by the Council of State and sent to us by post it appeared that the whole Code of Criminal Procedure was before the Council of State; and they noted in the very Preamble that the sections which were omitted were held by the Council of State to stand as they were and only those referred to in the clauses were amended. From this it appears that the object of the Bill before the Council of State was to revise the whole Code and not only particular sections, though they came to the conclusion that certain sections were to remain intact and others were to be altered. That was the position before the Council of State, and there is no reason why in the Assembly we should not consider whether the sections which were omitted from amendment or held by the Council of State to remain intact, should not be amended.

Another objection is that we have submitted certain amendments which have been ruled out, I do not know whether by the Secretary or by the President. I object to those amendments being ruled out before they were put before the House. I sent certain amendments and I received an answer that they related to other sections. I do not know under what rule those amendments have been omitted from this printed list; they had to be considered by the House; before they were ruled out of order, they could not be prejudged without being brought before this House. This is another reason why consideration of this Bill should be postponed until those amendments have been printed and are before the House for a ruling as to whether they are in order or not. I therefore respectfully support the proposition that the consideration of this Bill be postponed and all amendments brought before the House before this Bill is taken into consideration.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I should like to set the Honourable Member's mind at rest regarding his amendments. What happened was that the Honourable Member sent in, a considerable time ago, a number of sections forming part of his own draft Bill in regard to racial distinctions, which he desired to enter as amendments to the Bill now before us; the Legislative Department returned them, asking the Honourable Member to draft them in a form more appropriate to this Bill. That, Sir, is all that happened to the Honourable Member's amendments; they were not excluded; and, as far as I know, no amendments which Members have put forward in regard to the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Bill have been excluded, either by the Legislative Department or anybody else.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammedan Rural): I am, Sir, in great difficulty as to whether I should vote for the postponement of consideration of this Bill or for taking the Bill into consideration by reason of the view that you have been pleased to express a little while ago. You have declined, Sir, to give any ruling upon the point whether the whole Code of Criminal Procedure is before us or whether we are confined to the Bill as it is presented to us after emergence from the Select Committee. That is the point which makes it difficult for me to make up my mind as to which way I should vote. If the whole Code of Criminal Procedure is before us, I should certainly vote against the motion for postponement; and I believe that it will suit my friend, Mr. Kabir-ud-Din Ahmed, if you give a ruling that the whole Code is before us, because I believe that in that case he and his friends would be free to move any amendments in regard to the Chapters which he has mentioned, about racial distinctions and the separation of the executive and the judicial. If, on the other hand, you confine us to the Bill as it has emerged from the Select Committee, then, as my friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, has said, the case for postponement becomes very strong and probably many non-official Members will vote for postponement. I therefore submit, Sir, that a ruling from you will facilitate matters and give us an opportunity of making up our minds as to which way we should vote, and I appeal to you, Sir, to make up your mind which way your decision is to go before calling upon us to vote one way or the other.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: There are two points, Sir, on which I should like to have information from the Honourable the Home Member before I decide how to vote on this motion for postponement. In the first place, are they going to take objection to amendments which are outside the scope of their Bill? In the second place, are they going to give us an assurance that they are bringing in the Racial Distinctions Bill before this Council comes to an end? If they are going to take objection and take a ruling from the Chair, then it is a vital matter to us to obtain a postponement. But if the Government are going to allow amendments to the Code generally, then I do not see why we should not proceed with the Bill because Honourable Members who have amendments to bring forward will have plenty of time to give notice of those amendments because this Bill is sure to take some days. Then there is, not only this racial distinctions matter which is of vital importance, but another matter which I will mention and of which I have given notice of amendment, namely, the use of fire-arms on crowds, on unlawful assemblies or rioters. That is a matter in regard to which Honourable Members will remember the Council of State passed a Bill on the motion made by the Right Honourable Mr. Srinivasa Sastri. An amending Bill was brought forward in the Council of State and passed with certain amendments. That Bill was produced here for our consideration and notice of amendments was given; but the Government thereupon withdrew the Bill, and I say they withdrew it deliberately, from the consideration of this House. They have not brought it forward. This Bill came up in Simla in September—not the last September but in September before the last—and the Government have not done anything with reference to that Bill. Six months have elapsed and under the rules that Bill ceases to exist, because the Council of State having passed it and this Assembly not having passed it within six months or that date, that Bill has lost its force. Therefore Government has deliberately abandoned a measure which was of vital importance to the country. These are two vital matters on which the country insists on amendments of the existing Code, and if the Government are going to take technical objection to the amendments which I have given notice of on this question of the use of fire-arms, then I say it is a ground on which I will decide for postponement, because the other amendments are not of any use if my amendments are to be ruled out of order. Therefore, Sir, I want an assurance from the Honourable the Home Member on these two points.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I seem to be supplying information this morning, on a large number of points, and I must apologise for occupying so much of the Assembly's time; but on this occasion I rise in reply to a definite request from my friend, Mr. Rangachariar. He asks what attitude Government is going to take in regard to the question whether amendments referring to sections of the Act that are not in the Bill as it appears before the Assembly will be taken up or not. He suggested further in the latter part of his speech that he desired to bring into the discussion certain further additions to our Act, in other words, to introduce, not only amendments to sections of the Act, as at present in force, or amendments to clauses of the Bill standing before the House, but further extensions to our Code as it at present exists. And he asks what attitude is Government going to take on this. I must remind him, that the decisive factor in this matter is not the attitude of Government at all. It is not the question whether I shall take objection to his doing so. It is the question whether you, Sir, as the custodian of the procedure of this House will rule that amendments are in order or out of order. I suggest that the Honourable Member must wait until he places his amendments before the House for a ruling of the Chair on the admissibility of those amendments. He further asks whether we are prepared to place before the House during the present Session the Bill relating to the removal of racial distinctions. I can only say at this stage that we have every hope of doing so. I can fix no date but the House can take it from me that we have every intention and every hope of doing this. Now, Sir, those are the two points on which I rose in order to give information, but I wish to deal for one moment with the implications which he would draw from the information, or from the lack of information I have afforded. He says he will vote for postponement unless my answers on these points are satisfactory; probably from his point they are entirely unsatisfactory, and I gather, therefore, that he is going to vote for postponement. The postponement would suit my convenience and that of my friend, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith. We have, I think, to face 360—or it may be 390—amendments to this Bill. We received the great majority of them on Saturday last, the day before yesterday. We and our devoted draftsmen have been at enormous pressure to consider the effect of these amendments. I should like here and at once, to thank those Members of the House who fell in with the suggestion which we made to them that the amendments should be sent to us a month before the Session. For the rest, the fact is, that we have something like 300 amendments to deal with at very short notice, and it would suit us admirably to gain time to do so. But, Sir, that is not the object of Mr. Rangachariar, and I desire to ask him, for his part, how he is going to gain his particular object by postponing the discussion of the Bill before the House? He says 'I will vote for postponing unless you first of all admit a variety of amendments to which I fancy that you are going to object, or unless you give me a definite pledge that you will place the Racial Distinctions Bill before the House this Session.' If we cannot do that, he will vote for postponing; he may even carry postponement. How is that going to effect his purpose? The Bill as drafted is before the House. He postpones the discussion. If he postpones the discussion until Doomsday, he does not alter its character or put more clauses into it or force us to revise it by bringing new Chapters of the Code under the scope of amendment. All he does is to secure that the Bill lapses, that the great efforts which have been made for a series of years to get our Code into somewhat better shape, the efforts which have been made not only by Member after Member in charge of the Home and Legislative Departments, but by high expert Committees, all these will be thrown away. If it is not clear to him, may I at least make it clear to the House, that by postponing this Bill he will not get more clauses into the Bill, because he cannot; he will not alter its character, because he cannot; and all he will do is to make it certain that the labour which has been bestowed upon this Bill and the trouble which Members of this House themselves have taken in putting forward their numerous amendments will be wasted.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I beg to support the proposal—the simple proposal—that the consideration of the Bill now before the House should be postponed. I do so not upon any controversial or emotional ground. I beg entirely to dissociate myself from the criticisms that have been offered with regard to the findings of Judges, Magistrates and Juries, behind their backs. I say without hesitation that this is not the place where we should hold up judicial decisions and judicial officers and juries to a sort of pillory. It is essential for the good administration of the country that the public should respect our judicial tribunals, but if we are to secure that respect, we, as representatives of the public must set the example. We were not in Court, we did not hear the evidence, we did not hear the arguments and we are not in a position, therefore, to judge definitely that a particular finding is right or a particular finding is wrong. Further, I do not wish to put forward as a reason for supporting this proposal that various controversial sections, now under consideration, have not been included. I do not think that the judgment of this House on this motion ought to be warped by any excitement or emotion over points of that kind. I sustain the proposal to adjourn amendment on the ground of pure common-sense. It is wrong to say, as one Honourable Member remarked, that the whole Code is before the House. It is not.

This is stated to be a Bill further to amend the Criminal Procedure Code of 1898. Therefore we are not now considering a new Code, and the question really involved by this proposal to postpone is whether this House will make these extensive amendments in the existing Code, or whether the time has arrived when, by waiting a little longer, we shall be able to put forward an entirely new Code in substitution for this Code. The present Code has been before the country for a quarter of a century. It has now been strengthened in many cases, and perhaps weakened in others, by judicial interpretation; and it seems to me, with all respect to those who hold a different opinion, that the country can get along very well for a little time longer until the important questions which are now agitating the public mind, but which must be settled as soon as conveniently may be, can be brought in. After all, the Courts have to interpret the laws which we pass, and one very important rule of interpretation for the purpose of arriving at legislative intention is to consider an enactment as a whole. This House, as at present constituted, is in its last Session. Suppose that these amendments are passed, or done away with, or whatever may be the result of considering this Bill, we shall have a certain amount of work done and a certain amount of time spent; and in a very short time a completely new Code, with Chapter 33 and everything else thrown in, will have to come up for the consideration of the next Legislative Assembly. Is it not more correct to say that the time we now spend on this Bill will be wholly wasted? As to the material which has been collected, I do not think, if this Bill lapses, the labour expended in collecting it will be lost; the material will be available when a new Code as a whole comes up for consideration. My simple argument is this, that the present Code is old enough now to carry on for a little bit longer, and that we should not take up the gigantic work of wholesale amendment until we are ready to replace Act V of 1898 by an entirely new Code. On that ground, and on that ground only, I support the proposal that consideration of the Bill to amend should be adjourned.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, my own feeling in the matter is that the House would do well in proceeding with the consideration of this Bill, but there are certain difficulties to which I shall draw the attention of the House if I may. If the Honourable Members will be pleased to refer to a copy of the Bill which is before us, they will see that it says 'an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to criminal procedure,' and then, 'Whereas it is expedient to consolidate and amend the law relating to criminal procedure, it is hereby enacted as follows':

(An Honourable Member: That is not the Bill.)

Munshi Iswar Saran: It was passed by the Council of State. Now if you refer to Act V of 1898, it says: 'Whereas it is expedient to consolidate and amend the law relating to criminal procedure it is hereby enacted as follows:—...'. Now the first question which has been troubling some Honourable Members has also been troubling me. If we are not entitled, as it is quite open to you to rule, to propose any alteration of any of the sections which have not been touched by the measure before us, then I submit Honourable Members will find themselves in a serious difficulty. Then, there is the report of the Racial Distinctions Committee, which is receiving the long and protracted consideration either of the authorities here or of the authorities in England, of course, we do not know which. The matter apparently is so difficult and complicated that even the Honourable the Home Member is not able to give us any definite information; as to when that measure will emerge out of the consideration of these exalted personages we do not know. That being so, the difficulty is this, that you really take up an important Code like the Criminal Procedure Code and begin to alter it and modify it bit by bit. I submit, Sir, the best course would be, to wait and put the whole thing before the House in a complete form. Though as I have already said my own feeling is that we should not postpone the consideration of the measure. Now take another matter to which I should like to draw your attention. Section 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure confers power on certain High Courts to issue directions of the nature of habeas corpus. There you find that only the High Courts of Madras, Calcutta and Bombay have got the right to issue these directions. The High Courts of Allahabad, Patna and the Punjab have not got the right of issuing these directions. Now there are such important matters as have not been touched upon by the measure which we have got before the House now, and I am inclined to think that perhaps it will do no very serious harm if the consideration is postponed till Government is able to make up its mind about these various important and really vital questions. The Honourable the Home Member and indeed some other official Members say 'Oh, there are about 250 or 300 amendments.' It is not at all surprising that there are so many when you take into account the number of sections that there are in the Code and when you further remember the vast area of this country and the very large number of people affected thereby. I submit, Sir, that, taking the totality of circumstances at the present moment into consideration, it may perhaps be wise to postpone its consideration till such time as Government is able to make up its mind about all these various matters so that the alteration or the modification may not proceed bit by bit, but the whole Code may be taken into consideration and may be amended, altered or modified as the case may be. As the last speaker has said, the country has gone on for so many years with this Code and it can well be expected to go on a little longer with it without any very serious harm befalling it.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, I would suggest that we should proceed with the Bill; I do not approve of the motion that it should be postponed. We have done a lot of work in the Select Committee and we may now proceed with the Bill and it will take some time to consider the amendments and embody each of them as may be carried in the Bill that is before the House. Now if the report of the Racial Distinctions Committee is published by the end of this month, and if the Bill is brought before us in February, in the course of this Session, the assent to this Bill by the Governor General may be put off till the end of the Session, and when the other Bill comes before us, we may also consider it in the course of the Session and then in that case we may consolidate it with the amendments we make now. The further Bill may be tacked on to this in this way. By putting off the assent of the Governor General, which is not usually given during the Session, we can consolidate both the Bills into one and we need not lose time and put away this Bill and have nothing to do for a considerable part of the Session.

So, I beg to oppose the motion for postponement and I support the 1 p.m. motion that the Bill be proceeded with.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

'That the consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court fees Act, 1870, be postponed.'

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock.
 * Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S ASSENT TO BILLS.

Mr. Deputy President: I have received a communication from the Private Secretary to His Excellency to the effect that the following Bills have received the assent of His Excellency the Governor General:

The Indian Extradition (Amendment) Act, 1922.

The Indian Museum (Amendment) Act, 1922.

The Negotiable Instruments (Amendment) Act, 1922.

The Court-fees (Amendment) Act, 1922.

The Parsee Marriage and Divorce (Amendment) Act, 1922.

The Official Trustees and Administrator General (Amendment) Act, 1922.

The Police Incitement to Disaffection Act, 1922, and

The Transfer of Ships Restriction (Repealing) Act, 1922.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. Deputy President: The question before the House is:

'That the motion for the consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State, be taken into consideration.'

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I wish to raise a point of order before we proceed with the consideration of the Bill, and it is this. Certain clauses in the Bill as originally introduced have been omitted by the Council of State, and I would request you to give us a ruling whether the clauses that have been omitted by the Council of State are open to amendment by us in this House.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Before you give a ruling, Sir, perhaps I may draw your attention to one point. I have just been looking up May's Parliamentary Procedure on this matter. I do not know if you propose to give a ruling on that now. If you do, I wish to address you.

Mr. Deputy President: I should like to hear you, Mr. Rangachariar.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The stage at which we are is this. In May's Parliamentary Practice on page 380 it is stated thus:

'When the Bill, as amended by the Committee, is considered, the entire Bill is open to consideration and new clauses may be added, and amendments made. According to former usage, the amendments might be wholly irrelevant to the subject-matter of the Bill. This vicious practice was, in 1888, rendered impossible by Standing Order No: 41 which prescribes that no amendment may be proposed to a Bill on consideration which could not have been proposed in Committee without an instruction from the House. The practice of the House as to the admissibility of amendments described in connection with the Committee stage of Bills applies generally to amendments on consideration of a Bill as amended by the Committee.'

Turning back, Sir, to that stage, that is the Committee stage, what can be done in the Committee is stated at page 370. This is what we find:

'An amendment must be coherent, and consistent with the context of the Bill, and when a proposed amendment has been so amended to form an incoherent question, the Chairman stated that if no further amendment was proposed he should proceed with the question which next arose upon the clause. Amendments cannot be moved which are based on Schedules or other provisions, the terms of which have not been placed before the Committee. Amendments are out of order if they are irrelevant to the Bill or beyond its scope; governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived—(we are not concerned with that)—amendments are out of order if they are irrelevant to the Bill or beyond its scope'.

Now the question is whether in the first place, so far as the point raised by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, is concerned, namely, the clauses omitted in the Committee can be restored according to this because it relates to the Bill itself, therefore there is no difficulty about the question which has been raised by Mr. Agnihotri. On that point the provision is clear, because it is the Bill itself. The Committee may have omitted certain clauses, and it is open to this House to restore them, because it is the Bill itself. You amend the Bill; the Bill has been amended by the Select Committee and the House can certainly restore a clause which has been omitted from the Bill by the Select Committee. That question does not in any way present any difficulty. But when we come to the second question as to the new clauses, I shall have to address you.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I am afraid my point has not been properly understood by Mr. Rangachariar. My point was whether where a clause has been omitted by the Council of State, can we take up that original clause here.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Because it was part of the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I shall deal only with the restricted question which has been put by Mr. Agnihotri, namely, whether we can here deal with clauses which have been omitted by the Council of

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

State, and not with the larger question to which Mr. Rangachariar referred. He read first an extract from page 382 of May's Parliamentary Procedure. He claimed that in accordance with Parliamentary Procedure this House could take cognisance of clauses which were in the Bill which was referred to the Select Committee and have been omitted by the Council of State from the original Bill. He bases his contention on this passage:

'When the Bill as amended by the Committee is considered, the entire Bill is open to consideration and new clauses may be added and amendments made.'

He has, I think, forgotten that between the stage at which the Bill was considered by the Committee and the present stage, a further stage has supervened, namely, the Bill has been considered by the Council of State and certain clauses omitted. Now, the Bill before this House is the Bill not as considered by the Committee but the Bill as it has come from the Council of State and I maintain, Sir, that it is impossible for this House in consequence to deal with any of those clauses which having been omitted by the Council of State are not now part of the Bill. I quite admit that, if the Bill had come forward in this Assembly and had been considered by a Committee of this Assembly and certain clauses had been omitted by that Committee, then of course this Assembly might deal with the Bill as it originally came before it, i.e., with the whole Bill; but that is not the case. As I pointed out before, the House has before it the Bill as amended by the Council of State. I put it that this House can deal only with the Bill as it stands before it and it cannot consequently deal with any sections which have been omitted from the original Bill.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I think the Honourable the Home Member has taken a very narrow view of the powers of this Assembly. The two co-ordinate parts of the Legislature have power to deal with every Bill that is put forward by the Government. According to the Honourable the Home Member, if an amendment is made in the Council of State and that amendment is vetoed, this Assembly can do nothing in the matter. Apparently, he would say that once an amendment has been made there, you have no right to consider it. That would be the result of saying that if you omit a clause there, then you cannot consider that clause here. Then it must necessarily follow that if an amendment has been dealt with by the Council of State, we cannot deal with that amendment. Then the elaborate provisions by which differences between the two Chambers are to be settled by a Joint Committee would be useless. Surely, the idea is that, if a matter is before the one House, it is also before the other House, and whatever is before that House can be considered by the other House. There may be certain matters on which there is difference of opinion and when that happens the two Houses will have to consider it together. That implies that everything that is placed before one House must be regarded as being placed before the other House as well.

We will have to deal with the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code as it is and it is our privilege and our duty to deal with the whole matter, and not to confine ourselves to what is said in the copy before us; and the fact that the Council of State has dealt with it in a particular manner can not affect the rights of this House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Would the Honourable Member kindly inform us how we could have printed the Bill except in the form in which it was amended by the other House?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: It is perfectly easy. You could have printed the omitted clauses in italics.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: They would not be before the House nevertheless.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: It is an entirely new claim, Sir, that has been put forward on behalf of the Council of State. If any action by one Chamber was the final word on the subject, the Princes Protection Bill would never have come up before the Council of State and passed in the way in which it was done.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: But the rules provide that.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: I know. But the rules nowhere provide or suggest that, because the Council of State has chosen to throw out certain amendments or certain clauses, this Assembly, which, for this purpose, is its revising Chamber, is precluded from looking at them or saying their say. What happens to the Bi-chameral Scheme?

Sir, I do not quite follow Sir Malcolm when he says that the Bill is not before the Assembly in a form which would warrant its going into the matter. The Bill is in its entire form as introduced before both the Chambers. I do not want to labour that point for the position cannot be gainsaid. We can never forget that no Bill can have any legislative sanction till both the Chambers have either singly or jointly, as the exigencies of the case might require, dealt with it before it goes up to the Governor General. Therefore, I do not think that the proposition that has been put forward by Sir Malcolm will at all be tenable. You will not find corresponding precedents in Parliamentary practice, because the procedure here is entirely all our own. You have no corresponding two Chambers there which to the same extent act as a drag on one another as here and the position ought not to be worsened.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, the question now before the House is, really speaking, a very important one from the point of view of the rights of this House and I would beg you, Sir, to give your most careful consideration before ruling out Mr. Agnihotri's point. In the first place, I will take up what is the principle underlying the questions of amendments. Why should new amendments be not allowed? The only thing that can be said in defence of this point is that perhaps the Government Members or the Non-Official Members may not be quite prepared to meet certain amendments if they are taken by surprise. And therefore since certain Members may not be prepared on those points, it would be quite unfair to put in quite new points that do not concern the matter that is before the House. This can be the only principle of limiting our right of putting amendments to a certain Bill. Now, I submit, Sir, in the case of a clause that has been considered by the Council of State and that has been omitted by that House, are not the Government Members expected to be fully prepared on those points and to have studied them carefully and to be ready to meet amendments about them? There is no reason on earth why they should shrink from it if we want to introduce those points. Therefore, the clauses that have been omitted by the Council of State are before us and there is no reason why we should not be allowed to bring in those clauses again or to move amendments in regard to those sections the clauses about which have been omitted by the Council of State, or I may go one step further, which were originally discussed by the Joint Committee. Really speaking, the way in which this question has been taken up on the Government side by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey is wrong. The larger question of allowing amendments about sections that have not been considered in the Joint Committee Report or in the Bill as passed by the Council of State, the Chair this very morning has been pleased to give a ruling that this question would be decided when specific amendments come before the House and not before then. If as yet we have not decided whether we can or cannot take up amendments about sections that have not been touched either by the Select Committee or by the Council of State, if we do not know the fate of those amendments, how can we decide the narrower question as to whether we can take up clauses that were in the Code originally but have been omitted by the Council of State?

[Bhai Man Singh.]

The other point, Sir, is that this Bill was originally moved in this House as well. My Honourable friend corrects me that originally it was moved in the Council of State and subsequently it was moved in this House also. Therefore it would be a very strange thing that a certain Bill is moved before us and still the House is debarred from discussing those questions simply because the other House has been pleased to omit certain clauses from that Bill. To quote instances, Sir, I remember that in the Income-tax Bill last year, a certain point, i.e., the clause about the insurance of the minors in a joint Hindu family was omitted by us. It was then renewed by the Council of State and again brought before us, and then again we omitted that clause. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "One word in that clause.") The question was not of one word, but of a certain point, whether that point was brought out in half a clause or one clause. The question is that there was a certain point, that was put in a certain form and had been omitted by us. The Council of State discussed that point and put it in. Similarly, certain amendments were made by us in the Finance Bill about post office rates in our first Session. That question was also discussed in the Council of State and amended and then brought forward to this House. I cannot understand why this stringent attitude should be taken up by the Government to debar us from discussing the sections the amendments to which have been omitted by the Council of State.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Sir, I do not think with due respect to the Leader of the House that he has given us a correct view of the real point at issue and of the way in which it should be decided. The point at issue is this. There was the original Bill before the Council of State, the originating Chamber, and in the Bill as originally brought forward by the Government there were amendments to one clause of the Bill or to several clauses of the Bill. The originating Chamber deleted certain amendments and passed the Bill in a certain form and that Bill is now before the House. The question is: Is it open or it not open to this House to propose those amendments which were originally there in the Bill but which were deleted by the Council of State and to insert them in such form as we may like—in the same form or in a modified form? To my mind, the question is hardly open to any serious discussion having regard to the wording of clause (4) of Rule 95, which you will find in the Manual of Business and Procedure at page 32. That clause reads thus:

'The other Chamber may either agree to the Bill as originally passed in the originating Chamber (that is to say, this House which is the 'other Chamber' in this matter may either agree to the Bill as originally passed in the originating Chamber, that is, the Council of State), or as further amended by that Chamber, as the case may be, or may return the Bill with a Message that it insists on an amendment or amendments to which the originating Chamber has disagreed.'

Now, there was an amendment in the original Bill, as introduced in the originating Chamber, which has been deleted by that body. We say that we insist that that amendment shall be inserted in the Bill, and it is quite open to us to do so. I, therefore, submit that the point of order must be decided in favour of the view which has been put forward by my Honourable friends over there.

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa (Burma: Non-European): I would invite your attention to Rule 85 at page 30 of the Manual and would point out to you that the motion, as it is put on the agenda paper, is not in accordance with that rule. The motion on the agenda paper is, 'Further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.' I submit that under that Rule they should not have inserted the words 'as passed by the Council of State' at all. Rule 85 says that 'At any time after copies have been laid on the table, any Member acting on behalf of Government in the case of a Government Bill, or in any other case, any Member may give notice of his intention to move that the Bill be taken into consideration, —the Bill itself—and not the Bill as passed by the Council of State. In any case, there are two points that the Home Member has got to remember. First of all, it is this. This House is entitled also to make amendments to this Bill. Supposing it deletes 15 clauses from this Bill and it goes back to the Council of State, will this House be entitled to ask the Council of State to confine its attention merely to the Bill as it is sent up to that Chamber by this House? The Council of State will insist upon, if it thinks fit, the re-insertion of those clauses which have been deleted by this House. Secondly, and this is what I am more concerned with that if the Honourable the Home Member insists upon putting this narrow interpretation upon the Rules, one thing this House will do, and that is, it will guard itself against any encroachment by the Council of State on any questions of legislation. It will insist, and it will be justified, I submit, in insisting, hereafter that any Bill of such importance as the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Bill shall not be originated in that Chamber, and I beg the Honourable the Home Member to remember that it is hardly worth his while on an occasion like this to create this sort of jealousy between the two Houses. On that ground alone I would ask the Honourable the Home Member to reconsider his position and not create a precedent which may hereafter lead to continuous disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. Deputy President: With regard to the ruling which Mr. Agnihotri desires me to give, I have to say that I rule that it would be in order for Honourable Members to discuss the Bill as originally introduced in the Council of State and to move the necessary amendments.

The usual practice is to leave the Preamble and the long title of the Bill to the end. I will, therefore, put the following question:

"That Clause 1 do stand part of the Bill."

The motion was adopted.

Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural).
 Sir, I move my amendment which runs as follows:

"After clause 1, insert the following clause:

'1-A. For the words and figures 'Act V of 1898' wherever they occur in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, the words and figures 'Act I of 1923' and for the figures '1898', wherever they occur in the said Code, the figures '1923' shall be substituted and all the necessary consequential amendments shall be made'."

The object of my amendment is this. The present Bill is a Bill for overhauling the Code of Criminal Procedure. There was a Code of Criminal Procedure of 1861 which was amended 11 years later in 1872. Then again, the whole Code was overhauled and was enacted in 1882, that is, 10 years later. Thereafter another Act came into force, namely, Act V of 1898, that is, 16 years later, which is the present law. That is going to be amended, and I should say it is being thoroughly overhauled. There is no reason why after a lapse of 25 years the same old name should continue. The labours of many Honourable Members of this House and other gentlemen who are not in this House have resulted in the present discussion and this matter has been going on for nearly 6 years. There is no reason why the old name should be continued. Then, Sir, there is another matter. Section 1 of the Code says 'It shall come into force on the 1st day of July 1898.' If the proposed amendments are made, and I see they are amendments of a very important and vital nature, some time should elapse before the new Act comes into force. If this clause is not amended, then the result would be that the amendments would come into force at once. Sir, for this reason I submit that my formal amendment, if it can be called a formal amendment, should be accepted and I would ask the Government and other Honourable Members of the House to accept my amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, I would deal with Mr. Agarwala's last point first. He says that one of the objects of his amendment is to secure that the amending Bill shall come into operation after some notice. He proposes that the amendments which we are making shall not come into force till the 1st July 1923. If that is his object, he should have proposed an amendment to clause 1 of the Bill, which now stands part of the Bill. In the commencement clause he should have proposed to insert the words 'This Act shall come into force on the 1st July 1923'. In any case the amendment which he suggests will not effect what he desires in any way. I am somewhat at a loss to understand what the effect of the amendment might be. He proposes first of all that the words and figures 'Act V of 1898', wherever they occur in the Code of Criminal Procedure, should be replaced by the words 'Act I of 1923.' Well, Sir, though I share his optimism that this may be the first Act to be passed in 1923, we do not know what number this Act will have. But the words 'Act V of 1898' do not occur anywhere in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898. I do not know what the Honourable Member is referring to. Perhaps he has been looking at an edition of this sort (showing a Volume) having the words printed at the top of every page 'Act V of 1898'. They are not part of the law. Therefore his first point disappears. His second amendment is that for the figures '1898' the figures '1923' be substituted. The object is to alter the title of the Act and, as he says, also to postpone its operation till the 1st July 1923. I do not know what the effect of that will be. Apparently his idea is to leave us without a Code of Criminal Procedure at all from the date this Bill is passed until the Act comes into force in July. The Honourable Member said that in 1898 we started with a new law. We gave the law a new name under a new year. That was quite another matter. In 1898 we consolidated and amended the law. Here we are not consolidating, though we are going to consolidate, I hope, very soon. At the present moment we are merely amending and therefore we cannot alter the title of the law.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is :

‘ That the following amendment be made :

‘ After clause 1, insert the following clause :

‘ 1-A. For the words and figures ‘ Act V of 1898 ’ wherever they occur in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, the words and figures ‘ Act I of 1923 ’ and for the figures ‘ 1898 ’ wherever they occur in the said Code, the figures ‘ 1923 ’ shall be substituted and all the necessary consequential amendments shall be made ’.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 2 do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantalu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I propose :

‘ That in clause 2, sub-clause (ii), for the figures ‘ 192 ’ and ‘ 528 ’, substitute the figures and words ‘ 192 sub-section (1) ’ and ‘ 528 sub-sections (1) and (2) ’, respectively, and insert the figures ‘ 437 ’ after the figures ‘ 436 ’.

The first part of this amendment is a drafting amendment, because the question of subordination in regard to sections 192 and 528 only occurs in regard to sub-section (1) of section 192 and sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 528 and I want these sub-sections to be specified for the sake of accuracy. Then I come to sections 437 and 436. Section 436 relates to the power to order commitments.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: May I suggest that the amendments in regard to sections 436 and 437 be moved separately?

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantalu: I agree to that suggestion. At present I move :

‘ That in clause 2, sub-clause (ii), for the figures ‘ 192 ’ and ‘ 528 ’ the figures and words ‘ 192 sub-section (1) ’ and ‘ 528 sub-sections (1) and (2) ’, respectively, be substituted.’

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, we have no objection to these amendments at all. The intention was to leave little things like this for the consolidation which, as I said just now, we hope will come very soon. But I think Mr. Pantulu has made one error. I think he has overlooked clause 143 of the Bill. Under that clause sub-sections (1), (2) and (3) are re-numbered (2), (3) and (5) and therefore the clauses which deal with subordination would now become (2) and (3) and not (1) and (2). Therefore if Mr. Pantulu will agree to sub-sections (2) and (3) for (1) and (2), I have no hesitation in accepting the amendment on behalf of Government.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantalu: I accept that.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is :

‘ That in clause 2, sub-clause (ii), for the figures ‘ 192 ’ and ‘ 528 ’ the figures and words ‘ 192 sub-section (1) ’ and ‘ 528 sub-sections (2) and (3) ’, respectively, be substituted.’

The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: My next amendment is:

'That after the figures '436' the figures '437' should be inserted.'

436 relates to the power to order commitment: It says that:

'When, on examining the record of any case under section 435 or otherwise, the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate considers that such case is triable exclusively by the Court of Session, and that an accused person has been improperly discharged by the inferior Court, the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate may cause him to be arrested, and may, thereupon, instead of directing a fresh inquiry, order him to be committed for trial upon the matter of which he has been, in the opinion of the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate, improperly discharged.'

The proposed clause, as drafted by Government, empowers the District Magistrate to order the commitment to a Sessions Court of a person who has been tried by an Additional District Magistrate. Section 437 refers to the power to order inquiry in a case in which the accused's complaint is dismissed under section 203 or section 204. If an Additional District Magistrate has dismissed a complaint under either of the sections, the question is whether the District Magistrate should not be empowered to order a further inquiry into the case; and if for the purpose of an order of commitment where a person has been discharged, the District Magistrate should have the power, I think he might also have the power to order a fresh inquiry into a case which has been dismissed. I think that my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has got an amendment to omit section 436. If that is passed by the Assembly, I won't press my amendment in respect to section 437. But if the House retains 436, then I will press, for this; so I request the Chair to allow me to move this amendment after Mr. Rangachariar's amendment has been disposed of. (Cries of "Withdraw.") I have explained my views. If Mr. Rangachariar's amendment is approved by the House, then I shall withdraw my amendment. But if that amendment is not passed, then I shall press mine; and I request the permission of the Chair to put it off till after Mr. Rangachariar's amendment is disposed of.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, perhaps it will simplify matters if I point out that there is a mistake here. Sections 436 and 437 have been changed by the Bill. As Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith knows, the section was 437 in the previous Act; but in the Bill now it is 436. The numbers have been changed.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: That is clause 116 of the Bill.

Bhai Man Singh: My amendment is:

'In clause (2), sub-clause (ii), substitute '437' for '436'.'

Of course the other portion has now been dealt with by the amendment of 435. The first portion is, 'in clause (2), substitute '437' for '436,' and after the word 'subordinate' insert the words 'and for the purposes of sections 435 and 436 inferior.' I would submit that the latter portion should be taken separately in two parts, so they would form two separate questions by themselves; for the present, I will only refer to my amendment for substituting 437, and my plainest reason for that is that in section 436 the word 'subordinate' nowhere occurs.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: May I interrupt the Honourable Member. My friend, Bhai Man Singh, does not seem to have understood Mr. Percival. When we talk about what was 436 or rather what is at the present moment 436 in the Code, I would again invite attention to the fact that it has become 437, and 437 has become 436. If Honourable Members will look at clause 116 of the Bill, they will find that the order of those sections has been changed. That is all. Therefore, the question of 'subordinate' arises in this Bill under section 436. It does not arise at all under section 437.

Bhai Man Singh: I withdraw it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Do I understand that the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith means that 436, as it is now, becomes 437 and 437 becomes 436?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: That is clause 116 of the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Then the only question which remains would be whether even for the purposes of section 436, the Additional District Magistrate's proceedings discharging an accused person should be open to revision by the District Magistrate. I think, Sir, on principle. . .

An Honourable Member: May I ask whether the Honourable Member brings it under section 435 (revision)?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: 437 now, as it is in the present Code and 436 as it would be in the new Code, that is, the power of setting aside an order of discharge. Assuming, that 436 in the Bill means 437 as it is at present, that is, the power of revision of an order of discharge or the dismissal of a complaint, my point is that the District Magistrate should not have the power to set aside an order of discharge made by the Additional District Magistrate. That is the substance. The substance of the amendment now proposed in the Bill is that Additional District Magistrates should be assumed to be subordinate to the District Magistrate for the purpose of his exercising the power of revision which he has under section 437 as it is now and 436 as it is going to be. I do not think it is sound in principle that the Additional District Magistrate's proceedings, judicial proceedings, should be open to revision by the District Magistrate. They are men of equal authority,—and Additional District Magistrates are in this advantageous position that they do not combine in them generally executive functions. They are purely judicial Magistrates, and therefore they are welcome to the country, whereas the District Magistrate is the head of the police and is also mixed up with a number of police and executive matters and consequently have naturally an official bias in reference to judicial matters. Additional District Magistrates are in the fortunate position that they bring to bear upon the discharge of their duties a purely judicial mind; and therefore a proceeding which has been framed by a judicial officer should be subject to revision at the hands of judicial officers, and therefore it would be quite enough if the Sessions Judge has the power to revise the proceedings. If Honourable Members will look at the section, they will find that either the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate may revise the proceedings of Magistrates referred to therein. Therefore, it is not the case that it would be without any revision. The Sessions Judge will revise the proceedings of the District Magistrate. If my proposal is accepted, the District Magistrate will not have the power. Therefore, no harm is done. On the other hand, the Additional District Magistrate is placed on a footing of equality with the District Magistrate, and therefore while it is sound that the District Magistrate should have powers of transfer, which is the proper operation of this clause, it is not equally sound to say that he should have revisionary powers over judicial proceedings made by Additional District Magistrates. The Additional District Magistrate's proceedings should be subject to revision either by the Sessions Judge or by the High Court and not by the District Magistrate.

Therefore, the object of my amendment is not to give this power to the District Magistrate. I hope the Honourable House will agree to my suggestion.

I move, Sir:

'That in clause 2 (ii) the figures '436' be omitted.'

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, on the merits of this amendment I think I may say that the Government has no objection. There seems to be really no serious necessity to make the Additional District Magistrate, for the purposes of section 436 as it now is, subordinate to the District Magistrate. As my friend has pointed out, the Sessions Judge himself has the power of revision and I think that is sufficient.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

'That in clause 2 (ii) omit the figures 436.'

The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I wish to withdraw my amendment by the permission of the House in regard to inserting the figures '487' after the figures '436' in clause 2 (ii).

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Bhai Man Singh: I do not wish to move my amendment:

"In clause (2) (ii), substitute '437' for '436' and '528 sub-section (1)' for '528' and after the word 'subordinate' insert the words 'and for the purposes of sections 435 and 436 inferior'."

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 3 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 4 stand part of the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I move, Sir:

"That for clause 4 the following be substituted:

'In sub-section (2) of section 21 of the said Code, the words from 'declare what...' to the words 'and may' shall be omitted, the word 'the' shall be substituted for the word 'their' and at the end the following words shall be inserted:

'Of the Presidency Magistrates including Additional Chief Presidency Magistrates to the Chief Presidency Magistrate'."

It seems to me quite unnecessary to say that Presidency Magistrates are subordinate to the Chief Presidency Magistrate. It ought to be taken for granted that all Presidency Magistrates are subordinate to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, as all Magistrates in a District are subordinate to the District Magistrate. It is only necessary to define the amount of subordination in which they stand to the Chief Presidency Magistrate. That simply is the object of my amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, in substance sub-section (2) of section 21 of the Code of Criminal Procedure deals with the relations which are to subsist between Presidency Magistrates and the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Now, in clause 8 of the Bill, we have provided for the appointment of an Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate, and therefore it is necessary to provide for the relations which should subsist between the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate and the Chief Presidency Magistrate. The Bill proposes to do it in this manner. Sub-section (2) of section 21, as amended by the Bill, would read:

'The Local Government may for the purposes of this Code declare what Presidency Magistrates, including Additional Chief Presidency Magistrates, are subordinate to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, and may define the extent of their subordination.'

The Honourable Member proposes to substitute for these words the following words:

'The Local Government may for the purposes of this Code define the extent of the subordination of the Presidency Magistrates, including Additional Chief Presidency Magistrates, to the Chief Presidency Magistrate.'

I, Sir, have been pondering very considerably as to what was the object of the Honourable Member's motion. I gather now that the suggestion is that all Presidency Magistrates must be subordinate to the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Well, Sir, we have just been dealing with the relations between the Additional District Magistrate and the District Magistrate. There is a question there in the clause which we have just discussed of the extent of the subordination. But will the amendment moved by the Honourable Member secure that all Presidency Magistrates shall be subordinate to the Chief Presidency Magistrate. If you refer again to the amendment, you will find that it will give the Local Government power to define the extent of their subordination. They may say that that extent is nil and then the Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate and other Presidency Magistrates would not be subordinate to the Chief Presidency Magistrate at all. I would merely add, Sir, that this clause was exactly in its present form in the Bill introduced in the old Legislative Council in 1913. It was not touched at all by Sir George Lowndes' Committee; no one has suggested that any amendment to it was required in all the lengthy opinions that were received when that Bill was circulated for opinion, and it was not touched by the Joint Committee. I venture to suggest, Sir, that it is very undesirable at this stage to make a drafting amendment of this kind, and I hope that my Honourable friend will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: In response to the suggestion made by my Honourable friend I beg to withdraw my motion.

The motion was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 4 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clauses 5, 6 and 7 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 8 stand part of the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, I confess I do not quite understand the amendment proposed to the original section 40 of the Code. The section as it stands seems to be quite clear and intelligible. It says:

'Whenever any person holding an office in the service of Government who has been invested with any powers under this Code throughout any local area is transferred to an equal or higher office of the same nature within a like local area under the same Local Government, he shall, unless the Local Government otherwise directs, or has otherwise directed, continue to exercise the same powers in the local area to which he is so transferred.'

That is quite clear to me. But the amendment says that instead of the word 'transferred' in both places where it occurs, the word 'appointed' shall be substituted and the words 'continue to' shall be omitted and for the words 'to which' the words 'in which' shall be substituted. I will take a very ordinary instance. A Deputy Collector in charge of a division is transferred from one district to another district as Deputy Collector. He was a Magistrate in the old station and when he is transferred out of the district, he continues to exercise those magisterial powers. Where is the advantage of altering the clause by taking away the word 'transferred' and putting in the word 'appointed'? He is simply transferred to a place of a similar nature in the same local area. There is no break in service between his former appointment and his latter appointment. When there is a break and when he is re-appointed, he has to be re-invested with magisterial powers. It is only when a man is transferred from one place to another without a break that his magisterial powers continue and he can exercise them. If that is the idea, where is the necessity for substituting the word 'appointed' for the word 'transferred'? And again take another case. A general duty Deputy Collector is appointed as a Treasury Deputy Collector. The question is whether he continues to be a Magistrate or not. Then take another case in which a Deputy Collector is appointed to exercise the powers of an Assistant Registrar of Co-operative Societies or when he is put on special duty for the acquisition of lands. The question that arises in these cases is whether the Deputy Collector continues to be a Magistrate in the new appointment. The section as it seems to suggest that when an officer who is appointed a Magistrate by virtue of holding a particular office is transferred to another appointment of the same nature, he continues to exercise magisterial powers. That supposes that there is no break in service. It is only a case of transfer from one appointment to another and I do not really see the necessity or even the desirability of substituting the word 'appointed' for the word 'transferred', and then taking away the words 'continue to exercise'. He will only exercise the powers which he already exercised. So, he continues to exercise them. He does not exercise any powers which he has not already exercised. If there is a break in his position as a Magistrate, he cannot exercise any powers unless he is re-invested with those powers by the Government. Therefore it seems to me that the section, as it is, is all right and the amendment is not intelligible to me. I therefore move that clause 8 be omitted.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"That clause 8 be omitted."

Mr Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I think I can explain in a few words the necessity and desirability of this small amendment. It was pointed out about ten years ago by one Local Government and one High Court that they were in some difficulty about gazetetting their officers' powers when they came back from leave. An officer went on leave and during the period of his leave he exercised no criminal powers. He came back automatically to the same district; he was not transferred. Therefore the word 'transferred' in section 40 did not quite cover his case. Well, it is a very small point. I do not know whether the difficulty has arisen in other Provinces, but some Provinces apparently are so extraordinarily conscientious in applying the provisions of the Act, that they proceed again to gazette the whole of the powers of that officer when he comes back from leave. The amendment therefore will relieve their difficulties and also will save a great deal of routine work in the Secretariat and in the Government printing press. Of course if the word 'transferred' is altered to 'appointed', the alteration will cover the transfer when the officer is transferred to another district. If the word 'appointed' is substituted for the word 'transferred', then the other small amendments in the section become necessary. As regards the omission of the words 'continue to', an officer who goes on leave and comes back does not continuously exercise the same powers, because there is an interval during which he exercises no criminal powers at all. In the same way, when an officer is transferred he takes joining time. Therefore the words 'continue to' are not exactly appropriate in these connections. I hope that my Honourable friend has understood this explanation and that he will see his way to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: If it is found necessary to re-appoint an officer on return from leave—that is I believe what you mean—then he is not transferred; but as a matter of fact an officer who goes on leave is not appointed again on return from leave. He simply returns to his appointment.

Mr. Deputy President: I would draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that there is no reply for the mover of an amendment. The amendment moved is that clause 8 be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 8 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, my amendment is:

"After clause 8, insert the following as clause 9:

'9. Section 44 of the said Code shall be omitted'."

Clause 9 of the original Bill, as introduced in the Council of State, was about adding certain other sections to the sections already specified in section 44 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That clause was dropped by the Council of State. I now suggest an amendment, that section 44 should be omitted, and this omission should be put in, in clause 9. My object in putting this amendment is that section 44 put on the public the responsibility to report about the commission or the intended commission of certain offences that are specified in that section. My suggestion is that the members of the public should not be made liable to report excepting those that are particularised under section 45. Certain people who are appointed to do certain duties or are remunerated for doing work or are connected with the Government may be burdened with the responsibility, but other persons who have no connection with the administration under any of the Statutes should not be made liable to make reports about any offences that may happen. It is an intrusion on the rights of the private citizen, and therefore I propose that section 44 of the Criminal Procedure Code should be omitted. Moreover, Sir, it is not only the commission of the offence that one is made liable to report, but even the intention of any other person to commit such an offence.

The intention is very difficult to be known. Even in criminal cases which come before the Courts of law the intention has to be judged from the circumstances appearing in the case, and after the offence has been completed and, here, one is expected to know whether or not any person is really going to commit an offence; this will be very difficult for any man to find. Moreover, if a man were to report about the intention of any other person to commit an offence, he also puts himself under the liability and risk of being prosecuted if the report turns out to be false or, in other words, if the intention of the offender is not proved. He puts himself within the clutches of sections 211 and 182 of the Indian Penal Code. As it is, at any rate, difficult to find out the intention of a person to commit any offence, it is better that this section should be omitted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Agnihotri, Sir, has already availed himself of your recent ruling. He is referring here to a section which was included in the original Bill, but has since been excluded. As I say, he comes within the terms of your ruling. And what use does he make of it? He proposes to omit the whole of section 44, a section which has always been part of our law. It lays on the public certain obligations in regard to the reporting of serious crime. I am not aware that in any of the discussions that have taken place regarding the Bill or its amendments, any public association or any public body, or indeed any individual, has protested against this obligation, and it has been left to Mr. Agnihotri to find it unduly burdensome. Remember that he does not attempt to discriminate between the various offences in regard to which there is an obligation on the public to report. With a fine gesture he would sweep them all away. That is to say, that if Mr. Agnihotri sees himself an act of the kind referred to in section 121, namely, the waging of war, then he would not consider it his duty to report it to the authorities. Much more terrible than this, if Mr. Agnihotri sees anybody committing the nefarious offence, an offence almost beyond the benefit of clergy, of assaulting the Governor General, he would not think that it was his duty to tell the nearest policeman. But I will not pursue the list of these offences. The ordinary man, I think, is willing to co-operate with the State in the protection of the public peace. Mr. Agnihotri said that this statutory obligation is an invasion of the rights of the public. Has he forgotten that rights also connote responsibility, and that every member of the public has also a duty towards other members of the public in the State at large? (Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: 'Certainly.') I am glad that he admits so much. Then he goes on to argue that the provision is an additionally difficult one because it refers also to the obligation to report to authority if one knows of the intention to commit an offence. That may add to the difficulty of the provision, but he does not propose to do away with this particular prescription of the section; he proposes to do away with the section as a whole, and that proposal will, I think, appear entirely objectionable to the House.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I have listened with some interest to the reply given by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey to the proposal made by my friend Mr. Agnihotri regarding the doing away with section 44. In my opinion, Sir, section 44 and section 45 to a great extent overlap each other. I do not think that section 44 would be necessary if a little modification were made in section 45 to cover the difficulty pointed out by the Honourable the Home Member. For instance, if the words "village headman, village accountant, etc.," appearing in section 45 were removed and the words "every person" introduced in that section, and sections 121, 121A, 122, 123, 124, 124A, 125, 126, and 130 were introduced in clause (c) of section 45, I think to all intents and purposes section 45 would do by itself and then section 44 would not be needed. I commend the modification I suggest to the Honourable the Home Member.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I now move that section 124A be deleted from section 44. The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out that it is the duty of every member of the public to assist and make a report to the police about the occurrence of any offence. I quite see the point, but it is only a moral duty and not a legal duty and my object in moving the amendment was that there should be no such legal duty. As that amendment has failed I now move that 124A be deleted from this section. If we refer to section 124A we find that that is a section meant for the offence of sedition. It is not possible for a man, at least an ordinary man, a lay man in the public, to know whether a speech delivered by any person is seditious or not. It is a very difficult point even for Courts of law to decide whether or not a speech comes within the purview of section 124A. Under this section it is also made compulsory and obligatory on the ordinary public to report whenever there is known any intention of any man to commit any specified offence. I would say that it is very difficult, nay even impossible, for a man to judge whether or not a speech delivered, or that is about to be delivered, will come within the purview of the definition of sedition in section 124A, and therefore section 124A should be omitted. Moreover, it is not such an emergent and important offence that it should be immediately reported or be included in this section.

Mr. Deputy President: May I point but to the Honourable Member that he has omitted to move his amendment?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: With these words, therefore, Sir, I move my amendment, viz.,

'Insert the following as clause 9:

'9. (a) In sub-section (1) of section 44 of the said Code omit the figures and letter '124-A'.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Agnihotri has come down from his original requirements. He started by refusing wholly to admit the legal obligation of the ordinary citizen to assist authority by reporting offences. Defeated on that issue, he now argues that the ordinary citizen should not be bound to report a case falling under section 124A, namely sedition; but he bases his arguments on somewhat curious grounds. He claims that 124A is a difficult section; the ordinary man cannot know when the matter is seditious and is likely to cause disaffection; that even the Courts have very great difficulty in deciding that point. But he has clearly forgotten the terms of the section itself. It refers to every person, who is aware of the commission or the intention, etc. A person therefore would not fall within the scope of the section now under discussion unless he was first aware that this offence of which he had cognizance was one under 124A. Again if Mr. Agnihotri will turn to section 176 of the Indian Penal Code, he will see the exact prescription of law under which a man can be punished for omission to comply with his duties under this section of the Criminal Procedure Code. I read it to the House:

'Whoever being legally bound to give any notice or furnish information on any subject to any public servant as such intentionally omits to give such notice.'

It is perfectly clear then that he would not come within the scope of this section unless he was aware first of all of the nature of the offence and intentionally omitted to give information on the subject. Now I claim that it is just as important that the ordinary member of the public should recognise his responsibilities in the matter of sedition as in regard to other matters. There are people who may object to the way in which section 124A has on occasions been applied, but even they I think would admit with me that the section, having as wide a scope as it has, does embrace also very serious and highly criminal offences against the State. If that is so, then the ordinary member of the public ought to be under an obligation to report such offences to authority.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 9 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 10 stand part of the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to withdraw my second amendment, Sir, namely:

'In clause 10 (i) (a) insert the following at the beginning:

'After the word "occupier" where it occurs for the second time the words "in charge of management of that land" shall be inserted and in clause 10, sub-clause (ii), omit all words after the word "inserted", i.e., omit the words commencing from "and" to the words "other law".'

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, we have now dealt with section 44 on Mr. Agnihotri's amendment. Section 44 lays down upon every person, that is casting a duty upon every citizen, to inform the authority of the commission, or of the attempt to commit, an offence. Section 45 deals with a different class of cases, namely, persons who occupy the position of servants of the State. That is the main object of section 45. That is, every village headman, village accountant, village watchman, village police officer, those are the class of persons who are first dealt with and you will also notice one other person is included in that class who ought not to be included, namely, the landowner or occupier of land and the agent of the owner of any land. He is classed on the same footing as the village headman, village accountant, village watchman and village police officer. Why on earth the owner of land in this country should be classed in a different category from any other citizen I am unable to see. There was a time perhaps when the British hold on the country was not so strong as it is to-day. The villages are now in the grip of the State. You have got an army of officials moving about, you have got your officers in every village, you have got the excise department, you have got the postal department, you have got the various other departments which are now ramifying the whole country. Why the landowner and the occupier of land? Mind you, not even the occupier and owner of houses. It has been held that the house owners do not come under the definition of landowners. House owners are free. They need not give any information. They are not classed on the same footing as the village headman, village accountant, village watchman and village policeman, but somehow or other it seems to be a venerable superstition attaching to the British Government that the landowner should come more under the grip of the Government than any other citizen. I know the landowner has to suffer a lot in this country. If any cess comes, 'Oh go on the land'. Education cess—'Go on the land'. Sanitation cess, district board cess—'Go on the land'. That is no doubt the burden he has to bear. But why should he be saddled with this? I could understand it if he had any special privileges, at least exemption from the Arms Act. If the landowner and the occupier of land is told 'Well, I exempt you from the Arms rules; you may bear arms and be a good citizen in the interests of the Government', I can understand this obligation on the owner of land. Now, there are persons who make crores and crores of rupees in trade and commerce. The landowners are only as much citizens of the country as these commercial and mercantile people and traders, and school masters—and what about other people? Why should they all be exempt and why should this poor landowner—he may be a zemindar, he may be a Maharaja, he may be a poor ryot—all of them are placed on the same footing, and you say "very well, you do the village watchman's work". I know the history of this. We had village communities. In those days, when village communities had control of villages and of the surrounding forests, when they could dispose of the communal lands for communal purposes, when we had the disposal of the village affairs in our hands, I can understand placing the burden on the landowners. But now you have got quite beyond that state of affairs. If you allow your cattle to graze, your cattle are taken and you are prosecuted. What is the privilege that landowners enjoy that they should be made to do this police duty for the Government? I resent it. Now, Sir, the ryotwari settlement has undone most of the ancient privileges attaching to the ancient village communities. You did wrong thereby. The village communities used to do a lot of work and enjoyed privileges; they saw to village medical relief, village sanitation and other things. Now, what have you done? You have parcelled the land out by survey—"here are your limits, you shall not go beyond those limits and you have no voice over communal matters. You have no voice over communal benefits at all". He may be the owner of half an acre of land. There are hundreds and hundreds of these villagers. If he is merely the owner of a house in a village, he is not made liable but it is only the owner of land that is made liable in this section. I say, Sir, this is an anachronism. I say it is a reflection cast on the landowner that this invidious distinction should be conferred upon the landowner to-day whereas other people are not subject to this burden.

[Bao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

By all means let the village headman, village accountant, village watchman, village police officer or any other person who receives salary—let him be made liable. Why should the landowner be made liable? I therefore move that these words which occur in this section 45 should be omitted. He is quite prepared to share the responsibility, as every other citizen, which section 44 impose upon every citizen. I move the amendment* as it stands in my name.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved.

* In clause 10 (i) (a) before the word 'for' insert the following: 'the words 'owner or occupier of land and the agent of any such owner or occupier' shall be omitted and '."

Mr. P. E. Percival: My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has put forward a humble motion, as it appears; but, as a matter of fact, it strikes at the root of whole rural administration in India. For years, landowners have been responsible equally with village officers and village servants. It seems to me that the Honourable Member is himself weakening the power of the landowner and of the village authorities, because where they have certain rights they have also certain duties, and this is one of the chief duties that the landowners always perform. It is nothing new. It was in the Code of 1872, in the Code of 1882, and in the Code of 1898. It has been there all through. There have been several Committees: Sir George Lowndes's Committee, the Select Committee, etc., and this question was not then raised. My Honourable friend brings it up as a new proposal at the last moment.—a matter of very great importance which will affect the whole administration of the country. I desire to point out that the Honourable Member refers to the ryotwari parts of the country. We have however to remember that the country is not all ryotwari. For instance, take the case of Sindh, of which I have some experience. They are all zemindars there and big landowners, and such landowners have very important duties in connection with the administration of justice and police administration; and I suppose it is very much the same in other parts of northern India. So you cannot entirely judge from southern India what is best in parts like Sindh or the northern portion of India, where the zemindars are very important personages and have not by any means lost either their rights or duties in connection with the administration of the country. I would also just like to point out, in regard to village officers, that, although the duty is cast on them, very often the village officer is about 6 miles away from where an offence is committed. Some of the villages in the southern part of the Bombay Presidency are very large, and offences are committed 6 or 7 miles away from where a village officer lives. In cases like that you cannot possibly have the matter brought to notice by the village headman or the village policeman or anyone else. Again the village policemen work very much under the orders of the zemindar, and it is strange that a village servant getting Rs. 10 a month should be taxed with an offence, while a big zemindar paying Rs. 10,000, or a smaller zemindar paying Rs. 1,000, should go scot-free. I submit that this is a subject of very great importance. It has never been proposed by any of these Committees up to this moment, and is brought forward at the last moment by my Honourable friend. The Honourable the Home Member has dealt with section 44, and section 45 is of a similar nature; and I suggest that the amendment should not be accepted by the House.

* In clause 10 (i) (a) before word 'for' insert the following: 'the words 'owner or occupier of land and the agent of any such owner or occupier' shall be omitted and '."

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I dissociate myself from some of the remarks, which the Honourable Mover of this amendment had the courage to make, meaning thereby, that the landowners and their agents should be on par with those compared with tradesmen or commercial people. While dissociating myself from these remarks, I am yet in favour of the motion, that is, the amendment. I think there is great force in it. According to section 44, which has already been passed, every person is responsible. Then, why is this additional responsibility thrust upon the shoulders of landowners? There is no justification for it. There is great force in the fact that a landowner who is quite an ignorant man—perhaps he does not know at all whether any undesirable person lives in that village or stays on the land, which is owned by him—is being held responsible for not giving this sort of information. To my mind, this duty, which is considered by some of my Honourable friends to be a kind of power, is a very onerous duty, and this imposition of duty, to my mind, seems to be misplaced. Therefore I am in favour of this amendment and I appeal to this House that this amendment may be carried.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am sorry that Dr. Nand Lal, with whom I thought myself in the fortunate position of being in agreement, has announced that though he disagrees entirely with Mr. Rangachariar's reasons, he nevertheless accepts his conclusions. I am more logical for I differ both from his reasons and from his conclusions. I do not look at this section merely as an instance in which the landowner is singled out from his fellow-men and placed in the same category as a village officer. Let us look at it as a purely practical question. The reporting of offences is easy enough in towns. The police are near at hand; the person affected by a crime can as a rule speedily convey information to them; failing him somebody else is almost certain to do so. But in the villages where the police are not close at hand, where for the most part we have no responsible representative of law and order, where often such representative, if he exists at all, is only an ignorant village menial, it is, as I think everybody will admit, essential that some means should be provided of giving early information of crime? Obviously we can only effect this by placing responsibility on responsible persons resident in the village. That responsibility, as Mr. Percival has pointed out has always lain, has never been resented and has never been objected to.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: By the dumb millions.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is objected to for the first time by Mr. Rangachariar. There are many landowners in the Council of State; it is curious that this provision of the law was not objected to when the Bill came before it. We have many landowners here. No other landlord has entered any amendment objecting to this obligation. As a whole, landowners in this country, I think, value their position, value their responsibility, and are prepared to discharge this obligation. I shall give another reason why this obligation should be laid on them. Taking the country at large, it is the landowners in the villages who have most to suffer from a breakdown of law and order. It is the landowner as a rule who is first hit by dacoity or disorder involving crime. It is on these double grounds that the obligation has always lain on the landowner. It is not an unduly onerous one; it is long-standing; it is perfectly justifiable to maintain it.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I wish to say a few words to clear up what seems to me to be the underlying [Mr. J. N. Mukherjee.] principle of my friend, Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. This section 45, Criminal Procedure Code, Sir, it seems was framed at a time when, as has been pointed out to some extent by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, the owners of land used to remain on their estates or on their lands. Circumstances, however, have changed considerably since then. The big cities are drawing away the landowners from their estates and under existing circumstances they are not likely to know all that happens on their lands, which they might know at a time when they used to reside on their estates. Now, instances are not unknown where landowners see things that may have taken place in their villages. Such cases have been ventilated in the newspapers, of which they have had no information. Therefore the section as it stands now is unduly extensive in its operation, as the landowner even if he is not in his village or on his land or estate, may be brought within the purview of section 45, quite unwarrantably. Under this sweeping section, any landowner,—not occupier—may be brought within its purview and operation for no fault of his own. It seems to me a very important point for consideration whether, in view of the fact that circumstances in India have changed considerably since these sections were enacted, and, inasmuch as ordinarily speaking, the owner of a large tract of land is not supposed to know what is going on in the locality in question, he should not be excluded from the operation of section 45. An obligation having been laid upon him, by section 45, to obtain information, he breaks the law if he does not obtain the information contemplated by the section. Nobody ought to say that the landlord should obtain the information contemplated by the section for the Government. He is however put within the four corners of section 45 of the Criminal Procedure Code for failing to obtain information, which a Magistrate might think he might obtain and under section 176 of the Indian Penal Code, he becomes punishable. Therefore, Sir, it seems that there is a great deal in the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. The present is a time of absentee landlords. That is true not only in India, but, it will be admitted, in other civilized countries, as well. We cannot tie up the landowners with their lands in the way in which section 45 proposes to tie them up. I therefore, Sir, beg to support my friend's amendment.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, I also rise to support the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. The law as it stands is undoubtedly very defective, and the highest Courts also have thought it very stringent, and they have tried to loosen it by what may be called, legal fiction. May I just read out an extract from one of the rulings:

"No doubt the words 'at or near such village' are not added but they must be evidently intended because the duty imposed of giving the information, etc., is intended to apply only when such occurrences take place at or near the villages".

A person is bound to give information if he owns land but residence in a house/a village does not come within the meaning of this section. Now, Sir, really speaking, it is a very stringent duty placed upon every occupier of land; the Honourable Judges have tried to confine that duty to the rear vicinity of the village where his land is situated. Really speaking the opinion of the Judges of the High Court too is against the spirit of this section. If, Sir, we read the section itself, we see how vast this duty is. Under the section it is imposed upon the occupiers of land, etc., to give information as to the permanent or temporary residence of any notorious receiver of stolen goods, etc., also of the commission, or intention to commit, a non-bailable offence. Now, Sir, if you look into the list of non-bailable offences under the Criminal Procedure Code, one would be simply surprised to see how anybody can take this onerous duty of giving information of the commission or the intention to commit any such offences. Similarly, Sir, you will see that, as my Honourable friend remarks, there is no reason why such onerous duty should be placed on independent land-owners; why this differentiation and this imposition of duty on the zamindars. With all due deference to my learned friend, Dr. Nand Lal, why should there be any distinction between an occupier of land and any other citizen following any other profession in life.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, I rise to oppose this amendment. I submit, with great respect for the opinions of those who have supported it, that these provisions of the Code have been mis-called a burden and a restriction. They involve a most important principle. They are in a way an aid to the growth and development of a public opinion against crime because it is crime, which, in the circumstances of India, is a most valuable asset. Speaking from a forensic and judicial experience, now extending over 42 years, I can go back to a time when unfortunately it could be said of this country that the public opinion against crime, as crime, was a weakling,—was not what it should be. If an offence was committed in a village, the general attitude of the village people towards it was that it was a matter between the accused, the police and the Government. It had nothing to do with them. When a respectable witness saw an offence being committed, his general procedure was to get out of the way as soon as possible so as to avoid having to give evidence in a Court of justice and elude trouble by the investigating police. That state of affairs is passing away. A strong public opinion against crime, as crime, is growing up, and my submission is that, far from these provisions being regarded as restrictions and a burden, they should be looked upon as a recognition of the honourable duty of all good citizens. It will be seen from section 45 that the burden which the onus of proof laid down in section 44 placed upon the people covered by it, is not included. All that the section wants is that, if any owner or occupier of land and the other people mentioned, have information, they shall give that information. Where is the burden? Where does the restriction come in? Surely, Sir, any Member of this House, who saw one of these serious offences being committed would feel it to be his duty, regardless of any provision of law, to go to the nearest police station, or whatever was the proper authority, to complain about it. Surely every Member is interested in the maintenance of order and obedience to law. If any of us saw one of these serious offences being committed before our eyes, or if we got anything like reliable knowledge of them, surely, if we had a proper feeling of citizenship and public opinion, we should be impelled, regardless of these provisions, to go and see that justice was done. That is all that this section provides. I think, the House should look at it in that way, remembering that in all the decades that this law has been in force there has not been a single case of the poor unfortunate owner of half an acre being dragged up for not reporting an offence. If the practice of this section is borne in mind, it will be seen that it would be a retrograde course to remove it now. We should invite people to help justice, to come forward with any information that they may receive of the commission of an offence. They should regard it as a privilege and the duty of citizenship to come forward and give information, and not look upon such assistance as either a restriction or a burden. With these few remarks, I venture to oppose the amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I wish to refer briefly to one or two remarks that fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Mukherjee. If I understood him rightly, he seemed to suggest that this obligation which is laid on the landlord was very suitable when this provision was enacted, but times have changed. This is the day of the big absentee landlord. How can you make him responsible? Well, in the first place I join issue with him in his statement that times have changed. In Northern India at all events there are innumerable petty holders of land who live on their land. This section does lay an obligation on them, an obligation which they can very easily fulfil. But apart from that, if there is a big absentee landlord, I do not find any obligation laid on him at all. In the first place he has got to be aware of the commission of an offence. If he is not there, he is obviously not aware of it. Secondly I would remind the House of what the Honourable the Home Member said when discussing section 44, viz., that a penalty only arises in cases where there is an intentional omission to report. Here it is exactly the same as in the case of section 44. It was suggested too by my Honourable friend that this provision puts a weapon of oppression and vindictiveness into the hands of the police. Well, that may be so, but if we are going to cut out from the Code of Criminal Procedure every provision that enables the dishonest policeman to attempt to make a little money, I am afraid there will be very little of the Code left on the Statute Book.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, may I be permitted to draw attention to the difference in language between sections 44 and 45 and also in the classes of offences covered by each section. Section 44 applies to a person 'if he is aware' of an offence. Section 45 applies to certain classes of persons 'who may obtain information' respecting certain other classes of offences. What is now attempted by the proposed amendment is to extend the scope of section 45 by introducing the word 'possess' in addition to the existing word 'obtain'. I do not know whether sufficient attention has been drawn to this matter. There is another matter to think about. Is this one of the matters with regard to which your ruling was necessary when we started the discussion? The Government amendment is for the purpose of changing the situation by adding to the word 'obtain' the word 'possess' because of certain Madras 'decision.' The amendment now before us touches the whole of the scope of the section, by deleting certain persons and classes of persons now within the purview of the section. I do not know how your ruling will go with regard to that. If the amendment is admissible, as it undoubtedly is, the word 'obtain' should stand out and the better and more comprehensive word 'possess' should be introduced. There is no amendment in that way.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We understood, Sir, that we were subsequently to discuss Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment regarding the words 'possess or obtain'; and that we were at present to discuss Mr. Rangachariar's amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Both these amendments cover what I am referring to. The existence of the word 'obtain' in section 44 does appear to be strongly objectionable from the point of view of Mr. Rangachariar, because a person has obligations cast upon him even if he is not aware of certain things and the objection would largely disappear if he is not obliged to have to 'obtain' information because he happens to have land. As Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has pointed out, this section has a long history behind it. When the zemindary system became a part of the original organisation for British Indian administration in certain parts of the country, certain duties were cast on zamindars in connection with policing, postal and road making arrangements and the section came in its present shape. The village chaukidar was entirely under the zemindar and the zemindar, as owner of the land as well as head of village organisation, was a powerful individual without whose assistance detection and prevention of crime would be, if not impossible, certainly difficult. Mr. J. N. Mukherjee has referred to the latter-day absentee landlord and his woes. He had much sympathy wasted on him. He has no business to absent himself. When police duties have been otherwise dealt with, is it right that the landowner as such should be continued to be charged with obligations otherwise than an ordinary citizen. We have heard about police abuse. There is zemindar abuse also. This provision has been sometimes a powerful weapon in the hands of landowners who want to abuse it, by lodging information against unoffending but disagreeable neighbours, with regard to whom even the police would be normally powerless. There are therefore two sides to the question, and one cannot say that the landlord has not sometimes availed himself of this, to the detriment of his enemies. There is a well known story in Bengal about a powerful zemindar who had a weak neighbour in whose zemindary there was a murder. The neighbour in question disowned the zemindary to get rid of the immediate police trouble and the powerful man knowingly came in and said 'This is my zemindary and I will take the responsibility about the crime and will find out.' He thus laid the foundation of a title which secured him that zemindary ultimately. But these are abuses that need trouble us for the present, for things have changed considerably. We are interested in bringing sections 44 and 45 in a line and whatever citizen obligations there are should be of the same stamp and kind. If we later on agree that the word 'obtain' shall stand out, the objection that has been sought to be pressed home against section 44 by Mr. Rangachariar will stand.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam: Nominated Official): Sir, I think the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar and possibly the last speaker have supported this amendment under the impression that landowners and occupiers of land have been asked to discharge duties for which there is fully competent machinery. The section as it stands is rather formidable. If the village headman, the village police officer, the village accountant and the village watchman are all bound to report offences, why should we trouble the landlords and raiyat to report? But as a matter of fact this high-sounding staff in real life comes down to very little. I have to mention that in the province of Bengal there are no village accountants, there are no village headman and the village watchman and the village police officer are the one humble individual, the village chaukidar. Everyone knows the village chaukidar occupies a humble position. Everyone knows he is not a wealthy man. Everyone knows he is a simple man. It is not obvious that supposing that an offence has been committed by an influential person in the village, the village chaukidar will have very strong inducements to say nothing in regard to that offence? Apart from this, the village chaukidar is not an ubiquitous person. Supposing a raiyat finds a corpse lying on his land. The chaukidar may know nothing about it. If this duty of reporting were not imposed upon the raiyat, the body would be left lying in the jungle. There may be presumptive evidence of murder, and yet, if this duty were removed, there will be no means by which the information can be brought to the notice of the authorities. Apart from this, Sir, as has been already pointed out, the law has been in force for very many years. The Bill has been under consideration for at least six years, and, as far as I am aware, amongst the immense mass of authority consulted, not a single person, not a single body has complained of these duties or responsibilities, which have been laid upon them. Now, Sir, I submit that the one thing that a legislative body should not do is to legislate a priori. In certain circumstances we have to act to some extent on a priori knowledge. We have no experience here. We are dealing with an Act of very long standing, an Act that is not occasionally brought into use but is being used every day, almost every hour, and we are proposing to alter it, without a request from any outside authority.

For this reason I venture to ask the House to turn down this proposal.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I rise, Sir, naturally with the diffidence of one who is a lay man and not a lawyer and therefore perhaps not quite competent to deal with a subject that seems to be rightly the monopoly of lawyers. However, I rise at the same time with the confidence, if I may say so, of a citizen who claims his rights and at the same time recognises his responsibilities. Now, what is the issue before us? Mr. Rangachariar has moved an amendment to the effect that the responsibility that has hitherto devolved on the landowner or the occupier of land should now be removed from his shoulders and that the task of finding out is criminal or an would-be offender should be left entirely to those who are in authority. Mr. Rangachariar has made it a grievance, on behalf of the landowners themselves that they should be saddled with this responsibility. I have been at pains, Sir, to find out whether there is any grievance on the part of the landowners. If at all there is a grievance, it may be on the part of those who might fall victims to the devices of dishonest landowners who might make use of these powers vested in them to put others to trouble. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: 'There is no power.') Well, there is no doubt that this responsibility carries with it a certain amount of privilege. You can go to the villager and say to him 'Look here, if you don't do this I am going to inform the authorities. I am called upon by my position here to go and inform the authorities and I shall give information against you.' If at all, it seems to be a privilege in favour of the landowner as against a villager. However, I have been at pains to think very carefully over this matter, and I feel from the point of view of the future to which we aspire at any rate, that it would be the proper thing to do to keep the clause as it is. For this reason, Mr. Rangachariar has, of course, tried to paint the picture of the ideal village community that we had in the past. I entirely agree with him on that point, that we had a wonderful system of village communities, the system of village panchayats, which, unfortunately, is now practically ruined. As one who wishes that this system should be restored at an early date, as one who is desirous of seeing this transitional stage go through very rapidly, and as one who wishes that self-government should be established in this country, I hesitate to deny the responsibilities that must come as a result of the achievement of freedom. Suppose you have self-government. You cannot then afford to have in every village a large number of chaukidars and a large number of officers who will, if they are left without assistance from certain sections of responsible people in the villages, find out criminals and offenders. You may have self-government, but you will not be able to remove crime altogether from this country; you will not be able to remove offences altogether from this country, and you cannot afford to engage officers,—all of us who are anxious about retrenchment—we cannot afford to engage the services of officers and chaukidars even to the extent to which we now have to engage. Well, in that case on whose shoulders will the responsibility fall? If we want freedom, the responsible section among us should be prepared to face the responsibility that freedom necessarily brings with it, and therefore I feel that landowners being a section which has got a stake in the villages, which has got a certain amount of responsibility in the villages and which is considered to be a sensible and educated section in the villages ought to be prepared to take this responsibility of assisting the authorities in finding out criminals and offenders. They will thus secure the safety of the village and assist in keeping crime and offence far away from the village without throwing the burden of maintaining an efficient police and officers on the villagers themselves. I suppose, therefore, if we are aiming at self-government—at the restoration of village communities—it should be also our desire to see to it that those who hold a responsible position in the village, for instance, the landowners, should be prepared to bear responsibilities as citizens of the village.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadian Rural): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, 16th January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.

Secretary of the Assembly: I have to inform the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. President.

Mr. Deputy President then took the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

BIHAR AND ORISSA PROVINCE.

43. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the Despatch of Lord Hardinge about the formation of the Bihar and Orissa Province in 1911?

(b) Is the Government aware that Orissa had no affinity to Bihar and was attached to Bihar to offer an opening to the Province because Orissa had considerable facilities for sea ports.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Government of India are acquainted with the despatch of Lord Hardinge's Government, dated the 25th August 1911. They are aware that in that despatch it was stated that it was believed that the junction of Orissa with Bihar would be welcome to Bihar as presenting a sea board to that province.

RAILWAYS AND PORTS IN BIHAR AND ORISSA.

44. Mr. B. N. Misra: Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the Report of the Director of Industries, Bihar and Orissa, regarding his observations:

(a) to extend the Amala-Jamda Railway line to further South;

(b) to open a port at False Point in the Cuttack District;

(c) and to join the said port to Cuttack by a railway line to facilitate trade in coal, iron and other products of Central India, Orissa and her Feudatory States?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Yes.

PORTS ON ORISSA COAST

45. Mr. B. N. Misra: (a) Has the Government made any enquiries regarding the suitability or otherwise of opening a port at False Point or at any other place on the Orissa Coast?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table of this House the result of such enquiries?

(c) If not, does the Government propose to make enquiries and take steps to open a port at False Point or at any other place on the Orissa Coast?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Devolution Rules distinguish between Major Ports which are the concern of the Government of India and Minor Ports which are controlled by Provincial Governments. There is at present no port in Bihar and Orissa of sufficient importance to be notified as a Major Port and any steps therefore which are to be taken to develop the ports in that Province must be taken by the Local Government and not by the Government of India.

Mr. Braja Sundar Das: Has the Government received the report of Mr. Arkwright who was deputed by the Local Government as a port expert to express his views on the opening of a port at False Point or any other place on the Orissa coasts?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I cannot say offhand whether any copy of the report has been furnished to the Government of India, but as I have said, if such report has been made, it is for the Local Government to consider it in the first instance.

ASSISTANT INCOME-TAX OFFICERS, UNITED PROVINCES.

46. Haji Wajihuddin: Will the Government be pleased to state how many Assistant Income-tax Officers were selected by the Selection Board, United Provinces and how many were nominated directly by the Local Government in the United Provinces during the year 1921-22 and how many of them belong to each community—Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs and Christians?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Nine Assistant income-tax officers were selected by the selection committee and appointed by the Government. Nine direct appointments were also made by the Government. They comprised

Muhammadans	7
Indian Christian	1
Anglo-Indian	1

ASSISTANT INCOME-TAX COMMISSIONERS, UNITED PROVINCES.

47. Haji Wajihuddin: How many Assistant Income-tax Commissioners, according to the scheme published in 1921 were to be appointed in the United Provinces and have all of them duly been appointed, and to which community do they belong? If all the appointments have not been made why are some of them lying vacant and when are they likely to be filled up?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Four posts of Assistant Commissioner were sanctioned by the Secretary of State. There are at present two vacancies. It is hoped to make a third appointment shortly. The fourth post will remain vacant as it is not required at present. The two Assistant Commissioners appointed are Hindus.

EXAMINATION OF ASSISTANT INCOME-TAX OFFICERS, UNITED PROVINCES.

48. Haji Wajihuddin: When and under whose control was the first examination of Assistant Income-tax Officers in the United Provinces held and with what result?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The first departmental examination was held in October 1921 under the control of the United Provinces Central Examination Committee. I lay a copy of the result on the table.

EXAMINATION OF ASSISTANT INCOME-TAX OFFICERS

49. Haji Wajihuddin: (a) When and under whose control did the second examination of Assistant Income-tax Officers in the United Provinces take place and how were the successful candidates of each community disposed off?

(b) Is it true that one of the successful candidates was declared (by a responsible officer) to be appointed to Dehra Dun before the result of the examination was out?

(c) To what extent is it true that after the second examination was over, one of the high officers of the Income-tax Department, United Provinces, in contemplation of his being appointed the head of the Department under the Income-tax Act of April, 1922, collected all the young officers before him and said, "Mind that I shall be all in all from April next and that you people having no other opening like Deputy Collectors must be very careful" and that he lectured to certain Mohammedan officers individually that they would make good executive officers instead of entering into the Income-tax Department which was meant for the Hindus, especially "Vaishes"?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The second departmental examination was held in March 1922 under the control of the United Provinces Central Examination Committee. A copy of the result is laid on the table.

(b) The officer in question was transferred to Dehra Dun as assistant income-tax officer, a position which he held at Cawnpore prior to the examination and, when the result of the examination has been declared, was appointed by the Local Government to be income-tax officer.

(c) No such language as that described in the question was used.

ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER, INCOME-TAX, MEERUT.

50. Haji Wajihuddin: Is it a fact that a civilian was appointed to the post of an Assistant Commissioner in December, 1921 who was called back after a short time, that no one has been appointed in his place as yet and that the staff is still lying idle at Meerut? If so, why was one of the seniormost Income-tax Officers not promoted to fill up the vacancy?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. No staff is lying idle at Meerut. The posts of Assistant Commissioners have only been gradually filled up as competent men became available. These posts carry great responsibility and are not automatically filled up on the basis of seniority.

POPULATION OF MEERUT.

51. Haji Wajihuddin: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the civil population of each community in each Bazar of Meerut Cantonment respectively?

Mr. E. Burdon: In order to obtain the information desired by the Honourable Member, it would be necessary to carry out a special census at considerable expense, and this could not be justified.

Only the total population of each bazar is known. The figures according to the census of 1921 are:—

Sadar bazar	11,840
British Infantry bazar	8,490
British Cavalry bazar	8,926
Royal Artillery bazar	1,476

WHARFAGE CHARGES ON FIRE ARMS.

52. Haji Wajihuddin: (a) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing rates of wharfage charges recovered by the Port Trusts at Bombay, Calcutta, Karachi and Madras, respectively on Fire Arms, Percussion Caps and shot, also the reason of difference in rates?

(b) Do the Government propose to consider the advisability of fixing universal rates in all the Indian Ports?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member on receipt. It may be mentioned that under the various Port Trusts Acts the legal responsibility for fixing wharfage charges rests with the Port Trusts and the different Local Governments and not with the Government of India.

PURCHASE OF QUININE AND CINCHONA BARK.

53. M. K. Reddy Garu: Will the Government be pleased to state—

(a) If it is a fact that the Government of India have been purchasing or negotiating for the purchase of large stocks of quinine and cinchona bark?

(b) If so, in what market and by what agency are these arrangements made?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Yes.

(b) Purchase of cinchona bark and quinine are made in Java and arrangements for these purchases were made by the Secretary of State for India who executed agreements with Messrs. Howards of London and with a combine of Dutch Manufacturers for the purchase of cinchona bark and quinine sulphate respectively.

QUININE AND CINCHONA BARK.

54. M. K. Reddi Garu: (a) Will the Government be pleased to put on the table a statement showing for each year since the inception of the scheme:

(i) the quantity of quinine actually received and the amount paid or payable for the same in rupees per lb.;

(ii) the quantity of cinchona bark received and the amount paid or payable?

(b) Will the Government of India be pleased to furnish a statement showing what further quantities, if any, of quinine and cinchona bark are deliverable under existing contracts and the price?

(c) Do the prices above referred to include the cost of delivery in India?

(d) What is the present stock of Government of India quinine (including quinine in bark form)?

(e) Is it the intention of the Government of India to increase this stock by further purchases and, if so, up to what limit and at what estimated cost?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) The information required is as follows:

(i) Quinine Sulphate.

Year.	Quantity received.		Amount paid.
	Lbs.		Rs.
1921-22	52,910·4		20,78,763
1922-23	26,455·2*		8,76,601
Total	79,365·6		29,55,364

*Up to end of December 1922.

(ii) Cinchona Bark.

Year.	Net weight of bark in lbs.	Amount paid.
		Rs.	A. P.
1920-21	85,213	...	†
1921-22	1,482,890	1,58,959	10 8
1922-23	653,186	1,11,833	8 8
Total	2,221,379	2,00,793	3 4

†Payment for bark received in 1920-21 was made in 1921-22.

(b) and (c). Quinine and Cinchona bark are being purchased under the following two contracts:

- (i) Contract with Howards.—This agreement came into force in July 1920 and will expire in 1928. It provides for an annual supply of cinchona bark sufficient to produce a maximum of 37,500 kilos (82,500 lbs.) and a minimum of 6,666 kilos (14,665 lbs.) of quinine sulphate. The actual quantity to be supplied during a year varies according to the amount of bark supplied to Messrs. Howards by the producers in Java. The price also varies with the price to be paid by Messrs. Howards to the producers. It is payable in London in sterling and does not include the cost of delivery in India.
- (ii) Contract with the Java Combine.—This agreement provides for the supply of 60,000 kilos of sulphate during the years 1921 to 1923, after which it will come to an end. The quantity to be supplied each year is 20,000 kilos (44,000 lbs.). 30,000 kilos had been received up to the end of September 1922, leaving 30,000 kilos still to be delivered.

The price payable is the official London quotation of the Kina Bureau, Amsterdam, minus 10 per cent. The price is c.i.f. Calcutta payable in rupees at the current rate of exchange. According to our latest information this works out to about Rs. 24-6-0 per lb., after deducting the 10 per cent., and with the rupee at 1s. 4d.

(d) The stock of Government of India quinine, including quinine in bark form was 293,172,794 lbs. on 22nd December 1923.

(e) It is not the present intention of Government to make any further purchases of quinine or bark over and above the quantities provided for in the agreements already referred to.

PRICE OF QUININE.

55. M. K. Reddi Garu: Will the Government of India be pleased to state whether any loss will accrue on the purchase of quinine in respect of the quinine purchased, and if so, how much, if the Government of India sell at to-day's wholesale price in India?

Mr. J. Hullah: The price charged for quinine issued from Imperial stocks is the same as that fixed by the Governments of Madras and Bengal from time to time for supplies from their Provincial stocks. These prices are based on the current rates quoted for Howards quinine in the open market. The present price is Rs. 27 per lb. Sales of quinine from Imperial stocks during the two years 1919-20 (there were no sales prior to that year) and 1920-21 resulted in a net profit of Rs. 4,12,300 to the Central Government. There were no issues from Imperial stocks during 1921-22. During the two years 1922-23 and 1923-24 allowing for an anticipated demand of 10,000 lbs., per annum and a fall in price during the latter year from Rs. 27 to Rs. 20 per lb., it is estimated that a net profit of about Rs. one lakh will accrue. It should be understood that the object of Government in making these purchases of foreign quinine and bark was to build up a reserve of quinine sufficient for India's needs in all emergencies and not for the purpose of making as big a turn over and as big a profit as possible in as short a time as possible. It is quite impossible to say at present whether these transactions will ultimately result in a profit or loss to Government as this will depend entirely upon the course of prices.

QUININE AND CINCHONA.

56. M. K. Reddi Garu: Will the Government be pleased to state—

- (a) If the Government of India before deciding to accumulate stocks, consulted the Governments of Bengal and Madras regarding provincial resources in the matter of quinine supplies?
- (b) If it is a fact that the Government of India have undertaken from the funds of the Central Government a large scheme for growing cinchona bark in Tavoy in Burma?
- (c) If so, will the Government of India be pleased to state the object of this scheme?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) No. The plantations in Bengal and Madras are unable to supply the normal demand for quinine in India, still less to build up a reserve, and the Government of India have therefore taken steps to build up the reserve of quinine stocks which had been depleted by the war.

(b) Yes.

(c) The scheme for the establishment of large cinchona plantations in Burma was undertaken in consequence of a suggestion of the Home Government made during the war that the Government of India should examine the possibilities of extending the cultivation of cinchona and increasing the production of quinine within the Indian Empire on a scale sufficiently large to meet the future needs of the British Empire and the Allied countries. About 2/3 of the quinine consumed in the Empire is obtained from foreign sources. The Department of Public Health has advocated that malaria should be fought throughout India by active propaganda advocating the use of quinine and by the supply of quinine at reasonable cheap rates and has pointed out that if the population of India were to use quinine on the scale reached in Italy their consumption would exhaust the whole existing world production. In most of the provinces cinchona cannot be grown, and even if it could, it is more economical to grow it on a large scale. The Government of India therefore regard the provision of adequate supplies of quinine as a matter of first-rate importance, and for this reason they have started the new plantations in Burma.

REPRESENTATION OF COMMUNITIES IN THE PUBLIC SERVICES.

57. M. K. Reddi Garu: Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the General Orders Nos. 613 and 658-Public of the Government of Madras, regarding the appointment of various communities not already adequately represented in the Public Services; and do this Government propose to consider the advisability of giving effect to the said General Orders as far as the Presidency of Madras is concerned, with reference to Services directly under the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Yes.

The conditions contemplated by the orders quoted are radically different from those of the services under the direct control of the Government of India and the Government of India do not consider it practicable to adopt the course suggested in the question.

EXPENDITURE ON SALT FOR FISH CURING.

58. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) why the expenditure of Rs. 1,31,000, as stated in demand for grant No. 3, under the heading "Charges in connection with export, import, etc., of salt for fish curing purposes", in page 17 of the detailed estimates and demands for grants for 1922-23, is incurred;

(b) what the income against this expenditure is;

(c) how the income is derived; and

(d) if the cured fishes are sold, whether they are sold in India or abroad?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) "The item of Rs. 1,31,000 is the budget estimate of the Central Government's share of the expenditure incurred in transporting salt from the factories to the fish-curing yards, where it is utilized in the fish-curing industry.

(b) and (c). The salt is sold to the fish-curers at a uniform rate of 10 annas per maund, the whole of the sale proceeds being credited to imperial revenues. The income on this account varies from year to year in accordance with the quantity of salt taken by the fish-curers; the estimated receipts for the current year are Rs. 1,63,000.

(d) The cured fish are the property of the curers and are sold both in India and abroad. Government has no information as to the local consumption, but understands that in the year 1921-1922 some 15,800 cwts. were exported coastwise and 172,400 cwts. to foreign countries.

APPOINTMENTS TO MEDICAL SERVICE IN INDIA.

59. Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state how many new appointments were made recently to the Medical service in India without the candidates undergoing any examination in that behalf?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to state the terms on which such appointments were made? Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table of the House a copy of a contract or letter of appointment, if any, in connection with these appointments?

Mr. E. Burdon: It is presumed that the Honourable Member's question refers to the Medical Service. If so, the answer is as follows:

(a) The number of new appointments made in the Indian Medical Service by nomination in the last 2 years is:—

1921 . . . 27; 1922 . . . 19.

(b) I will furnish the Honourable Member with a copy of the 'Regulations for the appointment of candidates to His Majesty's Indian Medical Service.' A copy of the 'letter of appointment' which is issued to those granted permanent commissions in the Indian Medical Service, is placed on the table.

From—The Director-General, Indian Medical Service.

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon'ble the Secretary of State for India has approved your appointment to a permanent commission in the Indian Medical Service, which will bear the date of this letter.

You are requested to complete and forward to this office, three copies of India Army Form Z. 2041, forwarded herewith.

It should be distinctly understood that not having undergone the usual probationary course, you will not be permitted to remain in the service, if as the result of any course of instruction on probation which may be arranged for you, your retention is considered undesirable (vide page 6, paragraph 6, of Memorandum attached to the regulations applying to the Indian Medical Service.)

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: A supplementary question, Sir. The Honourable Member would remember that yesterday I asked him whether any of these men would supersede the men from the Provincial Service who had been put to act in the Imperial Service. Is he in a position to give the information to the House now?

Mr. E. Burdon: Not at the moment. I will furnish the Honourable Member with the information in the course of the day.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS IN INDIA.

60. Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what action was taken on the resolution of Rai Bahadur Muzoomdar, C.I.E., about further constitutional reforms in India?

(b) Were the resolution and copies of the speeches made on the occasion forwarded to the Secretary of State for India as promised at the time of the discussion?

(c) Did the Government forward any recommendations of their own with reference to the resolution?

(d) Has any reply been received from the Secretary of State for India on the subject?

(e) Would Government be pleased to lay on the table of the House all the papers connected with the subject?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member is referred to the reply given by me on behalf of Sir William Vincent to Mr. Chaudhuri's question No. 231, dated the 7th September 1922, on the same subject and to the reply given by Sir William Vincent to Mr. Kamat's question No. 127 on the 16th January, 1922. The Secretary of State's despatch which has now been received by the Government of India will be laid on the table of this House on the 24th instant.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? Will the Honourable the Home Member be good enough to lay on the table of the House the despatch from the Government of India to the Secretary of State in respect of this Resolution? That is also one of the questions.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: There was no despatch. The Resolution was merely forwarded to the Secretary of State.

OPIMUM CHARGES.

61. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table the details for the following items of expenditure, contained in demand No. 4, "Opium", in the detailed estimates of demands for grants for 1922-23.

(1) Travelling allowance of Rs. 1,27,000, under District staff.

(2) Tour charges of Rs. 15,000, under the same heading.

(3) Travelling allowance of Rs. 10,000, under the heading "Opium Research Laboratory"?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: A statement is laid on the table giving the details asked for:

	Rs.
(1) (a) Travelling allowance of officers	54,000
(b) Travelling allowance of establishment	71,000
Total	1,27,000

Note.—The amount represents the ordinary charges incurred when travelling on duty in districts as well as the cost of transfers.

(2) Under tour charges (Rs. 15,700) are included cost of carriage of tents and records, cost of coolie hire and other incidental expenses connected with touring. It has not been found possible to obtain separate details of each of these.

(3) The amount of Travelling allowance under 'Opium Research Laboratory' is Rs. 1,000 and not 10,000 as stated in the question. The former comprises the lump allotment to cover the travelling allowance of the Agricultural Chemist and his staff. The total expenditure up to date is:

	Rs.	A.	P.
Agricultural Chemist	175	14	0
Staff	59	8	0
Total	276	6	0

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Will the Honourable Member kindly specify the reports for which he wishes us to give time for discussion?

(c) And will it disclose to the House the action it proposes to take with a view to insure the acceptance by the authorities in England of its recommendations?

(d) And will the Government be pleased to state what further action, if any, it has taken or intends to take?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member will I think recognize that it is impossible for me to answer a general question of this nature regarding what is said to be the attitude of His Majesty's Government towards recommendations made by the Government of India. I am further in doubt as to what the Honourable Member means when he refers to the action to be taken by the Indian Government to ensure the acceptance by His Majesty's Government of recommendations made by it. His Majesty's Government have definite statutory powers in regard to the Government of India and the Honourable Member does not, I assume, intend to suggest that these powers have been in any way exceeded. I may perhaps add that when the action which has been taken on various recommendations of the Government of India comes more fully to the knowledge of Honourable Members they will see that the alleged conflict of opinion between the Government of India and the Secretary of State in Council, if there is such a conflict, has been exaggerated in the Press.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? Is the principle insisted upon, namely, that where the Legislature and the Government of India agree, the Secretary of State should not ordinarily interfere? Is that principle being acted upon?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: That is a very general question; but if the Honourable Member can specify instances within his knowledge in which that principle is not acted upon, I shall be glad to answer the question as far as it is in my power.

ATTITUDE OF WHITEHALL.

64. Dr. H. S. Gour: Is the Government aware of the widespread feeling of distrust caused in the country by the reported attitude of Whitehall towards the reasonable demands of the two Houses?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The Honourable Member is referred to my reply to his question No. 63 on the same subject.

SUPREME COURT IN INDIA.

65. Dr. H. S. Gour: (a) Has the Government now considered the opinions of the Local Governments and the High Courts on the necessity of a Supreme Court in India?

(b) If so, have the Government formulated their views on the subject?

(c) And what action do they propose to take thereon?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The opinions are still under consideration but if the Honourable Member repeats his question later in the Session I may be able to supply him with more information.

ASSISTANT SECRETARIES AND REGISTRARS.

66. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state what the duties of the Assistant Secretaries and the Registrars, in the different departments of General Administration in the Government of India, are?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: A detailed statement giving the information asked for by the Honourable Member has been prepared and will be supplied to him separately.

ADVISER TO LABOUR BUREAU.

67. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state what the duties of the Adviser to the Labour Bureau, in the Department of Industries, are?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The appointment of the Adviser (Labour Bureau) in the Department of Industries will be, as a measure of retrenchment, abolished on the termination of a short period of leave that has been granted to the present incumbent.

ECONOMIES IN STATIONERY AND PRINTING.

68. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) what the result is of the enquiry made by the officer who investigated into the economies that could be effected under 'Stationery and printing'?

(b) what the total amount of annual saving effected is, if any?

(c) whether the officer has made any report or recommendation, and

(d) if he has, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the same?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) Mr. F. D. Ascoli, I.C.S., who was placed on special duty for six months to examine all possible avenues of economy in the expenditure of the Central Government on stationery and printing has made various suggestions for the control of the issue of stationery and forms, the curtailment of the printing work of Government Departments and the re-organisation of the Government of India presses.

Effect has already been given to some of his proposals and others are still under consideration.

(b) The total amount of annual saving that he expects to result from his proposals has been estimated at approximately Rs. 23½ lakhs but until some experience has been gained of the working of his schemes it cannot be said how far this estimate is correct.

(c) and (d). Mr. Ascoli has furnished Government with a number of detailed reports dealing with the different subjects which he had under examination. As they are very voluminous, Government do not propose to lay a copy of them on the table of the House, but I shall be very glad to show them to the Honourable Member.

OPINIONS ON O'DONNELL CIRCULAR.

69. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether the opinions of all the local Governments have been received on the O'Donnell Circular issued by the Government of India as a result of the resolution moved by myself in February last and what further action it is proposed to be taken to give effect to the recommendation contained therein?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The replies of all the Local Governments have not yet been received but it is expected that all replies will soon be complete and Government intend taking up the case without delay.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Are the replies of the Local Governments likely to be received while this Assembly is in session? If so, will the Government lay the replies on the table?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: As regards the first part of the Honourable Member's question, the Honourable Member might perhaps get more certain information from the local Governments who will send the replies, than from us who receive them. I cannot say at this stage whether they will be laid on the table or not. I must remind the Honourable Member that it was a confidential circular addressed to local Governments; he may draw some indications from that reply of how far it is possible that the replies should be laid on the table.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: One more question. The Circular was sent as a result of a Resolution moved in the Assembly, and the amendment suggested by the Honourable Home Member was accepted on the ground that the opinions of the local Governments should be invited; and I thought that they should be made known to the Members of the Assembly.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It does not necessarily follow. However, as I have told the Honourable Member, I can give no definite reply; and I hope that he will not at this stage of the proceedings try to bind me down to any definite course of action. Such action can of course only be settled after due consideration by the Government of India when the replies have been received.

SHIPPING COMMITTEE—NON-APPOINTMENT OF.

70. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: (a) Are the Government aware that considerable dissatisfaction has been produced as a result of the non-appointment of a Shipping Committee this cold weather in spite of the fact that a resolution on the subject was moved so early as January by Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer and accepted by the Government?

(b) Will they be pleased to state whether it is still their intention to carry out this recommendation at an early date?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) As the Honourable Member knows a supplementary grant was necessary and it was obtained last September. Since then considerable difficulty has been experienced in getting gentlemen to serve on this Committee.

(b) I hope to be able to make an announcement in the course of the next few days.

Mr. K. Ahmed: (Inaudible.)

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Will the Honourable Member repeat his question. I did not catch him.

Mr. K. Ahmed: (Inaudible.)

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid I must ask the Honourable Member to put his question in writing.

MR. KEATINGE'S DISSENT TO REPORT OF BRITISH GUIANA DEPUTATION.

71. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that Mr. Keatinge's minute of dissent to the report of the British Guiana Deputation was sent direct to the Government of India and not, as in the usual manner, through the Chairman of the Deputation?

(b) If the answer to (a) be in the affirmative, will they be pleased to explain whether there were any special circumstances to justify this departure from normal procedure?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Mr. Keatinge has neither signed the Report drafted by his Indian colleagues nor written a minute of dissent. He has submitted a separate minority report to the Government of India through the India Office.

(b) His reasons for adopting this procedure were as follows. In spite of the instructions of the Government of India that in order to prevent delay and facilitate agreement the Indian members of the delegation should remain in England till the report had been drafted and signed. Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai and Mr. Tewari left the country without even agreeing to draw up and sign a Memorandum of conclusions as a basis on which the report could be drafted. A draft report was prepared by the Indian members in this country and forwarded by them in September to Mr. Keatinge for signature with a request that he would make any corrections or suggestions of a verbal nature and append any notes of dissent that he wished to write. Mr. Keatinge found that there were many statements and opinions with which he could not agree. Owing to the impossibility of conferring personally on the points at issue, he declined to sign the report. During the period of six months which elapsed between the departure of the deputation from British Guiana and his receipt of the draft report, Mr. Keatinge, who was due to leave England for Rhodesia in October, prepared, with the approval of the India Office an independent report, while the results of the enquiry were fresh in his memory, for use in case he should find himself unable to sign the main report. It is this report that he has now submitted to the Government of India.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Can the Honourable Member cite a precedent where a member of a Commission has submitted a minute of dissent without letting it go through the Chairman of the Commission?

Mr. J. Hullah: I cannot recall any instance.

DOOR-KEEPER IN BOMBAY PORT ESTABLISHMENT.

72. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state why is it found necessary to maintain one European Door-keeper in the Bombay Port Establishment?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Government of Bombay consider that a European Door-keeper is absolutely essential. Hundreds of seamen, European, African and Indian attend the office daily and are not easy to control. In fact when the late incumbent of the post died and before the vacancy was filled, the police had constantly to be called in to keep order.

DRAWING OFFICE, GOVERNMENT OF INDIA SURVEY.

73. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) why six European Draftsmen are maintained in the Drawing Office at Simla, under the Government of India Survey?

(b) whether there is any difficulty in obtaining Indians to do those duties?

Mr. J. Hullah (a) Six British non-commissioned officers have been maintained in the Drawing Office at Simla since 1911, when this section was transferred to the Survey of India from the General Staff Branch, because they were found to be in regard to quality of outturn the cheapest agency available. The technical skill of Indian ex-soldier surveyors is not sufficiently high to enable them to turn out work of the standard demanded with the rapidity of execution which is essential to military requirements.

(b) The question of employing either Indian ex-soldier surveyors or Indian members of the Survey of India in this Office is again under consideration, and one post of European draftsman, which has fallen vacant has been kept unfilled pending a decision.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, LUCKNOW.

74. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: (a) Have the Government noticed a paragraph in the Pioneer of Allahabad, dated 30th November, 1922, at page 1, column 3, regarding the Council Chamber at Lucknow, the foundation of which is proposed to be laid by His Excellency the Governor of the United Provinces on the eve of his departure?

(b) Have the Government any power of control over Provincial Governments in such a case?

(c) If the reply be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state what action if any, have they taken or propose to take in the matter?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Yes.

(b) and (c) The expenditure of funds on the erection of a Legislative Council Chamber is expenditure on the transferred subject of Public Works and the question is therefore one for the local Government and its Legislative Council to determine. I would invite a reference by the Honourable Member to the powers of control vested in the Governor General in Council in relation to transferred subjects which are retained by Devolution Rule 40.

ALLOCATION OF EXPENDITURE ON INDIA OFFICE.

75. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the details of the allocation of expenditure on the India Office, between India and the British Treasury, under the Government of India Act, 1919?

(b) Is it a fact that it was arranged that for a period of five years from the 1st April, 1920, the British Treasury should make to the India Office an annual lump sum contribution of £136,000 in addition to the salaries of the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, making a total of £142,500 per annum?

(c) Is it a fact that, as stated at page 96 of the Second Interim Report of the Committee on National Expenditure (Geddes Committee), in spite of the said arrangement, India has voluntarily offered to accept a reduced grant of £120,000 for 1922-23, and this offer has been accepted?

(d) If answer to clause (c) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state when and on what grounds was this offer made on behalf of India, and to lay on the table a copy of the communication addressed to them in conveying the said offer?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Before I answer this question, I should like, with your leave and with the leave of the House, to express my sincere thanks for the very kind and flattering welcome which was extended to me yesterday. I should not have myself let 24 hours elapse had I realized that none of my questions would be reached yesterday. It is a great encouragement to be received in your midst as I was received yesterday, but my natural optimism, great as it is, will not rise to the idyllic picture of every Member of the House agreeing with every other Member and with the Finance Member on revenue and expenditure, or of a Finance Member who is loved by all. Nonetheless I look forward with great pleasure to sharing the labours of this House with them and facing with them the many financial problems which confront India at the present time: and I take the words that were spoken as an augury that, while we may sometimes perhaps differ after all on some points of detail, we shall all work together with one object, that is, to serve India.

(a) and (b) The arrangements under section 30 of the Government of India Act are as follows:

- (1) The salaries of the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under Secretary, amounting to £6,500 a year are borne by His Majesty's Treasury and included in the Home Civil Service vote.
- (2) The Treasury makes to the India Office an annual contribution equivalent to that part of the total estimated cost of the India Office (exclusive of the salaries of the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under Secretary) which is attributable to the administrative, as distinct from the agency, work of the Office.
- (3) Of this annual contribution, a sum of £40,000, which the Treasury was contributing towards the cost of the India Office previous to the Government of India Act of 1919, in accordance with the recommendations of the Welby Commission, does not take the form of a direct payment, but has been indirectly allowed for in adjustments between the two departments in respect of certain divisible charges.

The direct contribution by the Treasury, i.e., exclusive of the salaries of the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under Secretary and of the indirect contribution of £40,000 was fixed in 1920 at £90,000 a year for the period of five years from 1st April, 1920. It was subsequently raised with the concurrence of the Treasury to £136,000 a year. Contributions were made at the latter rate for the years 1920-21 and 1921-22.

(c) and (d) In pursuance of their policy of retrenchment in public expenditure the Treasury asked in 1921 that the above agreement should be modified in view of the reduction then anticipated in the cost of the India Office, as compared with the cost on which the contribution was previously fixed. The Secretary of State agreed to accept a contribution of £118,500 per annum (exclusive again of the salaries of the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under Secretary and of the indirect payment of £40,000) for 1922-23, 1923-24 and 1924-25 on the Treasury undertaking that no further reduction would be pressed for. The latest estimates for 1922-23 show that the direct contribution should have been about £122,000 for that year, the economy and reduction of staff anticipated by the India Office not having been fully realised. The provisional estimate of India Office expenditure for 1923-24 shows, however, a reduction of £20,000 in the above figure and this, together with the anticipated further reduction in 1924-25, should enable the deficiency in the contribution for 1922-23 to be fully recouped.

GRANTS REJECTED BY LOCAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCILS.

76. Mr. K. C. Neogy: With reference to the answer to my starred question No. 40 of the 6th September, 1922, will Government be pleased to state the result of their examination of the extent of the authority of the Governor General in Council to instruct a Governor in regard to the exercise of his statutory powers for the restoration of grants rejected by the local Legislative Council?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The matter is still under consideration.

BILL RELATING TO EMPLOYMENT OF FIREARMS FOR DISPERSING ASSEMBLIES.

77. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state their intention with regard to the "Bill to provide that, when firearms are used for the purpose of dispersing an assembly, preliminary warning shall, in certain circumstances be given", which was passed by the Council of State on the 19th September, 1921, withdrawn from the Legislative Assembly on the 26th September, 1921, and stated by Sir William Vincent on the 6th February, 1922, to be still under consideration of Government?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Bill has been withdrawn because further examination has shown that it is not possible to provide satisfactorily by legislation for a principle which has hitherto been regulated by executive orders not only in India but also in England.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it a fact that in England 24 hours before firing takes place a proclamation is read that the mob must disperse?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: No, Sir, it is most emphatically not the case.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask whether the executive order has been issued in regard to this question?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: If I am correct, the discussion in the Council of State will show what executive orders have issued in this respect.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Isn't it stated in the text-books of constitutional law in England that firing will only take place after a lapse of certain time which is generally notified in a public place warning people to disperse within a certain time?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: No, Sir, that again is quite inaccurate.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: How is it that this particular point as to the undesirability of having legislation of this character was not examined before the Bill was actually introduced and passed in the Council of State?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I think, Sir, that if Sir William Vincent was still here he would be better able to reply to that question than I.

WITHHOLDING OF PRESS TELEGRAMS.

78. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to refer to the answer to Unstarred Question No. 211 asked in the Bengal Legislative Council on the 31st August, 1922, and state the number of Press Telegrams offered for booking at the Barisal Telegraph Office by the accredited correspondent of the Associated Press of India and certain daily newspapers, that were refused to be sent or withheld by the Telegraph Master during the last two years?

(b) What is the total number of Press telegrams similarly refused or withheld in all the other places in the province of Bengal during the same period?

(c) Is it a fact that at Barisal no action was taken under section 5 (b) of the Indian Telegraph Act empowering censorship of telegrams under orders of the local Government, but that the Telegraph Master purported to act under clause 374 of the Post and Telegraph Guide which requires telegraph offices to refuse to accept any telegram which may be of a decidedly objectionable or alarming character?

(d) Is it a fact that the Telegraph Master of Barisal used to submit all Press telegrams to Mr. P. H. Waddel, I.C.S., the then District Magistrate, for censorship, and acted entirely under his instructions in this matter?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) and (b) Telegraph Offices are required to report by telegram to the Postmaster-General concerned the fact of any telegram being refused or withheld and to forward a copy of the objectionable message to the Postmaster General by post. But no separate record of such telegrams is maintained and the information required is consequently not available. The departmental rules require that the sender should be informed when transmission of a telegram has been withheld. If the withholding office has acted irregularly or indiscreetly, the Postmaster-General is empowered to take necessary action. If the Honourable Member will give details of any instance in which a telegram is considered to have been improperly refused or withheld, the necessary enquiries will be made.

(c) Clause 374 of the Post and Telegraph Guide is for the information of the public. Telegraph Offices act under rule 15 of the Statutory Rules made by the Governor General in Council under section 7 of the Indian Telegraph Act and published in the Gazette of India dated September 16th, 1909.

(d) Under the Statutory Rule quoted above, the head of the Telegraph Office at Barisal was required, if the character of a telegram was open to doubt, to refer the telegram to the District Magistrate at Barisal and to act under his instructions.

Mr. K. Ahmed: In this particular question, Sir, I do not understand how they say they are 'decidedly objectionable and alarming in character,' in (c) and (d)?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, I do not quite follow what information the Honourable Member requires me to give him.

Mr. K. Ahmed: See the last line Sir, of the paragraph 3 'decidedly objectionable or alarming in character' Will you kindly discuss the justification for withholding them?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, that would be a matter of opinion.

GOVERNMENT STORES IMPORTED FROM ENGLAND

79 Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state,

- (a) what arrangements as regards freight are in existence at present to bring Government stores from England to India?
- (b) whether there is any contract?
- (c) if so, with which line of steamer?
- (d) at what rate?
- (e) if there is no existing contract, whether they have considered or propose to consider the question of inviting tenders?
- (f) if there is no existing contract, what is the average rate of freight paid last year?
- (g) whether Government has considered the advisability of entrusting this work to an Indian Steamship Company? and
- (h) if not, whether they propose to consider the question now?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the discussions which took place in the Council of State on the 15th March, 1922, in connection with a Resolution moved by the Honourable Mr Lalubhai Samaldas on this subject. The system on which arrangements are made for the carriage of Government stores from England was fully described by the Honourable Mr. Lindsay in reply to that Resolution. There is no standing contract with any particular line of steamers and tenders are, as a matter of fact, invited on each occasion. Further particulars of the procedure followed are described in paragraph 9 of Appendix E to the Stores Purchase Committee's Report.

(f) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given to the question asked by the Honourable Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas in the Council of State on the 23rd March, 1922. Government have not the figures of the average freight rates paid during the last year. These rates are variable not only week by week, but also according to the nature of the material to be carried: they are, however, nearly always considerably below the open market rates.

(g) and (h) In a letter dated the 13th April 1922 Government communicated to the High Commissioner for India the Resolution which was carried in the Council of State on the 15th March, 1922, and instructed him specially to give Indian Shipping Companies opportunities of tendering for the carriage of Government Stores, where possible

RAILWAY RISK NOTES

80. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state whether their attention has been drawn to the remarks made by Mr. Justice Stuart about railway risk notes in a recent appeal case before the Allahabad High Court, in which 184 bags of wheat flour sent by Lala Banarsi Das, proprietor of B. D. Flour Mills, from Ambala to Ballia, were concerned?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The reply is in the affirmative

The Honourable Member is aware that the Committee, appointed to consider the revision of Railway Risk Note Forms of which he was a Member, has submitted its report, copies of which have been placed in the Library. The recommendations of the Committee are under the consideration of the Government of India

Mr. K. Ahmed: In view of the remarks which have fallen from the mouth of that distinguished judge Mr. Justice Stuart of Allahabad High Court, do Government propose to give effect to it in all other cases?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I have already explained that the matter has been dealt with by the Committee and the recommendations of the Committee are under the consideration of Government

APPOINTMENTS TO INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE ON SPECIAL TERMS

81. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: (1) Will Government be pleased to state how far is it correct that it is proposed to appoint 30 Europeans in the Indian Medical Service on special terms which include the right to retire on a gratuity of £1,000 with free return passages on the completion of five years service if they no longer desire to remain in the service?

(2) If so, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table for the information of this Assembly the proposal on the subject together with the legal authority for the same and all the correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State which has led to the proposal?

(3) Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) for whose special benefit and at whose application or suggestion this special form of Indian Medical Service reserved for Europeans exclusively is to be introduced in this country,

(b) whether any Indian or Anglo-Indian holding equal or higher qualifications is eligible for this service,

(c) from what date men belonging to this service are to be engaged and whether they are to be engaged under the Covenanted

Indian Medical Service Regulations or under special contracts to be entered into with each individual?

(4) Whether it is proposed to obtain the sanction of any of the Indian or Provincial Legislatures in the matter before it is enforced in India.

(5) Whether the cost of this special Indian Medical Service is to be borne by the Indian Exchequer or by any European Exchequer.

Mr. E. Burdon: (1) The facts are as stated by the Honourable Member in this part of his question. The gratuity of £1,000 which is to be paid if the officer ceases to remain in the service after 5 years, will be in lieu of pension.

(2) The Government of India do not propose to lay the correspondence on the table. No special legal authority for the measure is required.

(3) (a) and (b) No special Indian Medical Service is being introduced. The measure which forms the subject of the Honourable Member's question is designed purely and simply to remedy the very serious deficiency in current recruitment of European officers for the Indian Medical Service.

(c) Officers will be selected and engaged under the special terms mentioned in the first part of the Honourable Member's question, as candidates present themselves. Apart from these special terms the officers appointed will serve under the Indian Medical Service regulations as regards pay, allowances, &c.

(4) The answer is in the negative.

(5) The cost of these 30 officers for the Indian Medical Service, if obtained, will be borne by Indian revenues and will be met from the normal provision for expenditure on the service. They will be within the authorised cadre.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Why was it considered necessary to dispense with the ordinary examination in recruiting for this year?

Mr. E. Burdon: Because candidates were not forthcoming.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Were the Ministers in charge of this Department consulted in this matter?

Mr. E. Burdon: Questions of recruitment do not come before the Ministers.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Were they consulted?

Mr. E. Burdon: No.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If it was considered that by examination the Government would not be able to get a large number of men from England, why did they not have recourse to filling these posts by qualified men in this country and why should they have gone to England to recruit men without examination?

Mr. E. Burdon: As I have already explained, the sole reason for the measure was the necessity to remedy the very serious deficiency in current recruitment of European officers for the Indian Medical Service.

Mr. K. O. Neogy: Is there any fixed maximum proportion for Indians in the permanent cadre of the service?

Mr. E. Burdon: No; not at the moment, but I may mention that during the past 4 years 91 Indian officers have been appointed to the Indian Medical Service and 59 European officers.

Mr. K. O. Neogy: Will the Honourable Member refer to question No. 170 of the 15th of September 1921 and Question No. 485 of the 21st of September 1921 in reply to which it was stated that the question of fixing the maximum proportion for Indians in the permanent cadre was under the consideration of the Government of India and the Secretary of State. I want to know what has happened with regard to that matter.

Mr. E. Burdon: The matter is still under consideration.

Mr. K. O. Neogy: Is the Honourable Member aware that in reply to Question No. 485 of the 21st September 1921 it was stated that the policy of the Government of India is towards the liberal employment of Indians in the Indian Medical Service? How far has the present recruitment of Englishmen by nomination been in conformity with that principle?

Mr. E. Burdon: As I stated a few moments ago, in the last four years, 91 Indian officers and 59 European officers have been appointed to the Indian Medical Service.

Mr. K. O. Neogy: That adds nothing to my knowledge, I am afraid.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Is it not a fact that these 91 Indian officers were appointed as a special measure during the war and some of these officers have now been done away with?

Mr. E. Burdon: No. The 91 officers whom I mentioned have been given permanent Commissions in the Indian Medical Service. They are quite distinct from those temporarily employed in the Indian Medical Service, the number of whom is much greater.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Will the Government state what their reasons were for giving these special terms, apart from the question of candidates not presenting themselves in sufficient number? Were there any special reasons why these markedly special terms had to be offered?

Mr. E. Burdon: It was merely a question of the market rate which it is necessary to give in order to obtain the officers.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Were these appointments made with the full concurrence of the Government of India?

Mr. E. Burdon: The facts have already been fully stated.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: How long will this matter about the proportion of Indians in Indian Medical Service appointments be under the consideration of the Government.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Until we arrive at a decision.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Is the beginning of the end of the consideration in view?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Of course the beginning is in view.

FOREST COLLEGE AT DEHRA DUN.

82. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Will the Government be pleased to state what action, if any, has been taken to give effect to the recommendation of the Legislative Assembly for the development of the Forest College at Dehra Dun into a Research Institute for higher education in Forestry?

Mr. J. Hullah: The recommendation of the Legislative Assembly has been communicated to the Secretary of State and is under the consideration of the Government of India.

AMENDMENT OF CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

83. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the decision of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Stuart of the Allahabad High Court reported in the Allahabad Law Journal, Volume 20, page 909, Narain Prasad Nigam versus Emperor?

(b) Do the Government propose to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure so that the powers of the High Court may be extended in cases of revision and the High Court may interfere when totally wrong or illegal sentence or order is passed by a subordinate Court, although the High Court is moved by a person not party to the proceedings, as is the case of 55 Congress people referred to in the ruling of the High Court mentioned above?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: (a) Yes.

(b) The Honourable Judge who decided the case in question did not find, as appears to be suggested by the question of the Honourable Member, that it was not possible for a High Court in the exercise of its powers of revision to interfere unless moved by a party to the proceedings with a totally wrong or illegal sentence or order. He found in fact that—I quote his words here—'there is nothing to show me that there has been any miscarriage of justice' and that it was—I quote again from the order in the case—'perfectly clear that under the very extensive powers contained in section 435 I can call for and examine the record of proceedings if the necessity for doing so has been brought to my notice in any manner.' In these circumstances the Government of India think that the decision affords no ground whatsoever for the amendment of the law in the direction suggested by the Honourable Member.

REPORT OF ARMS ACT COMMITTEE.

84. Dr. H. S. Gour: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state when the Report of the Arms Act Committee will be published?

(2) And whether before taking any action an opportunity will be afforded to this House to express its opinion thereon?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: 1. The Report will be published on the 20th January 1928.

2. Government do not propose to give any official time to the discussion of this report, but it is open to Honourable Members to call attention to any of its features by question or resolution.

IMPERIAL LIBRARY, CALCUTTA.

85. Dr. H. S. Gour: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that the contents of the Imperial Library, Calcutta, are reported to be irretrievably perishing owing to the influence of climate thereupon?

(2) If so, what action does the Government propose to take to save them?

(3) Is the Government aware that a proposal has been made to transfer the Library to Delhi or some other more salubrious centre?

(4) Is the Government aware that the Library is maintained out of funds voted by the Legislative Assembly?

(5) Will it state what facilities do Members of this House enjoy in obtaining books from the Library for consultation?

(6) How many books were sent out from the Library to persons residing out of Calcutta?

(7) Is it a fact that the Library is scarcely patronized by any readers and that it does not serve the purpose of justifying its continuance as a charge upon the Imperial Revenues?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (1) and (2) The climatic conditions of Calcutta, as of most places in the tropics and sub-tropics, are bad for paper, and several of the older books in the Imperial Library have perished through decay. The same fate has befallen an old library at Meerut. The Government of India have the matter under scientific enquiry. Meanwhile every effort is made by careful supervision to curtail the damage.

(3) No such proposal is under consideration.

(4) The expenditure on the Imperial Library is voted expenditure.

(5) There are no special rules for Members of the Legislative Assembly. They enjoy the same rights and privileges in the matter of obtaining books as the general public.

(6) In the year 1918-19, 3,653 books were lent to the general public. Further or later information is not readily available.

(7) The answer is in the negative. The number of readers in the Imperial Library during the quarter ending 31st March 1922, was 11,445.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will the Honourable Member inquire from the Vice-Chancellor of the Delhi University as to what his experience is regarding the climatic effects of Delhi upon the books in the Delhi University Library which does not yet exist?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Is the Honourable Member aware that there is a department of the Bengal Government called the Bengal Historical Records, and also a department of the Government of India called the Imperial Record Department where records from the year 1773 are being preserved, and they are in good condition, and they are now being exhibited by the Asiatic Society?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: I am aware of the existence of the two Departments, but I cannot say anything about the exact condition of the records.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: May I ask a question? Is it not a fact that the Imperial Library was originally called the Calcutta Public Library, and the building in which it was accommodated was called Metcalfe Hall, and the Library was founded and the building erected by citizens of Calcutta as a memorial to Sir Charles Metcalfe who was Governor General of India in 1835 and Governor of Bengal also, and Lord Curzon took it over for the purpose of maintenance, and that the Government of India is only in the position of trustee with regard to the Library? Is he also aware that it is sadly wanting in accommodation?

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: May I ask whether I am expected to remember such a long question in order to answer it?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: It is a fact which ought to be in the knowledge of the Education Member that it was the Calcutta Public Library and was taken over by Lord Curzon. That is in the Government of India records and the Education Member ought not to be ignorant of it.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: May I ask whether the Department of Education will ascertain from the citizens of Calcutta whether they would be willing to take back the Library?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Did I not show him (the Education Member) a letter from the Education Minister of Bengal saying that he was willing to take over the Library if the Government of India would transfer it?

(No reply was given.)

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Am I not entitled to an answer?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will the Honourable Member inquire from the Vice-Chancellor of the Delhi University as to whether the Delhi University is expected to provide in Delhi a reading public much wider than exists in Calcutta?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, I am entitled to an answer as to whether the Government of India are willing to transfer the Library to the Government of Bengal if the Government of India are not going to maintain it and provide additional accommodation for the Library. It is for want of accommodation that the books are suffering.

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: Sir, I have already said that no proposal for the transfer of the Library is under consideration. I do not know what led the Honourable Member to make the long speech which he has delivered. If the Government of Bengal offer to take the Library over, the matter will certainly be considered.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, in view of the fact that there is no attraction for the Imperial Library, will the Government take proper steps to keep a Librarian at a moderate salary, say 250 rupees per month?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: May I ask whether it is not a fact that books were lying in the godowns of Messrs. Thacker Spink for a number of years because there was not enough accommodation in the Imperial Library at Metcalfe Hall. If it is within the knowledge of the Honourable Member will he provide additional accommodation?

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: The answer is in the negative.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: When this Imperial Capital of Delhi is fully built up, will the Government consider the advisability of transferring this Imperial Library from Calcutta to Delhi?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: The matter will be considered in due course.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: The Government of India are only the trustees of the Library.

FACILITIES FOR STUDY OF MUSIC.

86. Dr. H. S. Gour: (1) Is the Government aware that there is no facility for the study of music in this country?

(2) Is it aware that the faculty of music finds a place in almost all important universities of the United Kingdom such as Cambridge, Oxford and London?

(3) Is it aware that it was intended to open a faculty of music in connection with the University of Delhi?

(4) If so, will the Government be pleased to give effect to its intention?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (1) If, as appears to be the case, the question refers to the study of music in Indian Universities, the answer is in the affirmative.

(2) Yes.

(3) and (4) It is for the authorities of the University, after considering its financial position, to take the initiative in this matter by submitting the necessary amendment to the statutes. Any such proposal will receive consideration.

DELAY IN PUBLICATION OF INDEX OF DEBATES.

87. Dr. H. S. Gour: (a) Is the Government aware that inconvenience is caused to Members of this House by the fact that the Index to the Debates is not published for months after conclusion of the session?

(b) Is it aware that the Index to the September Debates was not published till December 5th when this question was sent in?

(c) Do the Government propose to take steps that the Title page and Index are got ready to be issued with the last number of the Debates or as soon thereafter as possible?

The Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) Government is not aware of any real inconvenience caused to Members of this House. There has hitherto been no complaint on the subject.

(b) Yes.

(c) Every endeavour is being, and will be, made to publish the Index as early as possible. Government recognise that there is room for some improvement.

DEVELOPMENT OF RAILWAYS.

88. Dr. H. S. Gour: (1) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a statement reported to have been made in the course of his speech on unemployment in the House of Commons by Sir L. Worthington-Evans to the effect that 'it was possible to spend usefully anything between 80 and 50 millions pounds in developing and improving Railways in India, which would bring Britain enormous direct employment ?

(2) (a) Will the Government state to what development and improvement of the Railways does this statement allude?

(b) And whether it does not refer to the expenditure in England of the 80 crores of rupees voted by this House for the betterment of the Indian Railways?

(3) Will the Government state how much of this 80 crores has been spent and upon what objects, and how much of it has been spent in making purchases in England?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (1) Yes.

(2) (a) and (b) The Government have no exact information. They were not consulted before the statement referred to was made. Sir L. Worthington-Evans is probably aware that Rs. 30 crores a year have been earmarked for the rehabilitation of Indian Railways and the Government of India presume that in the course of the debate he threw out a suggestion that it might help to relieve the problem of unemployment if arrangements could be made whereby the development of railways in India could be further facilitated.

(3) The Honourable Member is referred to the Demand Statement of Capital Expenditure for 1922-23 (Appendix C to the Demands for Grants) presented to the Assembly in March last. The actual expenditure follows the Demand Statement as far as circumstances permit. The total expenditure against capital and revenue works incurred up to the end of September last is Rs. 946 lakhs. Of this amount, roughly £4 million is in respect of purchases made in England and of this £4 million it is estimated that about £2 million is expenditure against the capital grant.

EMPIRE CONFERENCE

89. Dr. H. S. Gour: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what is the object of the proposed Empire Conference?

(b) When will it be held?

(c) And will India be represented thereon?

(d) If so, will any of its cost be chargeable to the revenues of India?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) The intention is that the proposed Imperial Economic Conference should study the possibility of co-operation in the development of the resources of the British Empire and the strengthening of economic relations between its constituent parts.

(b) As far as the Government of India are aware, nothing definite has yet been decided.

(c) The Government of India have informed the Secretary of State that if other Dominions agree to the proposed Conference India will also agree to take part.

(d) The question of cost has not yet been considered.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If a representative from India is appointed, will he be appointed after consultation with the Legislative Assembly?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: That question will require consideration.

COUNCIL OF STATE AND RESERVING OF COMPARTMENTS.

90. Dr. H. S. Gour: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the names of the Members of the Council of State and the amounts drawn by them on account of reserved compartments allowed to them, session by session, since the inauguration of the Council of State?

CHARGES OF MEMBERS OF INDIAN LEGISLATURES.

91. Dr. H. S. Gour: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the amounts drawn by Members of the Council of State and of the Legislative Assembly on account of travelling and halting allowances paid to them, session by session, since the inauguration of the reformed Councils, and for their attendance on the various committees?

The Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The information required is being collected and will be laid on the table in due course.

MR. ANDREWS' SPEECH AT ALL-INDIA RAILWAYMEN'S CONFERENCE
REGARDING COMFORTS OF 3RD CLASS PASSENGERS.

92. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the presidential speech of Mr. Andrews (as published in The Tribune, dated the 26th November 1922), at the second All-India Railwaymen's conference?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to state what steps have been or are being taken to increase the comforts of third class passengers?

(c) Will the Government be pleased to state when was the present pay of the menial staff of Railways fixed and whether Government propose to take any action to ameliorate their hardships.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Yes.

(b) Information on this point will be found in the Administration Report for 1921-22, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

(c) The pay of most of these servants was revised in 1920 and the wages bill in respect of this class has gone up 75 per cent since 1913-14. Apart from pay proper railway menials get free quarters, free passes, free medical attendance, etc., and in some cases free clothing.

EMPLOYEES ON NORTHERN INDIA RAILWAY.

93. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Is it a fact that Government employs on principle a larger proportion of Anglo-Indians and Europeans on Northern Railways for strategical purposes of defence?

(b) If the answer be in the affirmative, do Government propose to appoint more Indians on those Railways in vacancies created by retirement or otherwise of Europeans and Anglo-Indians.

(c) Is it a fact that in both the Traffic and Loco Branches of the Railway staff there are two different grades of pay for Indians and Anglo-Indians? If so, will the Government give reasons for such differences on racial basis?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The reply is in the negative.

(b) The policy of Government is stated in the preamble to the Government of India Act of 1919.

(c) I would refer the Honourable Member to the reply given on the 6th September 1922 to question No. 92 asked by Lala Girdharilal Agarwala.

PROBATIONARY PAY IN SECRETARIAT.

94. *Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Is it a fact that Rs. 80 is the minimum probationary pay and Rs. 100 on confirmation for a Lower Division clerk in the Government of India Secretariat?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to state the number of Anglo-Indians actually drawing this pay in each of the Departments of the Government of India Secretariat?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Yes, except in the case of girl-clerks who draw Rs. 100 per mensem during probation and Rs. 120 per mensem on confirmation.

(b) The information asked for is given in the statement laid on the table.

QUESTIONS REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEES.

95. *Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state whether all establishment questions either of selection or of promotions in the Ministerial Staff of the Government of India Secretariats are going to be placed before the respective Standing Committees which have been attached to each of the Departments of the Government of India Secretariat?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The answer is in the negative.

POSTAL SUPERINTENDENTS.

96. *Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (1) Is it a fact that the duties of the Superintendents of the Post Offices have considerably increased since the amalgamation of the Post and Telegraph Offices and that they have been invested with greater power and responsibilities in the matter of postal administration?

(2) Is it a fact that recruitment of such officers is conducted almost in the same way as in the other Provincial Services, i.e., Provincial Educational Service, Excise Service, Income Tax, etc., and that the selection is made from the same class of candidate with similar qualifications?

(3) Is it a fact that the scale of pay of the Postal Superintendents is much below the scale of officers of the Provincial Services; if so, will the Government be pleased to state the reason of such difference?

(4) Is it a fact that a memorial had been submitted by the Superintendents of the Post Offices to His Excellency the Viceroy praying for a revision of the time scale pay of their posts; will the Government be pleased to state what action has been taken thereon?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: 1. The reply is in the negative. Prior to the amalgamation of the Post and Telegraph Departments, Superintendents of post offices were required to inspect combined post and telegraph offices, and in order to enable them to perform this work efficiently, a short training in telegraphy was made compulsory. With the amalgamation there was no material change in this respect; but they have since been relieved of half of their purely postal inspection. Their duties and powers in respect of postal matters have been revised, but such revision has not added appreciably either to their powers or responsibilities, and will, it is anticipated, decrease their work.

2. For the appointment of Superintendent of post offices the procedure is to fill up half the vacancies in the cadre by the promotion of qualified officials from the subordinate ranks, leaving the remaining half for persons who are recruited direct as Probationary Superintendents. The educational standard required of a candidate for the post of Probationary Superintendent is a university degree or its equivalent. The conditions of service of Superintendents of post offices are not the same as those of other Provincial Services.

3. Superintendents of post offices were formerly on graded rates of pay with Rs. 200 minimum and Rs. 600 maximum. In June 1920, a time-scale of Rs. 250—700 was introduced with retrospective effect from the 1st December 1919 with due regard to the recommendations of the last Public Services Commission and in view also of the increase of pay sanctioned for other services. In April 1921, the matter was very carefully reviewed by Government but it was decided not to make any further improvement in pay. An exact parallel cannot be drawn between Superintendents of post offices and officers of similar position in other Provincial Services.

4. Yes; the Government of India have given careful consideration to the representations and have decided that the scale of pay which was introduced with effect from December 1st, 1919, is adequate.

Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: Is the Honourable Home Member aware that in my Province of Assam two months ago, while the people were crying for abolition of the Divisional Commissioner, there were in one Division actually two officers working as Commissioners simply because there was no room for one, and the other was expected to come to this Assembly as a Member.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I was not aware of the fact and I am afraid I cannot take it from the Honourable Member without examination; but it is in any case a question for the Assam Government and not for us.

DATES OF GOING ON AND RETURNING FROM LEAVE OF HIGHER GRADE OFFICERS.

97. Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: Has the attention of Government been drawn to the fact:

- (a) That in those departments of the public service which in the higher grades are officered wholly or mainly by Europeans, the practice is that these officers while going on long leave are allowed to consult their own convenience rather than that of the State as to the date of going on, and returning from, leave;
- (b) That none of these high officials will, if they can help it, ever go on long leave except from the close of the cold weather, nor will any such, if they can possibly help it, return from such leave except at the beginning of the cold weather;
- (c) That as the result of the above practice there is a surplus of officials in every cold weather?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) and (b) The fact is not as stated by the Honourable Member. Officers are not allowed to consult their own convenience, and leave cannot be claimed as a right. As far as the Government of India are concerned, leave is only granted with due regard to the public interests and at a time and for periods convenient to the State. The grant of leave is mainly the concern of Local Governments, who may be trusted to exercise a similar discretion.

(c) This fact is not as stated. Recruitment to the public services is so ordered as to provide for the periodical absence of officers on leave. If the Honourable Member will supply me with any facts which would substantiate the imputation contained in this part of his question, in regard to the services under the Government of India, I shall be glad to investigate them; in the meanwhile I can only repudiate it.

REGULATION OF LEAVE RULES OF OFFICERS.

98. Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: Do Government propose in the interest of economy:

- (a) to insist, as practically all private employers do, on their servants going on, and returning from leave on dates which suit their employers, and which may be so arranged as to prevent overlapping; and
- (b) to guard against such arrangements being upset by the existing practice of the Secretary of State granting extensions of leave, on medical certificate or otherwise, to officers on leave in Europe, to rule that officers who so obtain extensions shall not be allowed to return to duty until such date as the Government, under which they are serving, shall direct, or in the event of their being permitted to return to duty, that they shall continue to draw leave-pay until a vacancy for their re-employment occurs?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The Honourable Member's attention is invited to the reply just given to question No. 97.

(b) Extensions of leave are in practice only granted after the Local Governments concerned have been consulted, except extensions on medical certificate which entail appearance before the Medical Board at the India Office. The further safeguards mentioned by the Honourable Member are not therefore required. The Honourable Member appears to overlook the fact that ordinarily an officer on leave must hold a lien on a post, and that frequently officers are compulsorily recalled from leave.

COBRA ANTI-VENOM.

99. Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: (a) Are the Government aware that the Cobra anti-venom made at the Pasteur Institute at Saigon, Indo-China, has been developed to a high degree of certainty, and has been saving many lives in that country?

(b) Is it true that the Pasteur Institutes in India are in possession of the Cobra anti-venom? If so, how is it that the knowledge of its use, or even of its existence is not widespread enough to do any substantial good?

(c) Regard being had to the fact that the yearly toll of lives taken by venomous snakes is so very great in India (a hundred people dying in India from snake-bite to one from hydrophobia), do Government propose to see that the Pasteur Institutes in India at Kasauli, Coonoor, and Shillong are enlarged and made to give more attention than they seem to do at present to the manufacture and distribution of the Cobra anti-venom?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) The Government of India are aware that cobra anti-venine is made at the Pasteur Institute at Saigon, Indo-China, but have no information as to how many lives are saved by the use of this anti-venine.

(b) Pasteur Institutes in India are in possession of cobra anti-venine. This anti-venine in which are combined both cobra and viper anti-venine has been in use in India for nearly 20 years and has been supplied during that period to all large civil and military hospitals which require it.

(c) Anti-venine is prepared for the whole of India at the Central Research Institute, Kasauli, which is at present capable of dealing with all demands. The Government of India have at present a special research officer inquiring into the possibility of reducing the bulk of the anti-venine that has to be administered and of improving the serum so as to make it available throughout India and suitable for use by inexperienced persons.

BIRKMYRE'S CONTRACT—INDIAN STORES DEPARTMENT.

100: Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) the reason why a commission of Rs. 60,000 is allowed on purchases under Birkmyre's Contract, in Demand 86, for 1922-23, under the head "Indian Stores Department",

(b) the rate of commission,

(c) what the nature of the Contract is, and what is the article for which the contract was made, and

(d) what the total value of the Contract is?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Messrs. Birkmyre have acted since 1919 as the agents and advisers of the Central Government in respect of the purchase of certain classes of textile goods.

(a) The provision represents the amount expected at the time of the preparation of the estimates to be payable to the firm during the current year. Owing to a revision of the contract with the firm and to purchases falling short of anticipation the actual sum payable will be substantially less than the amount provided.

(b) The rate fixed by the original contract was $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on the actual invoiced price of goods supplied through the firm, other than goods manufactured in their own mill, after the deduction of all discounts, rebates and brokerage received by them. Goods manufactured by Messrs. Birkmyre Brothers themselves were, under the original contract, to be supplied to Government free of commission at the rate at which the firm were supplying the outside market at the date of the purchase by Government.

During the course of the current year Government revised the contract with the firm. Under the new terms commission is now payable to the firm at 1 per cent. on articles manufactured from jute by the Calcutta jute mills other than goods manufactured in the firm's own mill on which no commission is paid.

(c) The contract represents a temporary arrangement which was devised to obviate the necessity of employing a Government purchasing staff. It is proposed to review it again when the Indian Stores Department has developed further. Under the original contract the firm arranged for the supply to Government of their requirements in respect of:

- I.—Articles manufactured from jute by the Calcutta jute mills,
- II.—Articles manufactured from flax, hemp and cotton canvas.

Under the revised agreement now in force the firm act as advisers and purchasers for Government only in respect of articles manufactured from jute by the Calcutta jute mills. The other classes of goods covered by the original contract are now obtained in the open market by the Indian Stores Department.

(d) The value of the contract is indefinite and depends on the demands of the consuming Departments of Government. The value of goods purchased through the firm from April to November 1922, inclusive, was Rs. 15,05,184.

URDU FOR INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

101. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: With reference to the following reply to my question re: "Urdu for Indian Civil Service Examination syllabus" No. 57, page 1563 asked in the Assembly on the 16th January, 1922, given by the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent: "The Government of India agree that Urdu is a better term and will convey to the Secretary of State, who frames the rules under Section 97 (1) of the Government of India Act, the suggestion that the term 'Urdu' should be substituted for 'Hindustani'":

(a) Will the Government be pleased to state if the suggestion referred to has been conveyed to the Secretary of State?

(b) If so, has any reply been received?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) and (b) The term 'Urdu' has been substituted for 'Hindustani' in the regulations.

PILGRIMS DURING THE HAJ SEASON.

102. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) the number of Indian pilgrims during the last Haj Season?

(b) the number of such pilgrims as have not returned to India as yet?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) According to information furnished by the Government of Bombay, 8,575 pilgrims left Bombay and 3,975 Karachi for the Hedjaz during the last Haj season, making 12,550 in all. Of those leaving Bombay 6,953 were from India (including Burma) and Indian States. No information is available from Karachi.

(b) According to figures furnished by the Government of Bombay 11,410 pilgrims returned from the Hedjaz to Bombay and Karachi during the last season. No information is available as to how many of these were Indians. The mere comparison of outgoing and returning figures does not however give a correct indication of the number of pilgrims yet to return since a certain number of pilgrims who do not touch India on the outward journey return this way.

FUND FOR HAJ PILGRIMS.

103. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) If a fund from the Mohammedan Community for the benefit of pilgrims has actually been started as proposed?

(b) If so, what amount has been collected and where has it been deposited?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) Yes.

(b) According to information furnished by the Honorary Secretary of the Central Haj Committee of India, the amount collected up to the 31st December, 1922, is Rs. 32,067-12-6. Out of this Rs. 10,270-11 have already been paid to the British Agency in Jeddah for the repatriation of 359 destitute Indian pilgrims and a draft for a further sum of Rs. 19,394 has also been received for payment from the same Agency on account of the repatriation of 695 additional pilgrims. When this sum has been paid the balance available will be Rs. 2,403-1-6. The funds of the Central Haj Committee have been deposited with the Imperial Bank of India, Delhi.

COMPLAINT OF MR. SAHNEY AGAINST A GUARD.

104. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: With reference to the reply given to the question of Mr. Jarnnadas Dwarkadas, No. 3, Volume III, page 23, by the Hon'ble Mr. C. A. Innes that "Departmental action has been taken against the guard of the train and the Stationmaster," will the Government be pleased to state as to what was the Departmental action that was taken against the guard of the train and the Stationmaster?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The guard and stationmaster were reduced.

ADMISSION OF INDIANS INTO THE ROYAL AIR FORCE.

105. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: With reference to the answer given by Sir Godfrey Fell, to question No. 58 asked by me on the 16th January, 1922, in this Assembly that "no reply has yet been received from the Secretary of State for India":

- (a) Will the Government be pleased to state if the reply has been received?
- (b) If so, will it be pleased to communicate the reply to the Assembly?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) and (b) No reply has yet been received from the Secretary of State.

"PRINCIPAL PLACE OF BUSINESS" AS USED IN INCOME TAX ACT.

106. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state whether the question of the interpretation to be placed on the words "Principal place of business" used in the Income-Tax Act is under the consideration of the Government of India?

- (a) If so, will the Government be pleased to state whether they have come to any decision in the matter?
- (b) If so, will it be pleased to state what that decision is?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The question was considered by the various Committees which dealt with the amendment of the Income-tax Act, 1922, and their recommendations are embodied in section 64 of that Act. Under the provisions of that section where any question arises as to the principal place of business, the question is determined by the Income-tax Commissioner of the province, or where the question is between places in more than one province, by the Commissioners concerned, or if they are not in agreement, by the Board of Inland Revenue. But before any such question can be determined, the assessee must be given an opportunity of representing his views.

LISTED POSTS.

107. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: With reference to the reply given to the starred question 141 asked by Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur, in the meeting of the Assembly held on the 6th February, 1922, by the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent that "the Local Government had submitted certain proposals regarding listed posts which were under consideration"—

- (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether they have come to any decision in the matter?
- (b) If so, will it be pleased to state what that decision is?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The answer is in the affirmative.

(b) Two superior posts on the executive side have been notified as open to members of the Assam Civil Service.

GULZARIBAGH STATION PLATFORM.

108. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: (a) Are the Government aware that at Gulzaribagh station of the East Indian Railway the platform is much lower than the foot-board and many people, specially females, and children feel great inconvenience in alighting from the train?

(b) Do the Government propose to consider the advisability of making raised platform on this station for the benefit specially of women and children?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b) The general question of providing high level platforms at all stations on Broad Gauge Lines has recently had the careful consideration of Government. They are of opinion that the expenditure involved is so great that at present, with money so difficult to obtain and with so many other works more essentially required to increase traffic facilities, it would not be advisable to embark on the scheme. Railway Administrations provide high level platforms wherever passenger traffic is sufficiently heavy to justify their provision. The convenience of this form of platform for passengers who are old and feeble and for females and children is fully recognised, but Government propose for the present to leave it to the discretion of Railway Administrations to provide high level platforms at stations where the requirements of the passenger traffic justify them.

STEAMER SERVICES BETWEEN JEDDAH AND YAMBOO.

109. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: With reference to the reply given to the starred question No. 247 (b), asked by Haji Wajihuddin in the meeting of the Assembly held on the 6th March, 1922, by Mr. Denys Bray that enquiry will be made whether any Company is prepared to undertake a fortnightly Steamer Service between Jeddah and Yamboo as a commercial value, will the Government be pleased to state whether enquiry had been made; and if so, what is the result?

Mr. Denys Bray: The Government of Bombay were asked to make enquiries, but could find no Steamship Company willing to undertake a service between Jeddah and Yamboo as a commercial venture.

PUSA AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE.

110. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: With reference to the reply given to the starred question No. 70, regarding the Pusa Agricultural Institute put by Rao Bahadur Lachhmi Prasad Sinha, in the meeting of the Assembly held on 6th September, 1922, by Mr. Hullah that "The information asked for is being collected, and will be furnished to the Honourable Member as soon as possible:

(a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether the information has been collected, and furnished to the Honourable Member?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to lay the information furnished on the table?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Yes.

(b) Our papers containing the information are at present with the Agricultural Adviser at Pusa; on return from him the papers containing the information will be laid on the table.

BARRISTERS AND VAKILS IN HIGH COURTS.

111. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) Have Government ascertained the opinions of the Local Governments, the High Courts, the legal profession and other authorities, in regard to the question of removing all distinctions enforced by statute or by practice between Barristers and Vakils in pursuance of the resolution of this House on the creation of an Indian Bar, or otherwise?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to publish the said opinions, or circulate them to the Members of the legislature, at an early date?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Government have received the opinions of the local Governments and others consulted and these opinions are now under consideration. It is hoped the examination of the matter will be concluded without much delay, and the question of placing copies of the opinions received in the Assembly library will then be considered.

CITY CIVIL COURT IN CALCUTTA.

112. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to refer to a resolution adopted by the Bengal Legislative Council on the 7th April, 1915, recommending the establishment of a City Civil Court in Calcutta for the trial of suits valued at Rupees ten thousand, or under, which may be instituted within the original civil jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court; and state whether the said resolution formed the subject of any correspondence between the Government of Bengal and the Government of India?

(b) Is it a fact that in 1902, the Secretary of State suggested the establishment in Calcutta of a Court on the lines of the Madras City Civil Court, and that the Government of India were favourably inclined at that time towards the said proposal?

(c) Will Government be pleased to indicate their present attitude towards this question, particularly in view of the resolution of the Bengal Legislative Council referred to above?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Resolution referred to was forwarded by the Government of Bengal to the Government of India. The opinions of the Calcutta High Court were obtained by the Government of India and submitted to the Government of Bengal in April 1917. Since then there has been no correspondence on the subject. The matter is one on which the initiative should come from the local Government and Government therefore do not propose to make any statement with regard to (b) and (c) of the question.

REDUCTION IN DELHI PROVINCIAL GRANT.

113. Dr. H. S. Gour: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state how the Assembly's cut of one lakh of rupees in the Delhi Provincial Grant was effected?

(2) Is it a fact that 14 District Board Schools have been closed down during the current year and if so, why?

(3) Will the Government be pleased to state what reductions were made in the Grants-in-Aid to educational institutions in the Delhi Province in consequence of the Assembly's retrenchment?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: (1) A statement is laid on the table.

(2) 15 newly opened schools were closed by the Delhi District Board through want of funds to maintain them. District Board schools are, of course, maintained from the funds of the District Board itself.

(3) The information is contained in the statement to which I have just referred.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Will the Honourable Member inform the House whether it did or did not affect the grant of Rs. 75,000 made to the newly started Delhi University?

114. *Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: (a) Is it true that the Secretary of State for India has rejected the proposals of the Central Provinces Government regarding abolition of the Divisional Commissioners of that Province?

(b) If so, will the Government kindly lay the correspondence between Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject on the table?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Secretary of State has not yet been addressed on the subject.

AMALGAMATION OF ASSAM WITH BENGAL.

115. *Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: (a) Has the attention of the Government of India been drawn to the Memorandum regarding amalgamation of Assam with Bengal presented to the Inchaape Committee by certain leading men of Assam?

(b) Do Government propose to consult the local Governments concerned as to the feasibility of carrying out the proposals?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) The Government of India have seen the memorandum.

(b) They do not propose to take the action suggested. The matter is one in which the initiative should come from the local Governments concerned.

EUROPEAN VAGRANTS.

116. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state under what circumstances is it necessary to incur the following charges in the Demand for Grants for 1922-23:

1. Demand 47.—Baluchistan: Under 47 Miscellaneous, charges on account of European Vagrants, Rs. 220.
2. Demand 48.—Delhi: Under 47 Miscellaneous, charges on account of European Vagrants, Rs. 400.
3. Demand 50.—Ajmer-Merwara: Under 47 Miscellaneous, charges on account of European Vagrants, Rs. 50.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information asked for by the Honourable Member is being collected and will be communicated to him when available.

POSTAGE INCOME.

117. Munshi Mahadeo Prasad: Will the Government be pleased to state what was the income from Postage in the current financial year up to December, 1922, and for the same period up to December, 1921, in the last financial year?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The necessary information is being collected and will be supplied as soon as it is available.

STATISTICS OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

118. Mr. B. N. Misra: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (A) the number of employees in the (a) Officer's grade, (b) Upper Subordinate grade, (c) Lower Subordinate grade, in the years 1910 and 1920, respectively, in the (i) East Indian Railway, (ii) Bengal-Nagpur Railway, (iii) Great Indian Peninsula and (iv) North-Western Railways;

- (B) the total amount spent on each grade referred to above in the years 1910 and 1920 respectively by each of the Railways?

(2) Will the Government be pleased to state the number of (a) Europeans, (b) Anglo-Indians, (c) Indians, in grades referred to in (a) and (b) to question (1) in each Railway?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: It is not known what the Honourable Member means by Upper and Lower Subordinate grades and the question, therefore, cannot be answered.

Mr. B. N. Misra: I wish to put a supplementary question. Generally, there is the officers' grade and then the drivers, conductors and guards are regarded as being in the subordinate grade; as upper subordinates and lower subordinates. They begin in the lower subordinate grade and rise to the upper subordinate grade in the railways.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: May I ask what the question is? If the Honourable Member will specify the different grades in which he wants the employees classified, we will be able to supply him with the information, but there is no definite difference between the upper and lower subordinate grades.

Mr. B. N. Misra: What will be the total number of employees in the lower and upper subordinate grades?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I can have that information collected and given to the Honourable Member.

RAISED PLATFORMS AND WAITING ROOMS ON RAILWAYS.

119. Mr. B. N. Misra: (1) Does (a) a raised platform or (b) provision for waiting room depend on the income of a Railway Station?

(2) If so, will the Government be pleased to state if the different companies have a uniform standard of income for the purposes of (a) and (b) in question (1)?

(3) If not, will the Government be pleased to state what amount of income induces each of the said companies to provide (a) a raised platform, (b) a waiting room in a station?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (1) (a) and (b) The provision of a raised platform or waiting room accommodation at a station does not directly depend upon its income. These facilities are provided as the number of passengers using the particular station justifies them and it is generally left to the Railway Administrations concerned to decide whether such facilities are or are not required at individual stations on their systems.

(2) and (3) In view of the answers given to (1) (a) and (b) these questions do not arise.

RAISED PLATFORMS AND WAITING ROOMS BETWEEN HOWRAH AND PURI.

120. Mr. B. N. Misra: Will the Government be pleased to state.

(A) the total number of stations between Howrah and Puri, and

(B) the number of stations which have not got (a) a raised platform, (b) a waiting room and the reason in the latter cases?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (A) There are 61 stations between Howrah and Puri.

(B) (a) 15 stations are without raised platforms.

(b) All the stations have third class waiting halls, while 9 of them have also first and second class waiting rooms.

High level platforms or waiting room accommodation at a station are provided when the number of passengers using the particular station justifies their use.

WIRE FENCING ON RAILWAYS.

121. Mr. B. N. Misra: Will the Government be pleased to state how many railways have got a wire fencing throughout the line for the protection of cattle?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: There are no railways which are provided with wire fencing for the protection of cattle throughout their entire length.

GRIEVANCES OF TELEGRAPH CHECK OFFICE STAFF.

122. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware of the article in the editorial column of the "Amrita Bazar Patrika" dated the 18th October, 1922, and a number of other correspondences that appeared in the issues of that paper dated the 6th and 23rd October, 1921, the 2nd November, 23rd September, 14th April and 12th March, 1922; of the "Bengalee" dated 15th October, 20th September, 2nd September, and 31st March, 1922; of the "Indian Daily News" dated 7th December, 22nd November, 29th August and 27th July, 1922 and of the "Servant" dated the 30th August, 1922, regarding the grievances of the Telegraph Check Office staff?

(b) If so, do Government propose to enquire into the matter and take immediate steps for the removal of the grievances, if there be any?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member as early as possible. This answer applies not only to question No. 122, but to all the questions down to No. 133 inclusive.

TYPISTS IN TELEGRAPH CHECK OFFICE.

123. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Is it a fact that in accordance with the Auditor General's Circular letter, typists in all offices excepting the Telegraph Check Office, under the Accountant General, Posts and Telegraphs, were placed on the Upper Division Time Scale of pay and allowed the benefit of their entire length of service on that scale with effect from the 4th November, 1919, the date of the introduction of the New Time Scale of pay, and that in the Telegraph Check Office alone, typists have been placed in the Upper Division Scale of pay not earlier than 16th July, 1921, and without the benefit for their past length of service on that scale?

(b) If the answer be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state the reason for such deviation from the General Rule in the case of typists in the Check Office only?

(c) Do Government propose to recognise that the nature of typists work in the Check Office is similar to that of all other offices under the Accountant General, Posts and Telegraphs?

RECRUITMENT OF CLERKS IN UPPER AND LOWER DIVISIONS.

124. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Is it a fact that some outsiders as well as clerks though failed in the competitive examination for recruitment of clerks for the Upper Division, have directly been given appointment in, or promoted to, that Division in preference to some successful candidates and that the latter are being retained in the Lower Division?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to state:

- (i) the circumstances under which the same has been done, and
- (ii) the numerical position of the successful and the unsuccessful candidates in the several examinations held since the introduction of the "Recruitment Examination," showing which and how many of them were selected for the Upper and how many for the Lower Divisions; and in the cases of those promoted to the Upper Division without any further departmental test the references as to the antecedents regarding their past services, educational qualifications, the conditions of appointments when they were first taken in and the reason for their promotion to the Upper Division?

(c) Is it a fact that amongst the successful candidates some were recruited for the Upper Division and some for the Lower Division?

CLERKS APPOINTED AFTER RECRUITMENT EXAMINATION.

125. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware that in the cases of the clerks, selected for the Upper Division on the result of the competitive Recruitment Examination, who could not be provided in that Division, it was ruled by the Auditor General that they should have their initial pay fixed on the Upper scale when promoted to the Upper Division, as if their entire services had been rendered in that (Upper) Division?

(b) If the answer be in the affirmative, are the Government aware that clerks selected for the Upper Division, but sent to the Telegraph Check Office and subsequently transferred to Upper Division, have been deprived of the benefit?

GRIEVANCES OF UPPER DIVISION CLERKS.

126. Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it a fact that a memorial was submitted to the Viceroy and Governor-General on the 16th August 1922, stating that the clerks employed on the Upper Division work, got the Lower Division rates of pay; and that the Auditor General remarked in his letter to the Government of India that the grievances of the clerks were "legitimate and long standing"?

TIME SCALE IN CHECK OFFICE.

127. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Is it a fact that in July 1921, Government sanctioned an Upper Division Time Scale of pay for 140 of the clerical appointments in the Check Office and that it was intended by the Auditor General that this change should come into operation at once?

(b) If so, what steps, if any, were taken till January, 1922 to give effect to that change and whether it was with the concurrence of the Accountant General, Posts and Telegraphs?

(c) Is it a fact that about half the number of the Upper Division appointments were not filled up till November, 1922 and that some clerks submitted a representation dated 16th August, 1922 stating their grievances that the Auditor General had already recommended for promoting clerks to the Upper Division according to the efficiency and length of service actually rendered, as will appear from the said representation in paragraph 2, vis. "I should like to add that this is not a revision of establishment in the ordinary sense my proposals are designed to secure that pay should bear some relation to the nature of work done and thus remove a long-standing and legitimate grievance of the clerks ""

RECRUITMENT OF TELEGRAPH CHECK OFFICE.

128. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to state under what circumstances the new method of departmental examination has been brought in for filling up the vacancies in the Telegraph Check Office when a memorial was pending regarding the grievances of the clerks and when the orders are that the present incumbents may be brought on to the new scales ""?

CANDIDATES FOR DEPARTMENTAL EXAMINATIONS.

129. Mr. K. Ahmed: In the matter of the departmental examination held on the 26th and 27th October 1922, will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) The number of clerks who abstained from the examination, and
- (b) The number of clerks appearing in the examination specifying whether " Permanent " or " Temporary " with the dates of their original appointments and how many of them were recruited for the Lower Division?

CANDIDATURE OF TEMPORARY CLERKS.

130. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Is it a fact that under the rules only such clerks as have rendered not less than 4 years' service and can reasonably be expected to pass, are eligible for appearing at the departmental examination?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to explain how and under what circumstances the candidature of temporary hands, if any, for the examination was approved?

POSTAL AUDIT OFFICES MANUAL.

131. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Is it a fact that the rules in the Manual for guidance of Postal Audit Offices framed by the Accountant General, Posts and Telegraphs, regarding the filling up of substantive appointments in the Audit Offices under his control as embodied in paragraph 1457 of Chapter XVIII of the Postal Accounts Code, Volume II, provide that promotions in the clerical establishment should be given to men who will, in the judgment of the Deputy Accountant General be found qualified by

- (1) Efficiency
- (2) Suitability by temper.
- (3) Ability to draft clearly.
- (4) Command over subordinate clerks, and
- (5) Seniority.

and that one of the conditions inter alia, is that unless one possesses these qualifications, he cannot be promoted though he may have passed the departmental examination?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to state whether these rules have since been abolished?

(c) If not, was it followed in the Telegraph Check Office in making the selection of suitable candidates for filling the 140 posts for the Upper Division sanctioned for that office in July, 1921?

GRIEVANCES OF CLERKS IN TELEGRAPH CHECK OFFICE.

182. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Will the Government be pleased to enquire whether there were representations regarding their grievances submitted by the clerks of the Telegraph Check Office in the months of September and October 1921, and March, July, August and October, 1922, and state what replies were given thereto, if there be any?

(b) Do Government propose to lay on the table a copy of each of those representations if there had been any?

RECRUITMENT IN CHECK OFFICE.

183. Mr. K. Ahmed: If the Check Office clerks have been styled as "specifically recruited lower grade clerks", will the Government be pleased to state at whose instance the remark has come to be applied?

LIGHTING OF RAILWAY STATIONS.

184. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the judgment of the Madras High Court against the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway published in the Tribune, dated the 7th December, 1922?

(b) Is the Government aware that in most of the Railway Stations on all the Railways, the station premises are kept unlighted?

(c) If not, will the Government be pleased to state what steps do they propose to take in the matter so that station premises may be kept well lighted?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The reply is in the affirmative

(b) and (c) The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given on 15th September 1921 to item (u) of question No. 220 asked by Mr. K. Ahmed in a similar connection

ANGLO-INDIANS IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

185. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of Anglo-Indians employed in each of the Departments of the Government of India and the number of them employed solely in the lower division without even getting a chance of officiating in the Upper Division?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information asked for is given in a statement which is being sent to the Honourable Member.

PROVISION OF GOVERNMENT QUARTERS

186. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state the percentage of Anglo-Indians provided with Government quarters either for self or for family and the percentage of Indians provided with quarters either for self or for family?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The number of Anglo-Indians and Indians employed as Assistants and Clerks in the Government of India is 546 and 1,450 respectively.

The building scheme for New Delhi now makes no distinction between unorthodox Indians and Europeans and Anglo-Indians. The number of quarters for migratory clerks built and under construction is 641, of this number 385 are for those who live in the orthodox style and 256 are those who are unorthodox.

RAISINA CHUMMERIES.

137. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Is it a fact that four nice Chummeries well fitted and well furnished have been built at Raisina for European clerks and Assistants of the Secretariat living single?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to state whether any such chummeries have been built for Indian clerks and Assistants living single? If not, why not?

(c) Will the Government be pleased to state the reasons why two of these cannot be reserved for Indian clerks living single?

(d) Is the Government aware that if such a step is taken then scarcity of quarters for Indians will to a great extent be obviated?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) Four chummeries accommodating 72 bachelors have been built. These are available for occupation by unorthodox Indians and Europeans.

(b), (c) and (d) Four chummeries accommodating 104 bachelors are under construction. These are meant for occupation by orthodox Indians but one or more blocks will, if necessary, be used for unorthodox Indians.

RENTS IN DELHI.

138. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Is it a fact that the rent of the quarters at Delhi either of officers or of clerks of the Imperial Secretariat have been raised abnormally?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to state the percentage of increase in rent in each type of quarters at Raisina for the officers and for the clerks (Indian and European)?

(c) Is it a fact that such increase in rent was announced to the tenants after they occupied the quarters (either of officers or of clerks and Assistants)?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) and (b) The statement laid on the table shows the assessed rents and recoveries in 1921-22 and 1922-23.

The increase in recoveries is due to the introduction of the Fundamental Rules which have superseded the concession rates of rent which prevailed last year. These concessions gave a rate of rental recovery of 4 to 6 per cent. of the salary of the occupants, whereas the rental recoveries are now based upon 10 per cent. of the minimum pay of each class.

(c) Yes.

INDIANS ON I. C. S. CADRE.

139. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state what steps do they propose to take to bring the Indians belonging to the Indian Civil Service Cadre as Secretary, or Deputy Secretary of the different departments of the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Government of India follow the principle in the appointment of Secretaries and Deputy Secretaries, that the man best fitted for the post should be selected regardless of racial considerations. Indians have been and are appointed to these posts.

APPOINTMENT OF INDIANS TO REVENUE AND INDUSTRIES DEPARTMENTS.

140. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state whether they propose to bring Indians belonging to Indian Civil Service Cadre as Secretary of the Department of the Revenue and Agriculture, vice Mr. Hullah about to retire and of the Industries Department vice Mr. Chatterjee appointed Member of His Excellency's Executive Council. If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given to his other question on the same subject.

INDIANS IN RAILWAY COMPARTMENTS RESERVED FOR EUROPEANS.

141. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether Indians with European dress are allowed to travel in the compartments reserved for Europeans on Railways?

(b) If the answer is in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the orders issued to different Railway authorities on the subject?

(c) If the answer is in the negative, will the Government be pleased to state the reasons?

(d) Is it a fact that Indians even with European dress when travelling by European compartments can be evicted out of the compartment by a Railway Guard according to his sweet will or when a so-called European objects to travel with an Indian in European costumes?

(e) If so, is the Government aware that such cases of evictions of literate and high class Indians are one of the main causes for the movement for the abolition of such reserved compartments for Europeans?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Government have no information what the practice in this matter on the different railways is.

APPOINTMENTS TO RAILWAYS.

142. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Is it a fact that Anglo-Indians and Europeans will henceforward be taken to be Indians for the purposes of appointments on Railways as a result of the resolution about Indianisation of appointments?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: I would refer the Honourable Member to the reply given in this Assembly to Question 201 put by Mr. K. Ahmed on the 7th September 1922 on the subject.

IMMOVABLE PROPERTIES IN INDIA.

143. Mr. K. Ahmed: (1) Is it a fact that there is no compulsory registration of judgment and decree recognized by any Act of Legislation regarding the immovable properties in India?

(2) Are the Government aware that in England, the Land Charges Act, 1900, lays down that unless the judgment or decree concerning immovable properties be registered under the Act of 1888, the judgment or the decree will not operate as a charge on the immovable properties?

(3) Do Government propose to introduce such Legislation in the country immediately for the benefit of the public?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member will excuse me if I do not enter into an exposition of the law of registration in answer to a question. It will be sufficient to say that Government do not propose at present to introduce legislation amending the existing law relating to the registration of decrees or orders of a Court.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is not that system in existence in the civilised western countries, for instance, England?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I hope that the Honourable Member will not deny to India the title of a civilised country.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that that system is in existence in England?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is. The Honourable Member is well aware that it is, without asking me this question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to take any steps to introduce that system without any more denial to India?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I have already replied that the Government does not propose to do so.

INCONVENIENCES ON EASTERN BENGAL RAILWAY.

144. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware that in the Southern Section of the Eastern Bengal Railway most of the carriages are in damaged and dilapidated condition, that rain-water falls inside through the roof of the carriages, the trains are seldom lighted, especially the Inter class and Third class carriages, the Railway platforms are not properly lighted, no latrines are provided in most of the Inter class and Third class carriages, and the trains seldom run punctually and that in general, the Southern Section is uncared for and not properly looked after and that the passengers are greatly inconvenienced thereby?

(b) Do Government propose to take proper steps for removing the above defects and thus redressing the grievances of the travelling public?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b) Government is informed that while some of the carriages on the Southern Section of the Eastern Bengal Railway are in need of repairs and re-painting, the statement that most of the carriages are in a damaged and dilapidated condition conveys an unduly pessimistic impression.

The provision of new rakes for this section is contemplated, and when these are completed the new stock should bear favourable comparison with the stock of any Railway in India.

Complaints were received at the beginning of the rains of leaky carriage roofs, and the carriages were immediately attended to, and the complaints ceased.

The statement that carriages and platforms are not properly lighted is incorrect, and owing to the short length of the train runs on this section, the Diamond Harbour run being only 37 miles, the Canning Branch 28 miles and the Budge Budge Branch 16½ miles, the provision of bathrooms and latrines in the carriages of the trains over these suburban lines is not considered necessary.

During the first half of 1922, the punctual running of the trains over this section was affected unfavourably by the failure of water supply and prevalence of high winds. Consequently it was found advisable to revise the time table from the 15th July 1922 to a lower rate of speed.

Mr. K. Ahmed: May I ask what sort of light gas, kerosene oil or electric lights are supplied to these places, and if there be electric light, will the Honourable Member be good enough to state from the statistics of units the exact amount of the consumption of current?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I shall require notice of that question.

UNSTARRED QUESTION AND ANSWER.

WORKING OF RAILWAYS WITH REGARD TO FINANCIAL RESULTS.

86. Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: With reference to the answer given on 5th September 1922 to my unstarred question No. 14, do Government propose to modify the conditions so as to reserve power in the case of future railways to assume working, if the railway entails payment of guaranteed interest for three consecutive years?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government are afraid that the suggestion contained in the Honourable Member's question is impracticable.

THE INDIAN MINES BILL.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I beg to present the report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the regulation and inspection of Mines.

THE INDIAN PENAL CODE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Sir, I beg to move:

That Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar be nominated to serve on the Select Committee to consider and report on the Bill to amend sections 362 and 366 of the Indian Penal Code.

The necessity for my making this application to the House, and for further calling on Mr. Rangachariar for an increase of the heavy labours which he already undertakes on our Select Committees, is this—that under the rules we need a Chairman for our Committee. He must be either the Law Member, if he is a Member of the Assembly, or the Deputy President if he is a Member of the Committee. Neither of these requirements being complied with, the rules next provide that we should have as Chairman a gentleman who is a Chairman of the House. But unfortunately there is no such gentleman on the Select Committee, and it is for that reason that I have had to make an application to the House to add to the Committee the name of Rao Bahadur Rangachariar.

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

The motion was adopted.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. Deputy President: We will now proceed with the further consideration of the amendments to the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

“That in clause 10 (i) (a), insert the following at the beginning:

“After the word ‘occupier’ where it occurs for the second time, the words ‘in charge of management of that land’ shall be inserted and ‘.”

Sir, my amendment refers to the agents of the owners or occupiers of land. So far as the owners and occupiers are concerned, it has been found necessary that they should have connection with the land and that has been provided for in the section; but as far as the word ‘agent’ is concerned, there is no qualification put down in that section; ‘Agent’ as it stands in the clause and as is well known is a very wide and comprehensive term. Sometimes it extends even to vagueness. It may apply, for example, even to servants. I therefore suggest to the House that the word ‘agent’ should be qualified and made definite in such a way, that only such agents be made liable to give information under section 45 as may be connected with the land, or be in charge of the management of that land the occurrence on which is to be reported. The word ‘agent’ is very comprehensive and vague, for instance there may be agents for various purposes, they may be for the collection of land revenue, they may be for looking after the cultivation of that land, they may be for the construction of buildings on that land or for conducting and defending suits for title of such lands and so on. And to make any such agents liable would be to make the term very wide and troublesome, so it is necessary to restrict it only to such persons as are in charge of the management of the land, and who may be in a better position to know about the occurrences on that land. I therefore put my amendment for the consideration of this House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, the Honourable Member has explained that the object of his amendment is to restrict the application of the word ‘Agent’ in section 45 of the Code. I venture, Sir, to suggest that it is quite unnecessary to take this course. We have had this word in the Code in its present position exactly since 1872. There have been numerous rulings of the Courts to indicate what persons are covered by that term, and I would submit, Sir, that all the Courts now have the case-made law on the subject, and that it is most undesirable to introduce such words as those proposed by the Honourable Member in this case. He has suggested that the word standing by itself may have too wide an application. I will merely remark that in one of the rulings it has been held that the liability of a resident Agent arises only when the owner is absent. In these circumstances, Sir, I would venture to suggest that it is quite unnecessary to accept the amendment moved by the Honourable Member.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the amendment* moved by Mr. Agnihotri be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to withdraw my second amendment†

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadas Rural): Sir, in clause 10 (i) (a) I propose to omit the words 'or obtain. . .

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Mine has not been moved yet—No. 11 on the list.

* Vide p. 1114 of these Debates.

†In clause 10, sub-clause (ii), omit all the words after the word 'inserted', i.e., omit the words commencing from 'and' to the words 'other law'.

Mr. Deputy President: I think it will be more convenient to take Mr. Pantulu's amendment first.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: The clause provides that for the word 'obtain' the words 'possess or obtain' shall be substituted in section 45; under the Code as it is, a person is bound to give any information that he may obtain; clause 10 amends it by substituting 'obtain or possess' for the word 'obtain.' I propose that the words 'or obtain' should be omitted; so this clause will read, as I amend it, 'bound to give information which he may possess.' We had a good deal of discussion upon this clause yesterday on the amendment proposed by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar. He objected to landholders being called upon to give information to the police, and the offending portion of the section so far as that is concerned is that the landholder would be called upon to give information which he may possibly obtain but which he may not have in his possession. Now, if we take away the words 'or obtain' and simply leave the word 'possess' it comes to this, that the landlord is bound to give information which he possesses and not information which he may possibly obtain by making inquiries. If my amendment is carried, it will be incumbent upon the prosecution to show that the accused had that information in his possession and not merely that he might have obtained it. Therefore, I think that, if this amendment is carried, the sting will be taken out of that section. So, I submit my amendment very strongly to this House for its acceptance.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member) Sir, I will explain to the House in the first instance how we came to suggest an alteration in the existing law. The word in the existing law, as the Mover has explained, is simply 'obtain.' In 1904 the Madras Government found that this did not cover information obtained by personal observation. There was therefore some difficulty in making certain that information obtained by personal observation such as for instance, the discovery of a corpse on the ground, came within the scope of the law. At the same time I am quite willing to agree with Mr. Pantulu that on the whole the word 'possess' has a sufficiently extensive meaning for the purposes of the Act; and though I am not aware exactly what view my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, who has also tabled an amendment on this clause, will take of the suggestion, for my part I am willing that the word 'possess' should stand by itself without 'obtain.'

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, in view of the assurance given by the Honourable the Home Member, I do not mean to press mine. Of course, it would have been much better to use the word 'have' having regard to what the Madras Government said, because if a man sees a corpse in the way and he gets that information, he will be having that information. It may be doubtful as to whether this is simply possessing the information. That is apparently the view taken by the Madras Government. The word 'have' would cover both the cases of obtaining or possessing information. That is why I have suggested the word 'have' which would cover both the cases. However, I have no doubt that the deletion of the word 'obtain' is absolutely necessary, because it implies an obligation to seek the information. After all, we are not making law for the highest judiciary, we are making law which would be administered by the magistrates and they are likely to be misled by the use of the word 'obtain,' they may come to the conclusion that it is obligatory on them to obtain information. I do not very much care what you substitute, but I certainly think that the word 'obtain' should be deleted, but it would conduce to the better understanding of the section if you have the word 'have,' that would certainly meet the objection which the Madras Government seem to have had for the original word. I leave it to the Government to say whether they would like to have the word 'possess' or 'have'; anyhow, the word 'obtain' must go.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved.

In clause 10, sub-clause (i) (a), omit the words 'or obtain'.

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): I do not propose to move this amendment.* Sir.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, my motion runs as follows:

In clause 10 (a) after the word 'inserted,' insert the following: 'After the word persons, the words 'with his or their consent' shall be inserted.'

This relates to the appointment by Government for the purposes of this section village headmen. The section reads:

The District Magistrate may from time to time appoint one or more persons to be village headmen* for the purposes of this section in any village for which there is no headman appointed under any other law.

The amendment now proposed by Government is to appoint one or more persons to perform the duties of the village headman under this section where a village headman has or has not been appointed for that village under any other law. My amendment would only remove any misconception there may be as to the power of the District Magistrate to appoint persons against their will, and it is for that reason that I have inserted this clause that when they are so appointed it should be with his or their consent; it should not be that a person is appointed as village headman for the purposes of this section even without his consent. As it is, it is open to the District Magistrate to do that. I know that in the case of enlisting special police, people without their consent are enlisted. This ought not to degenerate into such a provision. It must be a voluntary duty to be performed by people who are given a certain status. People may not like to be appointed as village headmen, and the District Magistrate may appoint them as such even without their consent. I therefore propose, Sir, that in clause 10 (ii), after the word 'inserted' insert the following: 'after the word 'persons' the words 'with his or their consent' shall be inserted.'

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I have in this case also to explain to the House how these words came to be placed in the Bill. In the Central Provinces it appears there is a class of persons known as mukaddams or Kotwars. These are not regular village headmen, although they discharge on occasions the work of the village headman, and the Central Provinces wrote some years ago that in their province there are not a few sets of villages and villages comprising several scattered hamlets for which only one mukaddam is appointed. It would be useful to have power to appoint for a particular village or hamlet in such cases a headman for the purposes of section 45 only. That is the reason why the drafting Committee thought it was advisable to give a Local Government power to

* "Omit clause 10, sub-clause (ii)."

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

• appoint a village headman where none existed. Secondly as to the necessity of inserting the words 'with his or their consent,' I think it will be the experience of every one in this House who has had knowledge of revenue work that so far from a man refusing to become a headman, there is on the other hand very keen competition for the post. I think that Mr. Rangachariar might in the circumstances well be free of any apprehension on that subject. I personally can hardly conceive the circumstances in which a man would be appointed to a post so highly valued in the countryside without his consent. It would, therefore, make very little difference to the Act one way or the other. But from our point of view the words are for practical purposes unnecessary.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, it will appear from the speech of the Honourable the Home Member that the proposal for the inclusion of this clause originated from the Central Provinces Government. I come from a district in which there are many villages for which one mukaddam is appointed to look after and perform the statutory duties. Thus it is necessary certainly that some persons be appointed in these hamlets or individual villages who should be made responsible to report. But unfortunately, the fear or the apprehension that has been put forward by our leader, Mr. Rangachariar, is absolutely well-founded. There may arise cases in which it may enter the head of the District Magistrate or the Deputy Commissioner to appoint as a punitive measure any person to give such report and that will create a hardship. I do realise and admit that in the revenue Courts we find that there is often a regular competition for the appointment as mukaddams, lambardars or headmen of villages, but there is no reason why we should not make the law clear so as to do away with the apprehensions that exist in our minds that this power is likely to be utilised sometimes as a weapon against people in the bad books of the officers. The mukaddams are appointed and remunerated for their duties. In this case the fear of the appointment of these men as a punitive measure should be done away with and I support the amendment moved by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Has the Honourable Member any experience of such a case? It will interest us to know.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Yes, just as always happens under the Police Act, sections 15 and 16, where special constables are appointed.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: That is quite a different case.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Not in the least. The object under that Act is a salutary one, but sometimes respectable persons are harassed and troubled, and we do not want to put in anything of an ambiguous or indefinite nature which may in future give rise to hardships to the public.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

'In clause 10 (ii) after the word 'inserted' insert the following: 'after the word 'persons' the words 'with his or their consent' shall be inserted'.'

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 10, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur (Bhagalpur, Purnea and the Santhal Parganas: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, may I have your permission to take up both the amendments* Nos. 16 and 17 together because they practically refer to the same section and the same clause?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We should be obliged, Sir, if you would kindly let us discuss both parts of the amendment separately.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: Rather the second one first: 17 ought to come first and 16 ought to come next; because 16 is practically a corollary of 17.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir I would point out that, if No. 16 is carried, then No. 17 does not arise. The Honourable Member will have achieved his object.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: All right: as you please.

Mr. Deputy President: I think it would be much more convenient for the House if the amendments were taken in two parts as we have hitherto done with every amendment.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: Sir, section 54 (1) runs as follows:

'Any police-officer may, without an order from a Magistrate and without a warrant, arrest:

First any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence, or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made, or credible information has been received, or a reasonable suspicion exists, of his having been so concerned.'

Now, I propose an amendment to this section that this should be changed and the section should stand as:—

'Any police-officer may, without an order from a Magistrate and without a warrant, arrest any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom a credible information has been received or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned.'

Now, the change that I want is to drop the second portion of this clause. In fact, in clause 1, you will find there are four items and it is divisible into four heads. That is, any police-officer may, without an order from a Magistrate and without a warrant, (a) arrest any person who has been concerned in a cognizable offence; (b) may arrest any person against whom there is a reasonable complaint of his having committed a cognizable offence; (c) may arrest any person against whom a credible information has been received; and (d) may arrest any person against whom suspicion exists as to his having been so concerned. These are the four parts into which I divide the section. You will find from the amendment I have proposed that I do not want to touch item (c), namely, 'against whom a credible information has been received.' Because as a matter of course, a police-officer ought to have the right to go and arrest any person without the order of the Magistrate and without a warrant any

* "16. In clause 11 (i) before the words 'To sub-sections' insert the following:

'For clause first in sub-section (i) of section 54 the following clause shall be substituted:

'First—any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom a credible information has been received or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned.'

17. In clause 11 (i) before the words "To sub-sections"

'In sub-section (i) first of section 54 the words "a credible information has been made" shall be omitted.'

[Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur.]

person against whom he has received a credible information of his having committed a cognizable offence. My amendment does not touch that portion of the clause. I am concerned mainly with No. 2, namely, "against whom a reasonable complaint has been made."

Now, I would remind this House that the word 'police-officer' in section 54 means and includes any person from the Superintendent of Police down to a constable and from the new amendment that is now proposed—the term 'police-officer' in this section shall be deemed to include such village officers as may be either generally or specially authorised by the Local Government in this behalf. The question before this House is, and the question I want to put first is whether any police-officer, say a writer constable, or a head constable should be authorised to go without an order from the Magistrate and without any warrant from him—to go and arrest a man against whom there is a reasonable complaint of having committed a cognizable offence. That is the first question that I want to put before the House. Now, in section 4, clause 8, of the Criminal Procedure Code, we find the word 'complaint' means 'allegations made orally or in writing to a Magistrate with a view to his taking action under this Code.' It does not include any information given to the Police. Complaint means practically that a man goes straight to the Magistrate and makes some allegations to him either orally or in writing for the purpose of his taking certain action under the Code. And what action is the Magistrate intended to take or has to take when the complaint is made? That is to be found in section 190. He takes cognizance of the case. As soon as an allegation or a complaint is made before the Magistrate, he takes cognizance of the case under section 190 and under section 200 he examines the man, records his evidence and then he passes an order either under section 202 or under section 204. Either he says, under section 202, 'I don't believe your statement—you must prove your case' (that is an order under section 202), or he may send it to the Police or to any other individual to make a local investigation of the case. But, if he believes the man,—the complainant,—he may pass an order under section 204 and issue either a summons or a warrant against him.

Now, Sir, if you will kindly refer to section 202, you will find there that the Magistrate has power to say, 'well, I don't believe you; you must prove your case.' When there is a complaint lodged before a Magistrate, can't the police say a writer constable go and arrest the man? When a Magistrate under section 202 orders 'I cannot believe the statement of the complainant, I will not issue a warrant against the accused or I will not issue any process against him,' cannot a constable, a writer constable or a head constable go and arrest the man by virtue of the power that we are vesting in him? I say 'yes,' because a police man can reasonably say 'well, the Magistrate may not have thought the complaint to be reasonable, but I think it to be reasonable. I will arrest the man.' My intention is that when the matter is in the hands of a Magistrate after a complaint has been lodged (what we call in technical terms complaint cases) the police should have no hand at all and their interference does not seem necessary. Here I may give some concrete examples, of what actually happened and where I personally felt this difficulty regarding this matter. There was a case only in 1922 before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Araria in the district of Purnea where a man went straight to the Magistrate and lodged a complaint. This is the case of Emperor versus Muhammad Irfan. The complainant went straight to the Magistrate and lodged a complaint of a cognizable offence. The Magistrate very peculiarly, no doubt, said to the police, 'you better investigate.' The matter went up to the Patna High Court and the learned Judge there held that the order of the Magistrate was practically an order under section 202. As the Magistrate did not issue a warrant or summons under section 204, his order to the police was only an order under section 202. Now, what does the Police do in this case? I would appeal to the House to consider this. The writer constable goes straight and arrests the man. Here is an order of the Magistrate under section 202. The Magistrate has taken cognizance of the case and he is in seisin of it, and it is for him to decide whether he should issue a warrant and whether he should get the man arrested or not. It is not for the Police to decide whether the man should be arrested. The case subsequently took a different turn. The man who was arrested somehow escaped. The matter came up before the Court again and the issue was whether that arrest was a lawful arrest and amounted to lawful custody. When the matter came up, the plea of the police officer was: 'Well, here is section 54, I arrested the man (under that section) and so it was a lawful custody. The Magistrate no doubt passed an order under section 202, and did not believe the complaint and therefore he did not issue any process, but I considered that order to be very unreasonable and the complaint to be very reasonable and so I arrested the man. My custody was therefore a lawful custody.' That was the plea that the writer constable took up.

There was another case I will refer to, and that was a more recent one in the very year. The case is known as Emperor versus Jehani.

Rao Bâhadur T. Bangachariar: What was the decision of the High Court in the first case?

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: Unfortunately, it is not yet decided, but it went up on appeal and the appellate Court held that it was not a lawful custody. The appeal has been decided and the appellate Court has held that it was not a lawful custody.

There is another case, similar case, Emperor versus Jehani. I will give you that instance. There the complainant went straight to the Magistrate and lodged a complaint. On that complaint the Magistrate's order was as follows: 'I cannot believe this story. Let it be sent to the police for local investigation under section 202.' That was the order given by the Magistrate on the order sheet. A copy of the petition goes to the police. What does the police do? He copies out the whole of the complaint in his first information book although the complainant or informant is not before him. He copies out verbatim from the copy of the complaint and goes and arrests the man. What is the effect of this? Is it not a case where a writer constable or a head constable practically sits upon the judgment of the Magistrate? The Magistrate says, 'well, I will not issue any warrant or any process against the man', but the writer constable or a head constable says, 'well, I consider the complaint to be very reasonable. I will arrest the man.' Whose order is to prevail in such a case? That of the writer constable or the head constable or that of the Magistrate who has judicially held by an order passed under section 202 that no process should be issued?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Has the case been decided?

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: That case has not yet been decided.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: It is still sub judice?

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: That case is still sub judice, but the facts are these and I think it matters very little whether it is decided or not. I think that now the Code of Criminal Procedure is being amended, it is for this House to decide whether we should let the police, a writer constable or even a sub-inspector, over-ride the order of a Magistrate. That is the chief point that I put before this House. Is it desirable? Does it not look very ridiculous that a sub-inspector of police or a writer constable or a head constable should go and sit upon the judgment of a Magistrate? A question would here arise whether the administration of criminal justice will in any way be affected or hampered if you drop the words 'where a reasonable complaint has been made.' I am fully alive to the fact that some powers have to be given to the police as intended by section 54. But let it be the power which can be exercised with bridle and some decency. But when we find that a police sub-inspector or a writer constable goes and over-rides a Magistrate's order, then our interference becomes absolutely necessary. We at least now cannot stand and tolerate such a procedure as this, by which a mere constable could go and over-ride an order of the Magistrate. Now, Sir, I want to drop the words 'where a reasonable complaint has been made.' My reason is this, that when the Magistrate is in seisin of the case, when he is dealing with the case judicially under section 202 or 204 or any other section of the Criminal Procedure Code, why should the police be vested with the power to go and arrest the man without an order from the Magistrate? And, I object especially when the word 'police-officer' includes and means any one from the Superintendent of Police down to a constable. So that, if you drop out the words 'where a reasonable complaint has been made' the administration of the criminal justice will not be hampered in any way, because, when the Magistrate is in charge of the case, he will deal with it in the best way he can, and the interference of the police does not at all seem to be necessary. That is the first portion of my amendment. The rest of my amendment falls into two parts. The first portion refers to the words 'any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence, etc.,' and the second portion refers to the words 'a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned.' Now, in the first portion, viz., 'any person who has been concerned in a cognizable offence'—the words 'concerned in' are a very comprehensive term, and very wide. He can go and arrest any man on this ground and he can at the same time, if he chooses, release the man saying 'I found him not to be so concerned.' The word 'concerned' I think ought to be changed, and I want to put it in the following language: 'anybody who to his knowledge or in his view, that is to say, in his presence, has committed a cognizable offence'—you will find in section 64 of the Code, that a Magistrate has the power to go and arrest a man if anybody commits a cognizable offence in his presence. So I would rather like to give a police officer power similar to that, that is, if a person commits an offence in his presence, i.e., in his view, he may arrest the man without an order from the Magistrate and without a warrant. If he says that he has got knowledge that a person has committed a cognizable offence, I do not object to give him the power,—because there the police officer takes the responsibility of having some knowledge about the man. If he simply says,—well, I have thought the man was concerned in a cognizable offence—will that be enough to enable the police officer to go and arrest a man? I therefore submit that the word 'concerned' should be changed, and I would suggest that the words 'when any person who has in his view or to his knowledge committed a cognizable offence' be substituted. The last change that I want to make is in the fourth item, viz., regarding the words 'a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned.' Will the Magistrate decide the question whether the suspicion is reasonable or unreasonable or a constable should decide, at the time when he makes the arrest whether the suspicion against the man is reasonable or unreasonable? I would certainly not have asked for this amendment on this point provided we could assume that every police officer from a constable upwards was an honest officer, was a man who had no likes and dislikes. If that had been so, I would have allowed the section to remain as it was. We who live in the mufassil know what a constable or a head constable or a wrier constable is, and we have to guard ourselves and guard our countrymen against any abuse of this section if there is any chance of it. I would suggest therefore that the words 'a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been concerned' may be changed to, as I have suggested, viz., 'or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned.' He must have at least some materials to show. A police officer—I believe the House knows it—is not bound to give you all the informations as to where he got the informations from or his reasons for his suspicion, although a Magistrate is bound to give you some information, if a Magistrate acts on suspicion under section 190. He has to record something, and the accused is entitled to know it, but in the case of a police officer, he may say 'I am not bound to tell you.' A head constable who generally remains in charge of a Thana can well say, 'my suspicion was reasonable'—and that stops the mouth of the accused and he cannot further question him over this. So if this section is changed to what I have suggested, viz.,—'a suspicion based on material facts'—he is bound to give us at least some of the materials on which he suspected the man to have been concerned in a cognizable offence. So with these remarks, I place before this House the amendment which I propose to make in this section, and I hope the House will consider the question which is an important question so far as my countrymen living in the mufassil are concerned—whether a police officer in the first instance should be authorised to arrest a man without the order of the Magistrate regarding whom a reasonable complaint has been made to the Magistrate. That is the first point. The second is whether you should allow him to go and arrest a person simply because he thinks a man is concerned in a cognizable offence or he thinks that there is a reasonable suspicion of his having been so concerned. So this is my amendment; and I beg to propose that in clause 11 (1) before the words, 'To sub-section' insert the following:

'For clause 'first' in sub-section (1) of section 54, the following clause shall be substituted:

'First, any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom a credible information has been received or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned.'

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

'That in clause 11 (1) before the words 'to sub-section' insert the following:

'For clause 'first' in sub-section (1) of section 54 the following clause shall be substituted:

'First, any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom a credible information has been received or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned.'

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the Honourable Member who has moved the amendment has explained the reasons for his motion at great length. But I think it will be possible for me to show quite shortly that it would be impossible for this House to accept that amendment. In the first place, I am obliged to the Honourable Member for having informed us that this section gives power to any police officer, that is to say, any officer from the rank of a police constable up to the rank of a superintendent of police. He proposes, Sir, to amend the first clause of section 54. He proposes nevertheless to leave the 7th clause unaffected. If Honourable Members will refer to the section of the Code, they will find that the 7th clause began with exactly corresponding words to those in the first clause. The 7th clause runs as follows: 'Any person who has been concerned in or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made or credible information has been received or a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been concerned in the act committed' and so on. (A Voice: 'Outside British India'.) Now, Sir, the first clause of section 54 gives power to a police constable to arrest without a warrant in these circumstances if an offence has been committed or he has reasonable grounds for belief that a cognizable offence has been committed in British India. The 7th clause gives power to the police constable to take exactly the same course if any act has been committed outside British India which within British India would be an offence. Now, Sir, we are dealing with the powers of a police constable. Under the first clause, if he has to consider whether he may arrest a person, he will have, under the proposal of the Honourable Member, a certain series of considerations to apply to the case.

If, however, the man has done an act just outside British India in an Indian State, then he will have to apply an entirely different set of considerations. I think, Sir, that that by itself means that the amendment which has been moved by the Honourable Member cannot be accepted.

He has referred at great length to the portion of the clause which deals with a person against whom a reasonable complaint has been made. He has assumed that the word 'complaint' in that clause is governed by the definition in clause (h) of section 4 of the Code. I venture to suggest, Sir, that it is quite clear that the definition of the word 'complaint' in section 4 of the Code does not in any way govern the word 'complaint' in this section. (Bai N. K. Sen Bahadur: 'Is there an authority on that point?') If the Honourable Member will read the beginning of section 4 of the Code he will find that the words and expressions as defined in that section have the meanings there given 'unless a different intention appears from the subject or context.' It is quite clear, Sir, that where the word 'complaint' is used in the first clause in section 54, it has the ordinary dictionary meaning of the word 'complaint'. It does not relate to an allegation made orally or in writing to a Magistrate. (Mr. W. M. Hussainally: 'Why not substitute the word 'information' for the word 'complaint'?) That amendment, Sir, has never been suggested to us for consideration.

Then I would like to refer further to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Member. He ends his clause with the words 'so concerned'. He has taken those words from the existing clause. In the existing clause it is quite possible to use them, because the clause begins 'no person who has been concerned'. Under the Honourable Member's amendment, on the other hand, the words 'so concerned' can have no meaning whatsoever. In these circumstances, Sir, I trust the amendment will not be accepted.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I only wish to add one or two words to the remarks which have been made by Mr. Tonkinson. The difficulty that arises if Honourable Members bring in amendments which are quite new, that is to say, if they have not been considered by the Select Committee is that various drafting mistakes come in. Mr. Tonkinson has already referred to the point in regard to the words 'so concerned'; but I suggest that there are two or three other drafting amendments which will have to be made if this proposal is approved. Another point is that the Honourable Member's draft would take the place of the present law, which has been in force for about 50 years and on which High Court rulings in Calcutta and other High Courts have been recorded. In the draft we find the words 'to his knowledge or in his view'. Well, I suggest that if it is 'to his knowledge', the words 'in his view' are quite unnecessary. Then comes 'a credible information' and 'suspicion based on material facts'. Well, Sir, 'reasonable suspicion' is the language of the English Law as well as of the Indian Law; and I suggest that the specific proposal which has been made, namely, that the Honourable Member's draft should supersede the existing law, which has been in force for many years and is approved by all the High Courts, should not be accepted by this Honourable Assembly.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the answer from the Government Benches to the motion made by my friend is very unsatisfactory. Two reasons were given by Mr. Tonkinson. One is that if you leave the 7th clause intact and deal only with the first clause, there will be some difficulty in construing the section properly. The answer to that is, if you accept the amendment to the first clause you must make consequential amendments to the 7th clause. The Government will have to do it if they accept the amendment, and there will be no difficulty in so drafting the 7th clause as to bring it into conformity with the amended first clause. Moreover, there is this to be considered, so far as the 7th clause is concerned. When an offence is committed outside British India, the offence may not be committed in the presence of or within the knowledge of the constable, and therefore the use of the word 'concerned' there, is not so inappropriate as in the first clause; because, if it is used in the first clause you empower a police constable to arrest a person who, according to his idea, is concerned in an offence. But if you substitute the words which my Honourable friend wants to be substituted, you will make the position clear that the constable can deal only with cases in which there has been an offence committed in his presence or within his knowledge... (Mr. N. M. Samarth: 'and in his view. As a lawyer I would interpret that as 'in his opinion'.')

Now, Sir, the real point which my Honourable friend has been trying to make is that, if there is a matter within the cognizance of the Magistrate, the police should have no hand in moving in the matter and making arrests. To that Mr. Tonkinson's answer is that the word 'complaint' in this clause does not refer to the definition in section 1, clause (4). The expression simply means something which has been brought to the notice of a police constable. Now, if that is what is really intended, we must make it clear. The word 'complaint' has been defined, and if, in a technical treatise, in a Code you find the word 'complaint' used again, naturally the Magistrate and other officers would interpret the word in the sense in which it has been defined previously. If what you intend to convey is simply the knowledge which the constable has gained, then you can substitute the words which Mr. Sen wants to be substituted for the word

'complaint'. That was Mr. Tonkinson's second answer and so far as it goes it does not dispose of the amendment. The really important point is that the police should not move in a matter of which they have no direct cognizance. They should be able to arrest only when they see that an offence has been committed. They must not take information given to a Magistrate and act upon it except under the directions of the Magistrate. That is the really important matter, and I hope the Government will accept the amendment which has been moved.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, the point raised by my friend is that if there has been a complaint made to the Magistrate and the complaint is referred by the Magistrate to the Police for investigation under section 202, the police should not have power to arrest the accused without a warrant, and to effect this he proposes to omit in clause (1) of sub-section (1) of section 54, all words referring to a complaint. It appears to me that his object will not be achieved by the amendment that he proposes, because, although he may remove those words, the words that will remain in the clause are sufficiently elastic to enable the police to arrest. The policeman may say 'I have information that the accused has committed a cognizable offence' and arrest the man! The proper way to give effect to the Honourable Mover's intentions is to add a proviso to his section saying that no arrest without warrant shall be made in the course of investigations under section 202. That would be the proper way of giving effect to the wishes of my friend. The question then arises whether that will be in the interests of the administration of justice. Suppose there is a complaint of murder. Sometimes complaints are made direct to the Magistrates. Suppose the Magistrate foolishly sends it on to the Police without making an investigation himself—as most Magistrates pass on complaints to the police to get rid of the trouble of investigating—and suppose, in the course of the police investigation, the police officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the offence of murder has been committed. Should he be prevented from arresting the man? He would have had the power to arrest him if there had been no complaint. Now that he is investigating into a complaint referred to him by a Magistrate, should he be deprived of the power of arresting him? (Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: 'He must take the orders of the Magistrate.') The alternative will be to get a warrant from the Magistrate. (Mr. N. M. Samarth: 'And allow him to escape in the meanwhile.') Or, as my friend says, the alternative is to allow him to escape in the meanwhile. What is the position of the Magistrate? When the Magistrate sends a complaint to the police for investigation, it means that he is not in a position to issue a process in the case, and until he receives the police report he will not be in a position to know whether he should proceed further with the case or dismiss the case under section 202? On an interim application from the police during the investigation, will he be in a position to issue a warrant? I am afraid a Magistrate will not be justified in issuing a warrant under those circumstances. Therefore, it seems to me that it will not be in the interests of public justice to deprive the police of the power of making the arrest in a cognizable case simply because a complaint happens to have been made to a Magistrate previously. So, I would rather not support these two amendments.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I should like just to emphasise one or two things which Mr. Percival mentioned. He just hinted that this had been the law in this country for a long time and in these identical words. As a matter of fact, these words 'reasonable suspicion' and 'reasonable complaint' have been in the criminal law since the Code of 1861. Have they caused any difficulty at all? If you look at any commentary on the Code of Criminal Procedure and the notes on section 54, you will find the rulings on this subject. The Courts have never had any difficulty; and now you propose to substitute entirely different words. The result will be confusion in the minds of the Courts, when they are dealing with offences against police constables for making unlawful arrests and so on. I think Members have all along looked at this question from one point of view. They seem to forget that there are many safeguards against misuse of powers under section 54. There is in the first place a suit for damages for wrongful arrest. There is a prosecution which is a much more simple matter than a suit for damages against a police constable for wrongful restraint and confinement and other more serious offences. The police constable is quite easily kept in his place over this matter. Then, Mr. Percival briefly mentioned the English law. I should like just to tell the House very briefly what the English law is on the subject. A constable may arrest a person whom he finds committing felony, or upon reasonable suspicion that a felony has been committed by the person arrested, although no felony has in fact been committed, and whether the reasonable grounds of suspicion are matters within the constable's knowledge, or are derived from facts stated to him by others. I think the House will admit that it goes at all events as far as our law goes on the subject. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar suggested that if the matter was in the hands of the Magistrate, then the Police should have no right to interfere at all unless a warrant was handed to them, upon which they carried out the orders of the Magistrate. That is not the law followed by the Courts of this country. If a police officer knows that a Magistrate somewhere else has issued a warrant, even though he has not seen the warrant, but he believes that a warrant has been issued, the Courts have held that he can go himself and arrest that person without the warrant in his hands at all. That is rather a different thing from the proposition which Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar placed before the House. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar also suggested that it is a very easy matter to amend clause 7 of the section. I do not think he said anything about those words 'so concerned' which are left hanging in the air at the end of my friend, Mr. Sen's amendment. They refer to nothing. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would place a heavy burden on the drafting department of the Government of India: it is no concern of theirs. We have examined all the amendments that are here, and we notice here and there the necessity for consequential amendments; but we cannot proceed further and draft for non-official Members all the consequential amendments which they themselves overlook. I would, on those brief grounds, viz., that we are not going beyond the English law, that we intend to maintain the law which has been in existence in this country for over half a century, that there are effective safeguards against the misuse of the powers, that the law as it has existed has caused no difficulty in interpretation, and that consequential amendments have been entirely overlooked in this amendment proposed by Mr. Sen, ask this House to reject the amendment. Apart from that, I do not think Mr. Sen's amendment will carry out what he is aiming at. I am not going to argue again the point that a complaint of this class is not covered by the definition; that suggestion has been received with some scorn by this House, but as a matter of fact, if they will look at the rulings, they will see that all along they deal with a complaint to the police or information to the police. The word 'complaint' in this section is saved from the definition by those words which come at the beginning of the definition clause, 'unless the context otherwise requires' or words to that effect. Mr. Sen has not achieved what he wants. He cuts out the word 'complaint' and leaves 'credible information.' If the police constable cannot act on a complaint, still if he has credible information, he can act just the same whether a complaint has been laid before a Magistrate or not. Nor will Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's desire be achieved. Even assuming for the sake of argument that the word 'complaint' means a complaint to a Magistrate only, if the police constable has credible information that a man is concerned in an offence, there is nothing in the law, as Mr. Sen would have it, to prevent that constable making the arrest. On every ground this is a most undesirable amendment and I hope the House will reject it.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir Moncrieff Smith has stated that these words are existing from 1861 in the Criminal Procedure Code and he also said that they find a place in the Criminal Procedure Code of England.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: In the Common Law of England.

Mr. B. N. Misra: He also points out that constables in England are authorized to arrest persons under such circumstances. First of all, I must say, that simply because these words have been in existence from 1861 it is not an argument that they cannot be amended now if we find they really create hardship. As regards his comparison between the constables of England and the constables of India, I think all the Members know what an Indian constable is. Probably if he, the constable, does not know you to be a very big person, a big Hakim, big Zemindar or Raja, he will at once greet you and make you his brother-in-law; whereas in England—those who have been there, know what the constables are. They are so good and the police so good and so polite that there can be no comparison between the police of England and the police of India. If Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith really compares both and has personal experience of both, I hope he will correct his statement. The Indian constables cannot at all be compared with the constables and the police of England or any other civilised country. He has also said that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar does not think, it would simply be a burden to the drafting Committee. I think it may be a burden to the drafting Committee, but it will relieve the burden of many innocent people who are harassed by the constables. Really the words are very vague—'any person concerned with the offence.' And it is very wrong to give such power to ordinary constables, or even to Sub-Inspectors, so that they can arrest any man simply by saying he is concerned. We are aware that very often Indians have to pay tolls in many ways, and if a constable wants to take a toll from a passer-by he can at once catch hold of him and say he has committed a nuisance in such and such a place. Although he may himself commit a nuisance on the road, he will say the man did so and catch hold of him. We have these things, and especially in places of pilgrimage where innocent people go in large numbers, not knowing the country. I come from Puri and I know how these constables trouble these innocent pilgrims and say, you committed a nuisance under this or that Act. So these powers given to constables really entail a hardship upon innocent people. I think these powers of arrest must be restricted and if it is a burden to the Department, it will relieve the burden of many. I propose the amendment should be supported by the House.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): Sir, with all deference to one or two of the Honourable and learned gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, I cannot help saying that some of the arguments put forward by them in support of the amendment are entirely irrelevant to the issue which has been raised by the Honourable Mr. Sen. The question before the House is not whether the power of arrest, which, under the existing law, vests in our police officers in the case of cognizable offences, should be taken away from them or not. Indeed, the amendment does not seek to delete from the Code of Criminal Procedure section 54, which is now before the House. Further, it does not even seek to omit clause (1) of sub-section (1) of section 54, with which we are now dealing. All that it seeks to do is to modify the terms of that clause. This power of arrest is, as the House knows, of the very essence of the classification of offences into cognizable and non-cognizable, and its maintenance is essential for the welfare of the community and for the maintenance of law and order. The only real issue before the House is whether the circumstances mentioned in clause (1) of sub-section (1) of section 54 justify the power of arrest without a warrant, which, at present, is vested in the police officer. That is the sole issue and I would ask Honourable Members to put aside all extraneous considerations, which are really in the nature of a red herring argument, absolutely out of consideration, and to judge on its own merits the clause as it stands at present, and whether it should be retained in our Code of Criminal Procedure or not. For, after all, it is a question not of a new enactment, not of a new provision, which is sought to be imported into the existing Code of Criminal Procedure by means of this Bill, but of the retention or otherwise of a law which has been a part and parcel of our statutory law ever since the first Code of Criminal Procedure was enacted in this country. That is the simple issue, and I would ask Honourable Members to bear in mind that issue lest they may by appeal to sentiment or appeal to the prejudice which exists in certain quarters against our police officers be led away from the real, true, issue which is before us. After all, it should be remembered that the mere fact that the agency for carrying out the law of the land may here and there be faulty, may even be corrupt in individual instances, does not justify in itself either the amendment or modification of the law with which the Legislature may have to deal in any particular instance.

Bearing this truth in mind, let us now turn to this clause (1) of sub-section (1) of section 54 as it stands at present and see whether on a a priori grounds there is any justification whatever for its modification. What does that clause say? This is how the clause runs. Sub-section (1) begins with these words: 'Any police officer may without an order from a Magistrate and without a warrant arrest'—whom?—'any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made or credible information has been received or a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned.' These are the classes of persons with whom this particular clause deals and in whose case it authorises a police officer to arrest without a warrant from a Magistrate. Now, a careful analysis of this clause will make it perfectly clear to Honourable Members that it really deals with the various stages of a police investigation in a cognizable case and I shall show that presently by the analysis of its phraseology.

Now, the first part of this clause says: 'Any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence.' This obviously refers to that stage in a police investigation when, by reason of the evidence which has been actually procured or produced during the course of that investigation, a police officer is convinced or believes that a particular individual has been concerned with the commission of the offence into which he is investigating. Surely no Honourable Member in this House will say that when, during the course of an investigation, a police officer has reason to believe on the facts that he has already collected that a person is concerned with the commission of an offence that he should not then arrest that person. I am perfectly certain that no Honourable Member will support a proposition like that. Then, the next portion of the clause contemplates a different stage. This is what it says: 'or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made,' that is to say, even before the starting of the investigation, when a complaint has been made against an individual to a police officer. Here we have nothing to do with complaints to Magistrates. But when a complaint has been made to a police officer and it appears to that officer that the complaint is reasonable, then he will be authorised under this clause to arrest. Remember, he cannot arrest an individual against whom a complaint has been made simply because of the complaint itself. No. He is entitled to arrest only if there is sufficient material before him to show that the complaint is reasonable. I shall presently give the authority of a very learned and a very well known Judge for the proposition that I am placing before the House. The word 'reasonable' is a condition precedent to arrest on complaint. The complaint must on the data before the police officer be a reasonable one before the police officer is entitled to arrest the individual complained against in connection with any case. Then the next portion of this clause deals with cases where credible information has been received, not merely where information has been received, but credible information has been received, that is to say, the information is such that, prima facie, the police officer has reason to believe, has reason to credit, its veracity, the truth of that information. Well, surely no person interested in the maintenance of law and order, no sincere well-wisher of society in general, will come forward in this House and contend that even when a police officer has received information which is credible, that is to say, information which is prima facie correct, of the commission by an individual of a cognizable offence, that is to say, one of the more serious kinds of offences which the Legislature has made cognizable by the police without a warrant, that in such a case as this the police officer should not arrest that person.

Surely such a position has merely to be stated in order to be rejected by this House.

Then, lastly, the last portion of this clause contemplates a case where a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned—that is to say, not a mere suspicion but a reasonable suspicion, and the argument which I have just addressed to the House with reference to a complaint mutatis mutandis applies to this part of the clause also. I submit, therefore, that on a priori grounds, on their own merits, the various clauses of this Bill are perfectly reasonable. Not a single authority has been cited on the other side, by any of the Honourable and learned gentlemen who have supported the amendment, of any case, reported or unreported, in which any Judge in any High Court has ever thrown a doubt upon the reasonableness of the provision embodied in this clause. The clause has been in force for several decades and Courts have had to deal with this branch of the law of our criminal procedure constantly. Surely had this clause been as a matter of fact found to be oppressive or harsh for the subject we should have had at least one case or two cases in which the Judges presiding in any of the High Courts would have adversely commented upon this by pointing out that the phraseology of this clause is too loose or is too wide and therefore needs amendment.

Now let me in this connection refer to an important judgment. The name of Mr. Justice Markby of the Calcutta High Court is well known. Dealing with the corresponding section in the old Code—as I said just now, this law has been our Statute Book for several decades—dealing with the corresponding provision in the old Code in VII Weekly Reporter, page 3, at page 5 in the body of the judgment this is what Mr. Justice Markby said:

‘It seems to be generally supposed, and the supposition seems to be generally acted on, that police officers in making inquiries into criminal cases are limited only by their own discretion as to what persons they may arrest and detain in custody.’ . . .

That supposition found expression to-day in some of the speeches that were addressed to this House. Well, this is what Mr. Justice Markby goes on to say with reference to such a supposition:

‘But so far from this being the case the powers of a police officer to arrest without warrant are strictly defined by the Code of Criminal Procedure. The widest power is that conferred by paragraph 2 of section 100.’

(the provision in the old Code corresponding to the very clause with which we have now to deal upon this amendment):

‘which provides that the police officer may arrest without orders from His Majesty and without warrant any person against whom a reasonable complaint has been made or a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been concerned in any offence specified in the Schedule to the Act as offences for which police officers may arrest without warrant.’

and here I would like to point out that the word ‘reasonable’ in the two places is italicised by the learned Judge in his judgment. Then he proceeds:

‘What is a reasonable complaint or suspicion must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case, but it must be at least founded on some definite fact tending to show suspicion on the person or estate and not on mere vague surmise or information. Still less have the police any power to arrest persons, as they appear sometimes to do, merely on the chance of something hereinafter being proved against them.’

And now the next words are very important: I invite the attention of this House to the next words in this very learned judgment of Mr. Justice Markby:

‘Any wrongful exercise by the police officer of his legal powers of arrest is by section 220 of the Penal Code an offence punishable by imprisonment for 7 years.’

[Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi.]

And yet when the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith made a somewhat similar observation during the course of his speech I heard some murmurs against the proposition enunciated by him.

Now let us for a moment turn to this section 220 of the Indian Penal Code to which Mr. Justice Markby has referred:

'Whoever, being in any-office which gives him legal authority'—

—I am leaving out the words which are irrelevant—

'to commit persons to confinement or to keep persons in confinement, corruptly or maliciously commits any person to confinement or keeps any person in confinement in the exercise of that authority knowing that in so doing,'

—note the words—

'knowing that in so doing he is acting contrary to law, shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 7 years or with fine or with both.'

It is obvious from the terms of section 220, therefore, that any police officer arresting a person, unjustifiably arresting a person otherwise than on reasonable grounds mentioned in this clause of sub-section (1) of section 54, is guilty of an offence under section 220 of the Indian Penal Code. There is the deterrent, there is the check on the wrongful exercise by the police of the powers with which they are invested under this clause. Therefore I ask Honourable Members by their vote to declare that the clause in question, which has been on our Statute Book for several decades as I said before, is perfectly reasonable, is perfectly just, is indeed absolutely necessary, is essential in the interests of society and for the maintenance of law and order, and that no modification, no amendment of it is called for.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the amendment only aims at this, that the present great power of the police may be curtailed to a reasonable extent, and that reasonable extent is this—that if any cognizable offence is committed to the knowledge of a police officer or in the presence of a police officer, then he is fully competent to arrest without warrant and without an order of the Magistrate. A number of grounds have been set forth in opposition to this innocent amendment.

It has been urged that the present law has stood the test of many years, that 7th clause stands as it was before and there is no amendment as far as that clause is concerned, that there are the words 'material facts', that it is impossible for an ordinary police officer to determine then and there on the spur of the moment what are material facts and what are not material facts. One other ground, which has been urged, is this, that the judiciary of this country has been dealing with the present provisions of this Code and therefore it will give rise to a number of troubles and complications if the amendment is accepted. Lastly, reliance has been placed on the interpretation of clause 1, sub-clause firstly. These are the grounds which have been relied on, and I am glad to say, Sir, that every one of these grounds can be answered with great satisfaction. Firstly, it has been said that it has stood the test of many decades. All right. Is there any force in the argument that because a certain irregularity has, before this, been countenanced it should be tolerated even now? If it is an irregularity, if there is some sort of defect, that defect ought to be removed. The time that has elapsed cannot mitigate the force of the argument in favour of the amendment. The second ground is that sub-clause (7) stands and therefore it will be of no avail to allow this amendment. In reply to that my submission is that we are dealing now with sub-clause firstly; we are not concerned with the 7th sub-clause. That will be seen when we come to deal with it. Therefore there is no force in the argument that this sub-clause (1) cannot be amended. Then great stress has been laid upon the argument that the very interpretation and the construction of sub-clause (1) shows that the amendment is useless and that it will not serve any purpose. My humble submission in reply to that construction is this: that the way in which I read this sub-clause is in support of the present amendment. 'Any person who has been concerned . . . ' The Honourable the Law Member has construed this clause in the following manner, that there must have been some sort of evidence before the police officer comes to think that the person has been concerned. That is not the interpretation. If it were within the contemplation of the Legislature that the police officer ought to have some sort of data or some sort of evidence before he arrests, then the words would have been 'any person who has been found to be concerned' but it is given here 'any person who has been concerned.' It then comes to this that the question of arrest simply depends on the discretion of that police officer; though that discretion may not be based on any data whatsoever, he will thus have an ample opportunity of abusing his powers. Therefore, it is the sincere desire of the Honourable Member of this amendment that any room there may exist for abusing that power may be removed at once. That is the desire which has prompted him to set forth this amendment before this House. Then the Honourable the Law Member construes 'or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made.'

The reasonableness of that complaint is to be judged by that police officer on his whim only, not on any data, not on any evidence whatsoever; it is quite probable that on account of some bias or prejudice he may be misled or even on account of a bad intention he may subsequently, when he is hauled up, say there was a reasonable complaint. So far as the technical discussion, in regard to the word 'complaint' is concerned, I am not going to detain this Honourable House. 'Complaint' here is used in a popular sense and not in the technical sense of a complaint which is made before the Magistrate. 'Complaint' here means information, a kind of report. Then the Honourable the Law Member construes saying 'or credible information has been received', that is, the police officer will discuss and determine whether the information, which has been imparted to him, is credible or not, and that here the provision has allowed a safeguard. In reply to that my humble submission is this, that the police officer has been given greater power; the credibility or incredibility of the information simply depends on the whim of the officer; therefore this House should not be in favour of it, viz., that the police officer should be allowed so great a power that he may subsequently, when he is going to be prosecuted under section 220, Indian Penal Code, say that he took it to be very credible information and therefore he arrested an innocent man. The present law may wrongly come to his help. He might say that he determined and judged and examined pro and con and arrived at this conclusion that the information then imparted to him was credible; therefore, no wonder he may be acquitted though he ought not to be acquitted because he had abused his powers. Therefore, the proposed amendment on this ground also seems to be a justifiable one. Now as to the words, 'reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned.' Here again the police officer has been given an opportunity to abuse his powers, when he has arrested an innocent man without warrant and without authority or without orders taken from a Magistrate, and if he is hauled up, he would say simply 'Well, the suspicion which arose in my mind was reasonable.' Therefore here too he will have room to save his skin and get an escape, in spite of his having abused his powers. The intention of this Assembly is that the police officer may not arrest an innocent man, that he may be made to perform his duty honestly and properly, that these provisions may not be misconstrued and that his powers may not be abused by him. Therefore, Sir, with that intention this amendment has been moved which, to my mind, seems to be a commendable one. The safeguard, contained within the terms of this amendment, is this: that if the powers of a police officer to arrest without a warrant and without an order of a Magistrate are limited to the scope of this amendment, then he may realize a little more responsibility; not forgetting that he has to establish that the offence was committed to his knowledge—or in his view, that is, in his presence. Therefore he will, probably, not abuse his powers so freely as he may do under the present law.

In the present provision we find the words 'reasonable suspicion'.

3 P.M. The amendment means to provide that the suspicion should be based on material facts. A person comes forward and tells a police officer that a certain cognizable offence has been committed by a certain man. Well, here he has got material facts, a person bears testimony to that allegation. In these circumstances, he may exercise his power and arrest without warrant or without an order of a Magistrate, otherwise not. So the fear of the Government that this Assembly wishes to see the police deprived of its powers is wrong. All that this Assembly wants is that those powers may be exercised within reasonable scope, and there should be an idea of greater responsibility in the minds of the police officers. With this object this amendment has been placed before this House, and I submit that this House may wholeheartedly support it.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, my first words must be of sincere congratulations to the Honourable the Law Member on the clear exposition that he has placed before the House which would remove many doubts. Like a past master of drawing red herrings, however, he has obscured realisation of the circumstances that provoked this amendment. The Government had powers; the police had powers. Those powers are now sought to be extended. (Cries of 'No, No.') I beg your pardon. Those powers are now sought to be extended

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: In this clause 1?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: No, by the amendment that the Government has invited the House to adopt. Let us read the Government amendment: 'ninthly, any person for whose arrest a requisition has been received from another police officer, provided that the requisition specifies the person to be arrested and the offence or other cause for which the arrest is to be made and it appears therefrom that the person might lawfully be arrested without a warrant by that officer'. The next amendment is in sub-clause (3) of clause 11. It reads thus: 'The term 'police officer' in this section shall be deemed to include such village officers as may be either generally or specially authorised by the Local Government in this behalf'. It is therefore not merely a head constable, a writer constable or a constable who can effect arrest, but the filtration downwards is to be to the village officer, whatever that may mean, whether he is to be the village police officer or the village headman about whom under a previous clause we were discussing this morning, whether that officer would also have this vicarious right of issuing a warrant and assuming magisterial functions as it were will probably be a matter of interpretation. Therefore, I say, and deliberately say that here is an attempt to extend the powers of the police. The police had 8 clauses of powers under section 54, in the corresponding old section, under which Mr. Justice Markby's decision just read out by the Law Member was given. For whatever reasons that have not been disclosed yet, although three Government Members have already spoken, Government wants this further power, that the police officer who exercises powers under the first clause of section 54 shall also have the power of calling upon a neighbouring police officer to execute a warrant which a magistrate perhaps under proper circumstances might have issued or might have declined to issue. Then under the category of police officers comes the village officer, whatever that may mean. That, I believe, is the handle, the cause, the provocation of Mr. Sen's amendment. I agree that it is not a very happily worded amendment and that can be improved. If the House be with Mr. Sen on the substance of it, the little burden of putting it into shape consequential and otherwise that Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith so much deprecates will not, I am sure, be found too heavy for the department. Unfortunately, there is the clause 7 of section 54 which Mr. Sen has not thought of. Reading that clause 7, Sir, and the proposed ninth clause, one would almost think that the Government wanted really an amendment like this to existing clause 7. 'Any person who has been concerned in, or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made or credible information has been received, or a reasonable suspicion exists, of his having been concerned in, any act committed at any place out of British India (Voice: 'Any act which if committed in British India.') Let me please put my case in my own way, and the House will then be able to deal with it.

This further power in the proposed section 9 would really be extending the scope of the power already possessed under clause 7. That is my submission with regard to it. There is and can be absolutely no difference of opinion between those who are defending the present clause (1) and those who are wanting to amend it in the way that Mr. Sen wants to amend it, that the police must have some powers, as provided in that clause already. The only question is whether under the circumstances some revision and modification is not necessary. Mr. Sen's amendment according to some, errs on the side of not asking for too much. (Cries of 'Quite so, he does err.') Now let us see why so much considerable stress has been laid by the Honourable the Law Member, and rightly laid, upon the safeguards that are already there. Mr. Sen does not do away with any of those safeguards. We have quite a good residuum left of the safeguards that the Honourable the Law Member so rightly values. For example, if credible information exists against a person, he is not exempted; there is no quarrel there. Then with regard to suspicion, what is attempted to be done here is to have the matter cleared up. Although there have been judicial interpretations with regard to the expression 'reasonable suspicion,' there has been abuse also which is attempted to be guarded against. Therefore what Mr. Sen desires is that that suspicion should not be left to belief, imagination or information, but should be capable of being justified by material facts brought home to the police officer. Therefore here also the police power is not seriously attempted to be weakened but is sought to be broad-based upon facts. All that he attempts to do away with (and he has given reasons in the light of the two cases that he has quoted) is that with regard to what the clause terms 'reasonable complaint' this power should be taken away and in its place he wants to substitute this that the offences should have been committed to his knowledge or in his presence,—I suppose he will be prepared to accept that verbal amendment if the House is with him on the substance of it. The police officer will still have the right of arrest when the offence has been committed to his 'knowledge' of the character and basis of which he will still be the sole judge. That is large power by itself. If the police officer is prepared to say, it was within his knowledge, he is not liable for that action for damages about which Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith told us this morning. Then we have the concession in Mr. Sen's clauses about commission of offences in his presence: that goes without question. Therefore, all that this amendment seeks to attack is where the question of arrest on what is called reasonable complaint comes. There seems to be some difference of opinion as to how that expression ought to be construed. I myself am not inclined to the view that that 'complaint' in this clause is the same complaint within the definition of complaint in section 4. If that was not so, the word 'reasonable' would not have found place in this clause; the word 'complaint' would have been enough. But we have seen from what Mr. Sen has told us that because there has been a 'complaint' as defined in section 4 before a Magistrate upon which he sent it to the police for inquiry or for disposal or otherwise, the police proceeds to copy the words of that complaint in the information book and use that as evidence of the existence of a reasonable complaint though the Magistrate himself was not clear whether it was reasonable or not. That could not have been contemplated by clause 1 of section 54, even by the framers of it. Sir Malcolm Hailey twice asked Mr. Sen as to whether those cases that he had referred to had been decided by the High Courts or not. They appear to be still sub-judice and Mr. Sen would have no right to refer to them if what we are here discussing was the point in issue. That however is not so; the issues in the appeal are quite different. We have those facts from these cases and upon those facts are we entitled to say or not that where difference of opinion is likely to exist on a matter like this, it is best that the chances of such difference should be done away with. We want to substitute a clause under which a police officer would have the right of arrest where an offence has been committed to his knowledge or in his presence or about which he has credible information. About the terms 'reasonable complaint' and 'information' there is some confusion and that may be set at rest by Mr. Sen's clause, of course, with proper verbal amendments, so far as the police is concerned. They are interchangeable terms under certain circumstances and that is not desirable. You can have no quarrel with this for you have that residue left that, where credible information has been received, a police officer can act. As regards action under suspicion the suspicion has to be supported according to Mr. Sen's amendment by material facts. How can it then be contended that this is an attempt to take away necessary and healthy powers of the police. It is only to clear up matters, particularly in view of the larger powers that the Government is now wanting to take, namely, of making it possible for the police officer under clause one to transmit his knowledge, his information, his suspicion, to the neighbouring police officer and ask him to take up the case in the neighbouring district and effect an arrest. And that becomes particularly irksome where the village officer or village police officer is also to be entrusted with those powers. We have been asked not to be governed by sentimental prejudice against the police. It is unfortunately there and you cannot help it. And when you want to extend the scope of the power of these police officers, there is a natural desire to have them restricted if possible. If without hurting the cause of strict public administration and of law, order and justice, it can be done, I see no reason why it should not be allowed by this Assembly. Therefore, in substance, so far as one can see, the Government can have no quarrel with Mr. Sen's amendment and if it is properly drafted and put on the Statute Book, I think that the Government will have all the power that it wants and all the power that it has so long enjoyed and more.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): Sir, I do not agree with the last speaker that the clause as drafted by Government gives any greater powers to them than before. But some of the Members of this Assembly who belong to the legal profession appear to be under the impression that the existing clause as drafted in the Bill will permit of a number of innocent people being arrested. Now, as far as I have listened to this debate, no one has produced any evidence that the existing powers of the police have been abused. Have the Honourable Members who support this amendment any evidence which can convince this House that the existing clause has resulted in miscarriage of judgment which has not been remedied? Do not the existing powers give a safeguard against arrest where reasonable suspicion or credible information do not exist? Now, Sir, we, as Members of this Indian Legislative Assembly, are legislating for the benefit of the people of India. We must see, I think, that guilty people do not escape easily, whilst we provide security—as I consider is provided in this Bill—that innocent people falsely arrested should be able to obtain restitution and satisfaction. For these reasons, Sir, and because I believe that the clause as drafted by those who have been engaged in the drafting of this Bill does provide all safeguards necessary for innocent people whilst protecting the majority of the citizens of this country by seeing that guilty people should be arrested without being able to easily escape arrest, I oppose this amendment.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): Sir, I think it is clear that the idea underlying this amendment is that it should not be possible for a policeman to arrest an alleged or supposed offender on mere suspicion, surmise, or whim or to serve a private end. But, Sir, it is equally clear that the amendment as drafted does not secure this purpose, especially as the expression 'in his view' may mean anything of the kind. Sir, there is also another side of the picture. If a policeman is not empowered to arrest an offender on suspicion, many a miscreant will be able to make good his escape while the police are busy gathering materials to justify their conduct on arresting him. In these circumstances, Sir, I hope the Honourable Mover of this amendment will see his way to withdraw the proposal.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the question before the House—that is, the amendment which my friend, Mr. Sen, has put before the House tends to make the powers of a police officer to arrest without a warrant subject to certain restrictions. He has now under the present law practically an unrestrained power to arrest a man. That is the difference between the two views. The view of the Government is that that power which he has now should continue. The view of those who support the amendment is that we should put some restraint, we should curb the powers of a policeman to arrest without a warrant. That is the issue. I heard some remarks from the Honourable the Law Member about the irrelevant points that have been raised in this debate. It so happens that those who give these precepts violate them in the first instance. One of these irrelevant points was that this law has existed for several decades. Now, what is the view, what is the position in regard to criminal law in any country? As times advance, as Government becomes more popular, the tendency is to lighten the rigours of the criminal law. Do you know how many offences were punishable by death by hanging in England 150 years ago? What is the number of offences that is now punishable with death? Could we use the argument that because the sentence of death had existed for five centuries for certain offence, therefore it should continue for all those offences for ever? Forgery was one of the offences, theft of certain articles was one of the offences punishable with death. Therefore the argument which has been put forward by the Honourable the Law Member so very seriously at the end of the debate that this law has existed for decades and therefore must be continued cannot hold good. Is the criminal law the law of the Medes and the Persians? Should it continue for ever? Should not an Assembly like this, which is in touch with the pulse of the country, which knows how the police act, which knows what lack of supervision there exists over the actions of the police and over the actions of the Magistracy, should not this Assembly take upon itself and face the responsibility of curbing the unrestrained powers of the police? The argument of my Honourable friend, Mr. Spence, is that the guilty man should be punished. Whoever says that the guilty man ought not to be punished? Whoever says that the guilty man ought not to be restrained? Only we say be sure of the guilt of the man, have more sound materials for saying that the man is guilty, not on mere suspicion entertained.

Mr. R. A. Spence: Reasonable suspicion.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Is it mere suspicion?

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Yes.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: No, reasonable suspicion.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: What is it?

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Reasonable suspicion.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: What is the meaning of 'reasonable'? What are the safeguards for enforcing the reasonable character of that suspicion? I have to go to another point well known for students of elementary law. A law is good enough so far as there is a sanction to enforce the law. There is no good having a law on the Statute Book if you cannot enforce the law. Who is to decide that the suspicion which the policeman had in arresting a man was reasonable?

Mr. R. A. Spence: The Court.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Which Court? How to enter the Court? Do you know that you must get the permission of that very policeman's superior to enter the portals of the Court? That is a point which the Honourable the Law Member omitted to consider. When he read the section of the Penal Code, I was wondering whether we were in a debating society of which we were reminded very seriously yesterday—whether we were in a debating society without knowledge of law, without knowledge of juristic principles, without the knowledge that the criminal law has been evolved in the manner it has been from decade to decade, from period to period. Now, you have got a section in the Penal Code under which a policeman could be punished for doing a wrong. But how could you reach the Court? You must get the permission of that policeman's superior. Have you ever heard of the superior of a policeman or of any Government servant giving permission to a private individual to prosecute his subordinate in a Court?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It does occur.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: That is the point. Therefore, there is a law which we cannot enforce, which by the restrictions is practically an unapproachable remedy. Therefore, that argument of the decade, that argument of the section of the Penal Code having been there for several years has no force.

Now, there was another argument which is usually put forward in debating societies, and that has come from the Government side. I am sorry to see that the Government should be so lacking as to support their position by arguments which would be useful in a debating society. The terms in which my Honourable friend, Mr. Sen, has worded his amendment have been criticised. There has been verbal criticism, quibbling criticism of the words used. What is the Secretariat for? A popular Assembly indicates the view it takes of a particular portion of the criminal law. That is all we are bound to do. We are not draftsmen trained to draft laws. No popular Assembly, no Legislative Assembly undertakes to be meticulous in the words it could use in the law. It is the duty of the draftsman. They are paid to do it and they are there to do it. I wonder why that argument was put forward that the words of the amendment were not very accurate and not very precise. You indicate what you want. You want to make the law more legal. You want to restrain the powers of the policeman. Well, I have consulted some friends and if the House accepts the principle underlying this amendment, I would suggest a slight verbal modification. Whether it is acceptable or not, I will read it and I would leave the House to say whether it accepts it. Any person who has to his knowledge or in his view committed any cognizable offence or against whom credible information has been received or there is reasonable cause for suspicion of his having been concerned in any such offence—well, that is the point, that is, the present law is this: 'reasonable suspicion' is replaced by 'reasonable cause for suspicion.' Now 'reasonable cause for suspicion' will narrow down the discretion of the policeman, as I understand it,—that is reasonable suspicion. Now, after all, there is only a slight difference between the law as it exists and the amendment proposed by Mr. Sen. I do not see why so much trouble should be raised, so much opposition should be raised in regard to this slight alteration. It, after all, controls a set of men who are not known to use their powers for the safety of the public or for the preservation of respect for the people of this country. Everybody here knows that policemen, especially in out of the way places, do misuse their powers. The attempt is now made to restrain those powers. The amendment proposed does not materially diminish the power of the policeman to arrest a guilty man. Now in regard to this arrest of a guilty man, I would ask the European Members of this House, is it not a fact that in England arrest is the last thing that is done when an offence is committed? That is, all the materials are collected, and the man who investigates becomes quite sure that he has the materials to put the case before the Magistrate, that is, he is quite sure that the man is guilty; he prepares the ground properly, and then at the last moment, arrests. Is not that the case? What do we find in India? The first thing that a policeman does is, he goes and arrests. Whether he has got the materials or not, whether he has sufficient grounds for establishing a case against the man, the first thing he does is, he arrests, and then takes his time leisurely. The law allows him a certain time, 15 days or so, later on he begins to collect his materials. What is the Magistrate to do? The policeman tells the Magistrate, 'I am investigating the case, Sir, I am collecting materials; I am preparing the ground; I believe; and so on, and so on.' Well, I put it to the European Members of this House that the methods which the policeman in England adopts are quite different from the methods which are adopted here. It is no use running away with the idea that this Assembly, or at any rate those Members who are in support of the amendment, want to let off the guilty man. We are as much interested in the protection of our property and the protection of the lives and the safety of our fellowmen as anybody else in this House, and it is simply ridiculous to be told that we do not interest ourselves in the protection of property and of life.

Therefore this is not a question of sentiment or prejudice. This is a question which the natural evolution of criminal law should take, that is, to restrain the powers of a policeman in regard to this matter. This, Sir, is a verbal alteration which I offer to the House in place of what Mr. Sen has put in. This is the amendment which I formally present. . . . 'No person who has to his knowledge. . . .'

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is for your ruling, Sir, whether amendments are permissible at this stage.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: It is not very much of an amendment. It is only a verbal alteration. If it is opposed or seriously objected to. . .

Mr. Deputy President: If it is only a verbal alteration it might be allowed, but no new amendment can be allowed at this stage. The Bill has been before the Legislature for the last two years and in September it was before this House. In December a notice was sent out to all the Members to send in their amendments.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: I may say at once, Sir, that that is not an amendment in the sense of an ordinary amendment. I say, if the House accepts the principle underlying the amendment which Mr. Sen has put before it, then this draft which I have given in is merely an attempt to rectify certain alleged verbal defects.

Mr. Deputy President: Does Mr. Sen withdraw his amendment?

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: No.

Mr. Deputy President: This is an amendment to your amendment.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: I do not think so.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): I rise to a point of order. The view of several Members here appears to me to be that though the amendment proposed by my friend, Mr. Sen, is in substance a good one, it needs verbal alteration, which might be done, I suggest, in the drafting Department. But as the amendment which has been put in by my friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, has drawn forth some protest, may I inquire if the substance of the amendment of Mr. Sen is carried, will the amendment go to the drafting Department for redrafting, or will it stand as it is proposed? It seems to me that the form of the language used by Mr. Sen does need a little alteration.

Mr. Deputy President: That can hardly be called a point of order. It is a question which the Government can answer.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammad Rural): The alteration proposed by my friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, includes the words 'or in his view,' to which I think the whole House does not agree. There is at least a difference of opinion that 'in his view' does not mean 'in his presence'. The words 'to his knowledge' may include the sense 'in his presence'; whereas 'in his view' might be construed as 'in his opinion,' and that I think would do a great deal more harm than the present section does.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: I used the words 'in view' in the sense in which they are used in section 59 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr. Deputy President: The original amendment moved was:

'That in clause 11 (1) before the words 'To sub-section' insert the following:

'For clause "first" in sub-section (1) of section 54 the following clause shall be substituted:

'First, any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom a credible information has been received or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned', to which a further amendment has been moved by Mr. Subrahmanayam and that is:

'That in clause 11 (1) before the words 'To sub-section' insert the following:

'For clause "first" in sub-section (1) of section 54 the following clause shall be substituted:

'First, any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom credible information has been received or there is reasonable cause for suspicion of his having been concerned in any such offence',

The question is that that (Mr. Subrahmanayam's) amendment be made.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: With your permission, Sir, I shall further propose a slight amendment, viz., that the word 'presence' be substituted for the word 'view'.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: I accept that the word 'view' be changed to 'presence'. The word 'view' may be dropped and the word 'presence' inserted.

Mr. Deputy President: Mr. Subrahmanayam's amendment is before the House now.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: Is Mr. Hussanally's amendment before the House?

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: That has been accepted by the Mover.

Mr. Deputy President: That point will be taken later on after this question has been decided.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Have I leave to speak on the original amendment, Sir?

Mr. Deputy President: Yes.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Speaking for myself, Sir, I have no hesitation whatever in expressing my entire sympathy with the object which the Honourable Mover of the amendment has in view in putting it forward; and I think I may safely say that his object will have the sympathy of this House generally, viz., a protection of the general public from what I may put in a general term well known here as 'police zoolam.'

But there are things beyond the reach even of this Honourable Assembly and the Legislature; and protection from the dishonest or the extortionate policeman is one of them. Law is not a panacea for all the ills that flesh is heir to. No doubt it is our business as a House to legislate from time to time so as to promote the public interest and check abuses that may grow up among us; but I would ask this Honourable House to remember that we are here as a corporate body, saddled with a responsibility to the whole country for what we shape into law. We are not here to give indulgence to prejudices which all of us, or the majority of us, or some of us, or a few of us, may entertain. Those who know this country are bound to confess that police zoolam, with all that that term means, does exist. We are also constrained to admit that in this country there is a great deal of popular prejudice against the police which is not always deserved. Now my submission for the consideration of the House is this that, so far as a legislative enactment of this kind is concerned—a Procedure Code—we are wise if we leave well alone. That is a very old saying: 'leave well alone'. I would go a little further and say that in legislation of this kind we would also be wise to leave unwell alone, unless we can be quite sure that we can make it better. We have had an extremely clear and able exposition of section 54 of the Code as it now stands by the Honourable the Law Member; but there is no doubt, those of us who know the country are bound to say so,—that, notwithstanding the safeguards which exist, and have been pointed out by the Honourable the Law Member, powers of arrest are abused. We have got to recognise that fact. We are not to-day considering in any general sense whether we can improve on that position by legislation. We have to see whether the introduction of the particular amendment which is now proposed will effect any improvement; and on that point I would ask attention while I humbly examine that amendment. We will take it that the words 'or in his view' are now cut out. The amendment is first — 'any person, who has to his knowledge committed any cognizable offence'

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): 'In his presence.'

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: I understood the elimination of the word 'view' had been accepted.

Mr. Pyari Lal: In favour of 'in his presence.'

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Very well: 'in his presence.' That, on the face of it, is of course, a limitation on the powers of the investigating officer.

For, as a general rule a criminal does not commit a cognizable offence in such a way as to give knowledge (using that word as distinguished from mere belief) to, or in the sight of or in the presence of, a police officer. It will be a restriction; but that does not help us. What we have got to look at is the end of this amendment. The amendment would still leave it open to the police officer to arrest any person whenever he has 'a suspicion based on material facts.' Those words are to be substituted for the words 'reasonable suspicion.' Now, Sir, I take it that this Legislature in its responsible position will not content itself with a mere bandying of words which do not carry us any further in the matter of law. What is a material fact? All the High Courts in the country will be called upon to decide, if this amendment becomes law, what are 'material facts.' After all, what is a 'reasonable suspicion?' A reasonable suspicion, as we 'gentlemen of the legal fraternity' (as we are so often called) know, means the existence of facts which would rouse suspicion in the mind of a reasonable man. Now, are not such facts material facts? Suppose a constable at 4 o'clock in the morning, when all Judges and superior officers are usually sound asleep, sees a man coming out of a lane with a bundle under his arm and the man attempts to hurry by. The constable suspects, by reason of the hour, by reason of the attitude of the man, and by reason of the direction from which the man is coming, that that bundle may contain stolen property. Thereupon, he exercises his power to interfere with the man's liberty. Now, is that a reasonable suspicion or is it a suspicion based upon material facts? You cannot differentiate the one from the other. A reasonable suspicion is a suspicion based on material facts. Material facts are those facts which would make any reasonable man suspicious. I will put myself in the position of the dishonest policeman, and I promise to find you material facts for suspicion at once. You cannot stop it. If the police officer is dishonest, he will find his material facts every time. He is the only one there; there is nobody else. He says 'This man was going off, he had his face concealed.' The man says 'a cold wind was blowing, that is why I concealed my head.' But, says the policeman, 'I thought he was concealing it to hide his identity. That was a material fact; on that I acted and I therefore arrested him.' You cannot by a mere alteration of words as proposed get out of such difficulties. A policeman must be given a certain amount of liberty and discretion if we are to have the midnight criminal stopped. You cannot get out of it. This House must legislate on the basis of one principle or of another; either upon the assumption that every policeman is a scoundrel until the contrary is proved, or upon the assumption that all our police are just and honest people trying to do their duty. We have got to take something like that as a basis for legislation; and obviously there is no choice between the two. If we are to be a progressive country we must proceed upon the latter as a basis of legislation, i.e., with a trust in our agents, which, albeit constantly abused, must nevertheless still be given, as it is the only means, added to public opinion, which will raise them to the level at which we would have them. A very uncomplimentary comparison to the Indian policeman was drawn in connection with the English Police. It is too wide a subject to go into, but even in England policemen sometimes are accused of doing zoolum. I daresay all my hearers will remember a very recent case where the activities of a septuagenarian in Hyde Park led to a certain case which was afterwards regarded by some as a case of police zoolum. Opinions are divided. Some think perhaps the old gentleman was weak, others that it was purely police oppression. These things will happen. Individual cases cannot be allowed to sway us in laying down a general rule of law. If we do that we shall get into endless trouble. This amendment, I submit with confidence, will not achieve the very desirable object which the Honourable Mover wants to achieve; and for that reason I do not think that it ought to commend itself to the House. Do not let us tinker with words and alter words which have been the subject of much judicial deliberation. If superior officers will not allow section 220, Indian Penal Code, to be given full scope, let public opinion come down on the superior officers, let public opinion and public courage insist that they shall do so. We can make them do these things out here, as we make them do them in England. The times are moving rapidly. A strong public opinion is growing up, and section 220 really offers the only sort of legislative protection which we can obtain. Therefore I would suggest to the Honourable Mover, even at this late stage, to consider whether he should press this amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I should be unwilling to add to the length of this discussion, were it not that in its later stages it has taken a turn which I think requires comment from Government; indeed an attitude has been adopted which may affect the whole course of our subsequent debates on the cognate sections of this Bill. You will remember, Sir, how the discussion began. I think I may safely put it to the Honourable Mover, that the major part of his attack on the existing section of the Code was based on his fear that in some cases a police constable might override a Magistrate—that is to say, that where a Magistrate has issued orders under section 202 for the investigation of a case, being in doubt as to the necessity of proceeding further with a complaint, the constable might take the matter into his own hands and arrest the person against whom the complaint had been made. I see that I have the assent of the Honourable Mover to my claim that I have stated his position perfectly clearly and correctly. He founded his apprehension on two cases which he quoted to us. Now in both of those cases it appears to me that the constable had been guilty of much more than an irregularity. He had been guilty of an act of sheer stupidity, and I found on inquiry from the Honourable Mover that in both these cases the Courts did not support the action of the offending constable. In other words, they found the wording of the existing Act sufficient and that the action taken by the constable was not covered by the Act.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: But he did take it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: True; he took it. But does the Honourable Mover think that by his own wording, or by any other wording which we can introduce, we can prevent the committing of acts of sheer stupidity? See what the constable did in one of these cases. He took the complaint as it came from the Magistrate for investigation, transferred it to his diary and took action to arrest the person referred to. I defy the wisest legislators to frame a law that will entirely prevent manifest absurdities of this nature being committed. My present point is however that these were the two cases which the Honourable Member put before us, and it was on considerations arising out of these two cases that the discussion started in the first instance. But we found when the discussion proceeded, that after all, the word 'complaint' in this section of the Code does not bear the restricted sense given in the definition section, viz., 4 (h) of the Code, viz., a complaint to a Magistrate, but really refers to a complaint or information to the police. That fact has been generally admitted by those who have subsequently commented upon this section. Consequently, therefore, the omission of these words of which the Honourable Mover complained—'against whom a reasonable complaint has been made'—would not attain the purpose that he himself had in putting his case before us. Indeed, it is perfectly clear that if we wished to attain the object which he had in view we should have to insert some substantive provision to prevent anybody taking action in the sense deprecated by the Honourable Member. That position indeed was put before us with great clearness by Mr. Pantulu. Unfortunately the matter did not stop there. We could perfectly well have discussed this restricted point and come to conclusions either for or against the Honourable Mover. The discussion went entirely away from this point, it embraced attacks of a general nature on the police, and we have been told that in the objections which we put forward to any change in the section, we were deprecating a modification of the law because we feared that what Mr. Subrahmanyan describes as the unrestrained power of the police in effecting arrests might be curtailed. We were told that this section must be materially modified in other respects for the purpose of curtailing the powers of the police where and if necessary. We were told that Government itself showed an entirely unreasonable apprehension lest the powers of the police, powers widely abused by them, should be invaded. Now I say that we are all equally concerned in preventing what has been called police tyranny. If such existed, it would do Government no good; in the long run it does not administer to the cause of law and order; it creates an irritation in the mind of the public which in itself is detrimental to the development of a spirit of law and order, and you cannot hope to obtain law and order unless you secure a spirit making for its observance.

If we can do anything as a Legislature, if we can do anything as a Government to prevent oppression not only by police, but by any of our officials, we should do so; even if we did not wish to do so in the interests of the public, common sense would indicate to us that we ought to do so in our own interests as an administration. Believe me, Sir, any opposition that we have had to this amendment has not been motivated, as Mr. Subrahmanyan has suggested, by an untimely desire on our part to retain in the hands of the police powers which they can and do abuse. What is the real reason why we objected? It was simply this: that we believed that the powers of the police under the Mover's suggestion would not be materially affected either for good or ill; on the other hand, we believed that the drafting of the section as put forward by him would be materially defective. We believed that where a section had stood the test of the Courts for a number of years, it was better to leave it standing, than to effect modifications in it, unless some very grave and substantial reason was shown for doing so. I quite agree, as Mr. Subrahmanyan said, that law must be progressive and that where we find that it requires modification, that modification must be carried out. But we could not see

4 P.M. that the amendment in itself carried out any improvement of the law which had been demanded by the public, or that in itself it effected any such clearing up of doubts arising under the section and pointed out to us by our many legal advisers as required its modification or elucidation. As Sir Henry Stanyon has justly said, we have as a House a very heavy burden laid upon us in regard to this Bill. I am sorry that there have been references to the Government point of view, and to the point of view of other people. I should like to regard ourselves in enacting this piece of legislation not as two parties but as one.

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

possessing only a common object. If you take the history of the Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment) Bill, it will be clear that what we set out to do here was really not to increase the powers of Government or the administration or the police, not to take larger powers in regard to action under the criminal law, but simply to clear up doubts, remove inconsistencies, and to bring the law generally up to date. That has one object in putting the Bill forward, and the country at large and the Courts will criticise the action of the House, as a whole, if we make modifications in the law which are themselves difficult of interpretation, which introduce without substantial reason new phrases or turns to the law as for many generations administered by the Courts, or which, by creating fresh field for legal discussion, involve further delays in the Courts. To that extent we should actually impair the cause of justice and therefore harass the subject. I am sorry to find that Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary actually was swayed by the thought that in adding one sub-clause to this section we were proposing to take larger powers. We ourselves have regarded the small addition of sub-clause (9) and the small addition of sub-clause (3) as quite unimportant matters, and I think the House at large, which among the many other amendments put forward in regard to other sections, has practically neglected these two clauses, shows thereby that it takes the same view. The mere fact that we have proposed to take the powers in clause 9 and sub-clause (3) should not therefore be allowed to count against us in considering this particular section.

Now let me take for a minute, not what our existing clause in the Code is, for that has been very clearly elucidated by the Honourable the Law Member, but merely the proposals as they now stand in Mr. Subrahmanayam's version of the Honourable Mover's amendment. It will be seen that he now proposes in effect really to retain the latter part of the existing section, but to alter the first part, that is to say, he would omit 'any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence.' Now I merely put to this House, without enlarging again on aspects of the case to which the Honourable the Law Member has already called attention.—I merely put to the House that if a person has not actually been concerned in any cognizable offence, the arrest is in itself unlawful, and the utmost that we can do in our law is to lay down the general circumstances in which arrests can be made, with of course the corollary that if they are made in spite of the proscriptions of the law, they are unlawful. I must ask Mr. Subrahmanayam in that particular connection where and how it is that the sanction of a superior police authority is necessary for the prosecution of a police officer who makes an unlawful arrest? There are many lawyers here. They can perhaps, if Mr. Subrahmanayam is not prepared to supply me with the information, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: If he is a superior officer coming under section 197, perhaps sanction may be needed.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Perhaps; but we were certainly not talking of superior police officers, and the House knows it. Mr. Subrahmanayam told us that all these safeguards that have been talked about were entirely insufficient. He told us that the Law Member was indulging in mere debating society talk because, after all, if an unlawful arrest was made by a constable, the sanction of some superior authority was needed for a prosecution to be undertaken against such officer; and he asked us when such sanction for prosecution was likely to be given or has actually been given. Now, that point was made dogmatically and emphatically; but I still have to pause for a reply as to the section under which such sanction is required. I have not yet received it. I must therefore take it then that that statement, designed as it was to prejudice the debate against Government, was made without due thought by the gentleman who made it. But let me go back to my original point. 'Any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence.' Therefore, he must actually have been concerned in such cognizable offence for arrest to be lawful; and I ask if this is an unreasonable provision of law. The second point the Mover proposes to omit is 'against whom a reasonable complaint has been made.' I have dealt at some length with the exact reason why he wished to omit that sentence and I pointed out that it is perfectly clear from the subsequent course of the discussion, that the word 'complaint' does not bear the technical meaning which the Mover attached to it; it merely refers to the complaint to a police officer; I have proved that the exclusion of the sentence would not attain the purpose which he himself seeks to effect. The rest of the clause, as now proposed, stands very much as it is in the Act; and I ask, is it worth while in the circumstances to make a serious change of this nature? I would again emphasize the point that the attitude which we take up is not one of dogmatic assertion that we must keep up the full powers of the police. The attitude we take up is this, that where you have a law of procedure administered for years in one clear sense by the higher Courts, thoroughly understood by the Courts below, it is not advisable for this Assembly lightly to introduce changes; for the Courts, looking narrowly at every word of the law, will suppose that there is some deliberate and perhaps novel meaning behind every change that you make. They will put their own interpretation on the omission of a word here and the insertion of a word there. And the consequence will be that a fresh series of doubts will arise in the minds of the Courts, a fresh series of judicial interpretations and, in consequence, a fresh cause of delay and difficulty in the administration of justice.

An Honourable Member: I move that the question be now put.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the question be now put.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: Just a word of explanation, Sir.

Mr. Deputy President: You have no right of reply.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: Regarding the question of sanction.

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid I cannot allow that. I can only allow you to speak on a matter of explanation.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I have your permission for one more word? The point is very important to us for, I think, prejudice has been created against us. Section 197 does not apply to the cases to which reference was made.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The original question was:

'That in clause 11 (1) before the words 'To sub-section' insert the following:

'For clause "first" in sub-section (1) of section 54 the following clause shall be substituted:

'First, any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom a credible information has been received or a suspicion based on material facts exists of his having been so concerned.'

[Mr. Deputy President.]

Since which an amendment has been moved :

'That for the words 'first, any person' down to 'so concerned' the following be substituted :

'First, any person who has, to his knowledge or in his view, committed any cognizable offence or against whom credible information has been received or reasonable cause for suspicion exists of his having been concerned in any such offence'.

The question is that that amendment be made

Mr. Deputy President: If the House has not accepted it, the amendment must be put in its original form.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

Mr. Deputy President then called on Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur to move Amendment No. 17.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I rise to a point of order, Sir. Has not the House in substance already disposed of this amendment?

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur: That is what I want myself to submit to the House. I want to submit that in view of the fact that Amendment No. 16 has been lost, I seek permission of this House to withdraw Amendment No. 17 standing in my name.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Bhai Man Singh: The amendment that stands in my name is:

"In clause 11 insert the following new sub-clause and re-number the present sub-clauses (1) and (2) as (2) and (3) respectively:

"(1) In section 54, subsection (1), the clause secondly shall be omitted; and in clause fourthly the word 'and' shall be substituted for the word 'or'."

Mr. Deputy President: It will be for the convenience of the House if you move your amendments separately.

Bhai Man Singh: Yes, I shall move them separately. The first part of the amendment is that the clause secondly of section 54 shall be omitted. The clause reads:—"Any person having in his possession without lawful excuse, the burden of proving which excuse shall lie on such person, any implement of house-breaking."

Why I want this clause to be omitted is that, in the first place, we should see what are the implements for house-breaking. So far as I know, in my own Province I have come across only one implement of house-breaking, that is a 'Sandhewa' or 'Sabhal,' an iron piece perhaps a bit thinner than my arm and a little shorter at the end. I do not know if there are any other implements, but if there are, they are also probably iron rods something like a Sandhewa though a little different from it. The sandheera is an article which is used in every home for ordinary household purposes, for digging earth and doing other little jobs. I doubt if in the Punjab every zemindar has not got that thing in his house, and it is really terrible if a police officer is to be allowed to arrest a man without a warrant for possessing that sandheera. I am really sorry that the Honourable the Law Member, Sir Muhammad Shafi, is not now present in the House. I do not know whether he possesses a sandheera or not but I am sure that he would have borne me out that every zemindar in the Punjab, perhaps every zemindar in his own village, must possess that sandheera and must be using it for digging the earth. If a man is caught with that sandheera and he is required to prove—and the burden of proof shall be on him—that he possesses it for quite innocent purposes, it would be a terrible thing. It is a provision under which the police can harass anybody, perhaps a most innocent and a most respectable man.

The other point about it is this. Supposing a man is arrested by a police officer without a warrant for possessing a sandheera, I should like to know what is he to do with that person. If a man is arrested under any of the other clauses there are some steps that have to be taken in connection with that person under the Code. If he is believed or if he is suspected to have committed a cognizable offence, the police officer will make enquiries about it. If the suspicions are found to be correct or well founded, he will chalan him. Similarly, if he is a person who has been proclaimed an offender, steps could be taken against him, and so on. If these suspicions are found to be wrong, the person arrested will be let off, but in the case of a person in possession of a sandheera if he is really found to be in possession of it, what will the police officer do? Can he proceed against him? Is there any provision of the law under which the possession of an implement like that is an offence? I know of a good many instruments, the possession of which is supposed to be an offence. If a man has got some instruments for making false coins, well, you can proceed against him; but, if you have arrested a person for possessing an implement under the clause, I would like to know how you would proceed against him. If you let him off, well, the arrest means nothing. If you arrest a man for possessing a sandheera, I would like to know if you would chalan him for some offence? There is no offence like that. What would you do with him? Keep him in jail for eternity? So, from the legal point of view itself, I see absolutely no way out of the difficulty, unless we frame a new offence for the possession of that implement.

Then, I can find absolutely no ruling under this clause, at least I have not come across any reported case under it; so that provision has, really speaking, been a dead letter up till now. Where is the necessity of having a provision which creates a difficulty in law and out of which we can find no way? If a man were produced before me within 24 hours of his arrest as a Magistrate, I must confess that I do not know what orders I would pass in the case. It is a provision which has remained a dead letter up till now, I do not see why such a provision should remain on the Statute Book.

With these remarks, Sir, I commend this amendment to the House.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, my friend, the Mover, has explained to us that he has three difficulties with regard to this amendment. His first difficulty was, he said, that he did not know what an implement of house-breaking was, and then I think he proceeded for about five minutes to exhibit a considerable amount of knowledge as to what implements are used for house-breaking. I do not profess to have such a full knowledge of them.

The section however refers to an 'implement of house-breaking,' which is possessed without lawful excuse. If the instrument is merely one that can be used for house-breaking—there is no kind of tool probably known to anyone which could not be used for house-breaking,—then there is no question of an arrest at all, unless it is a well-recognised house-breaking implement; this is all that comes within the meaning of this clause of section 54.

Bhai Man Singh's second difficulty was that he did not know what happened after the arrest. What is the police officer going to do? He seemed to contemplate that the police officer after arresting this man might confine him for an unlimited period. Well, Sir, if the Mover will look a few sections ahead in the Code he will find that no police officer shall retain in custody a person arrested without warrant for a longer period than under all the circumstances of the case is reasonable. Then it lays down that that period shall not in any case exceed 24 hours, unless he brings the accused before a Magistrate and gets a remand under section 167 of the Code. I think what happens is quite clear. The arrest is a preliminary step to an investigation. It may result in a prosecution under section 109 of this very Code. It may lead to a prosecution for some offence. The possession of a house-breaking implement might be corroborative of circumstances within the knowledge of the police officer. I do not think the Honourable Member or the House need be in any apprehension at all that this power of arrest will enable the police to keep a man in custody without sufficient cause—certainly not for more than 24 hours without the order of a Magistrate.

Bhai Man Singh: What will the Magistrate do?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Magistrate acts under section 167, if the Honourable Member will read it. We shall come to that section in due course,—I hope so at least—we are not getting very near it at present.

The Honourable Member's third difficulty was that he found no rulings on this point. Well, I think I can take that as an argument in my favour—in favour of retaining this clause in the law. If there are no rulings on the point, it is perfectly obvious that this clause, which has been included in the law for a long time, has never caused any difficulty. I do not think the amendment is at all desirable. I think the clause should stand as it is. Is this House prepared to have it go out to the world that they are not prepared to give to a police officer the power to arrest a person in whose hand the police officer sees a house-breaking implement?

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: I rise to support this amendment. I have often read this clause and tried to find out what practical use can be made of it. My friend has told us—which I also think is correct—that the matter has never been before the courts; there is no published ruling, at all events, on the point of what is an implement of house-breaking. A nail or a piece of wire may be used to pick a lock. A screw-driver may be used to unscrew a hasp; and ordinary iron rod used for digging—a well-known class of iron rod called sabhal in some places—may be used to break open a door. But are these implements of house-breaking? If this section has any sense it must refer to an instrument that is specially used and kept for house-breaking. I think myself that this is a provision derived, possibly, from English law, where burglars' tools, known by certain slang names, do exist. 'Implements of house-breaking' is a phrase that has some meaning to a British policeman, but has really no meaning in India.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It has a meaning in South India—we call it Kannakol.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: I am perhaps not sufficiently acquainted with all parts of India; but what we have to interpret is not the word 'Kannakol' but the words 'implement of house-breaking', and I would point out that a nail or a piece of wire may be an implement of house-breaking. Are we going to allow a police constable to arrest without warrant every person found with a nail in his hands?

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Without a lawful excuse.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Very well. Then the section also puts the onus of proof on the man who is in possession of the nail. He may not even know that it is in his possession; he cannot give any cause. 'Why have you got this nail?' 'I do not know.' 'Very well, then I arrest you.' How many of us can explain why we have got nails in the house? I say that a useless section like this merely cumbers the Code, and, as we are out to amend it, I support the amendment on the ground that the clause is useless in the interests of public justice and it may be harmful to the interests of public safety.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhalladman Rural): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was put and agreed to.

The amendment* was put and negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: The second part of my amendment reads:

"In clause fourthly the word 'and' shall be substituted for the word 'or'."

Clause (4) runs like this:

"Any person in whose possession anything is found which may reasonably be suspected to be stolen property or who may reasonably be suspected of having committed an offence with reference to such thing."

Now, there are two different positions taken under this clause. One is that any man who is in possession of property that is suspected of being stolen property can be arrested irrespective of the fact whether that man has come in possession of that property by fair or foul means, quite innocently or with any criminal act attached to it. The most respectable man who buys anything in the open market and who has got a receipt for having bought it can be arrested without a warrant by a police officer under this portion of the clause. The other portion deals with the question of all those who may reasonably be suspected of having committed an offence with reference to such a thing. I quite agree that if a person can reasonably be suspected of having committed an offence with respect to any thing, which is stolen property, he should by all means be arrested. But the clause as it at present stands means that any person who possesses a stolen property, however innocently he may have come in possession of it, can be arrested by a police officer without any warrant. My amendment is that if he is in possession of stolen property and he can be reasonably suspected of having committed an offence with reference to such thing, only in that circumstance he should be liable to be so arrested. Now, Sir, the object of the section is only to facilitate arrest of a person who can reasonably be suspected of being an offender. There is no reason in making a provision in law for arresting a person in respect of whom you cannot reasonably suspect that he has committed an offence. Under the clause as it at present stands, if the police officer sees that the gentleman who has a stolen property has got a duly signed receipt for it from the person who sold the property to him, and he has come in possession of that property innocently, even then the police officer has a right to arrest him. If such an innocent person is thus arrested, what is the result? Does it not mean sheer injustice to him? If you do not suspect a person to have committed an offence, there is no meaning in your arresting him. I may further state, Sir, that some of the Local Governments too seem to have understood this clause to mean that the person who is arrested is suspected of having committed some offence in respect of such thing, otherwise he should not be arrested. The Central Provinces Police Manual and the Madras Police Manual have provided that 'with regard to the seizure of property suspected to be stolen, it is to be observed that no such seizure must ever be made, except when there are strong and definite grounds for believing that the property must have been dishonestly come by, e.g., when jewels of large value are found with a person of mean condition and having no ostensible means of livelihood. It is not justifiable to seize valuables which are not identified as stolen property merely because the police officer who comes upon them in the course of a search has an unfavourable opinion of the character of the possessor. To raise a presumption of guilt, the possession of property believed to be stolen should be exclusive as well as recent'.

"In clause 11 insert the following new sub-clause and re-number the present sub-clauses (1) and (2) as (2) and (3) respectively:

'(1) In section 54, sub-section (1), the clause secondly shall be omitted.'

This itself shows, Sir, that some of the Local Governments while issuing these instructions also thought that arrests should be made under this clause only if the possession has been acquired by some criminal means. Therefore, I think that the clause, as it stands at present, gives the chance of an innocent man being arrested, but if amended, it does not give room for any guilty person to be left off because if there is a proper suspicion about a man being guilty and his having come in possession of the stolen property through some foul means, he is liable to be arrested. I request, Sir, that this amendment be made.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, the Mover of this amendment is trying to make both the conditions laid down in the clause necessary before an arrest can be made under this particular clause of section 54. At present, the police have the power to arrest a person in possession of an article which may reasonably be suspected to be stolen property, and they have the power to arrest a person who may reasonably be suspected of having committed an offence with reference to a thing in his possession—not stolen property. That is where the danger of this amendment comes in, because 'stolen property' of course has a technical meaning. We have to refer to section 410 of the Penal Code to find the definition of it:

'Property, the possession whereof has been transferred by theft, or by extortion, or by robbery, and property which has been criminally misappropriated, or in respect of which criminal breach of trust has been committed.'

That is designated stolen property. Well, there may be many other articles which are not stolen property—articles the possession of which has been transferred by cheating or there are things like forged currency notes, forged bank notes, counterfeit coins and so on. Why should the police not be allowed to arrest a person in possession of these articles if he can reasonably be suspected of having committed an offence with reference to them? It would make the position difficult if you tack on to this the fact that they must be also found to be in possession of the same. I think therefore there is some danger in making such an amendment, though it seems such a simple one, and I would ask the House to leave the law as it stands.

The amendment which my friend desires really is—though perhaps he is not aware of it—to restore the law to the form in which it stood up to 1897. It was deliberately altered in 1897. The word 'and' did occur in the Code of 1882 and because the provisions of that Code were found to be unduly restricted, in 1897, when the whole Code was consolidated and amended, the word 'or' was put in and I think the House will agree that the change was an improvement.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I fail to see how any person can be prosecuted or rather arrested under that clause unless the thing is found with him. The first requisite is that the thing must be found because the latter portion of that clause, to which the Honourable Sir Henry Monierieff Smith referred, refers to 'such thing', namely, a thing found. Therefore, it must be a thing found with reference to which the policeman is enabled to arrest him. Therefore, it cannot be contemplated by that clause that you find the thing with a person (A) and you arrest another person (B) suspecting him of having committed an offence with reference to it. I think, as it is, if the matter came before a court under the usual canon of construction which is often adopted to illustrate the true meaning of the clause, I have no doubt the court will hold that 'or' there means 'and'. It has often been so held. Therefore, I think the clause itself contemplates only the arresting of a person with whom the thing is found and not only that. That is not enough, because I may be innocently in possession of stolen property. I must also be reasonably suspected of having committed an offence with reference to it, that is within the definition of stolen property or receiving stolen property or abetting the committing of an offence. Therefore, the very intention of the clause seems to suggest that the two factors must go together in order to enable the police to effect an arrest. And the object of this amendment is to make it clear. It cannot have any other meaning. Having the words 'such thing' there, the word 'or' loses all its force. Such a thing must be a thing—stolen property—found. "Found" therefore must be with the person with whom it was found and that person must be suspected of having committed an offence with reference to it. And I therefore think, Sir, that it would be better to substitute the word 'and' for the word 'or'.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I find that Sir Monierieff Smith has failed to answer the argument
5 P.M. laid before us by Bhai Man Singh, the Mover of this amendment, that if the wording of this section was allowed to stand, the police would have the power of arresting any person who is found in possession of stolen property although he is quite prepared on the spot to establish his innocence. I do not think there will be any violence to public justice or the rights of the subjects will be in any way defeated if the amendment suggested by Bhai Man Singh is carried. As Mr. Rangachariar has just now put before the House, it is very likely that for the purpose of carrying into effect the object of this clause it will be considered that 'and' is more appropriate than 'or' and as often-times we have found, in the interpretation by Judges of the various provisions of the law they might say that this word 'or' itself implies that it cannot be interpreted in any other way except when it is identified with the word 'and.' If up to 1897 the word 'and' remained as Sir Moncrieff Smith has pointed out to us, no explanation is forthcoming as to why this change was made and no answer is given to the argument that the word 'and' should remain. Therefore, all common sense suggests to me, and it will suggest to the House, that the amendment is not only desirable but is necessary.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I propose, Sir, that the question be now put.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, I beg to support the amendment. I think that clause (4) deals with the case of a person who is found in possession of property which there is reason to believe to be stolen property. If there is reason to believe that the property is stolen property, that is a very good ground for seizing that property, but it cannot be a good ground for arresting the man. A man can be arrested only when there is reason to believe that he has committed a cognizable offence, and that case is provided for in clause (1) of the same section. I do not accept the interpretation that is put upon clause (4) that the latter part of it is intended to cover the case of a man other than one who is found in possession of property, apart from the case of a man who is found in possession of stolen property. It is not meant to cover the case of a man who is not found in possession of property. That clause is specially intended to cover the case of a person who is found in possession of stolen property. If a man is found to be in possession of property which could reasonably be suspected to be stolen property, then the clause gives power to the police to arrest that man, but that is improper as pointed out by the Honourable Mover. The reason given, i.e., that there is reason to believe that the property is stolen would be good reason for seizing the property, but you cannot arrest a man unless you have got reasons to believe that he has committed some cognizable offence with reference to the thing which is found in his possession. Since that case is covered by clause (1) I do not think that clause (4) really serves any useful purpose. So, the substitution of the word 'and' for the word 'or' will take away the objection from the clause as it stands. I therefore support the amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, reading the clause, as it stands, we come to this conclusion that two things are contemplated by the present provision; the discovery of the thing or article, as the case may be and, its being reasonably suspected to be stolen property. Admitting the existence of all these conditions, yet the possessor of that article may be innocent. He has got no knowledge at all as to whether this article is really stolen or not. Why has he been hauled up? Because a certain article has been recovered from his possession; secondly, because there is a reasonable suspicion that this article is a stolen property. On account of these two conditions, an innocent man has been arrested, though eventually he may be acquitted by the Magistrate on the ground that his guilty knowledge is not established. Now, Sir, who is responsible for his unlawful arrest? Who is responsible for his unlawful confinement in the lock-up for a number of days till he secures his release or acquittal, as the case may be, at the hands of the Magistrate? The proposed amendment does away with that fear. It (the amendment) contemplates that instead of the word 'or' you may put in the word 'and'; and the insertion, as I have already submitted, will meet a pressing need. If in addition to the aforesaid existence of two conditions the police officer arrives at the conclusion that the possessor can reasonably be suspected of a connection with the commission of the offence, then he can be arrested. There is a great sense in it. Therefore, Government should thank the Mover of this very reasonable amendment which commends itself, and I consequently strongly support it.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the question be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"In sub-section (1) of section 54 of the said Code, in clause fourthly for the word 'or' the word 'and' shall be substituted."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, in sub-clause (1) of clause 11 (a) I beg to move an amendment:

"That between the word 'and' and the word 'the', insert the words 'full particulars of'."

As the sub-clause stands at present, it means that any police officer may requisition for the arrest of any person through another police officer and may ask the other police officer to arrest that man who may have committed an offence or other acts for which the arrest is to be made. Under the clause as it stands, the police officer simply may mention to another police officer that such and such a person has committed, say, an offence of cheating or any other offence and should be arrested; that police officer will have no discretion to refuse it, but under this clause shall be bound to arrest him. If the amendment which I beg to move be adopted, in that case that police officer shall be able to utilise and exercise his own discretion and find out whether the particulars that have been given by the requisitioning officer are enough to make that person liable to be arrested, and on that suspicion and after finding out the liability for that man's arrest, he may arrest him. Therefore, I suggest that the police officer who requisitions an arrest through another police officer should also be required to give the particulars of the offence for which he is to be arrested. With these words, Sir, I move the amendment:

"That in clause 11:

(a) In sub-clause (1) insert the words 'full particulars of' between the word 'and' and the word 'the'."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, perhaps it would facilitate a discussion of this amendment if I referred in the first place to the history of the present clause. Sir George Lowndes' Committee were of opinion that an amendment is required in section 54 to meet the case of a requisition from a police officer to arrest a man at a distance:

'We think it is clear that there should be power for an investigating officer to require by telegram the arrest of a person who may perhaps have absconded from the place where the investigation was taking place.'

As the Honourable Members of this House know quite well, the Bill drafted by Sir George Lowndes' Committee was circulated for opinion and those opinions were considered by the Joint Committee. One of the opinions was signed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, and it suggested that in the clause drafted by Sir George Lowndes' Committee some safeguard was required. The Joint Committee therefore said in their report that:

'We agree with those critics who desire that some safeguard should be provided, and we have therefore proposed to lay down that the requisition shall reveal the offence or other cause for which the arrest is to be made, so that the arresting officer can satisfy himself that the arrest could lawfully have been made without warrant by the officer issuing the requisition.'

Now, Sir, on the clause as it stands in the Bill sufficient particulars will clearly have been included in the requisition received from the person at a distance to enable the officer who has to make the arrest to decide whether that officer had power to make the arrest. The Honourable Member proposes, however, to insert the words 'full particulars of'; that is to say, in the requisition full particulars of the offence are to be included. Now what, Sir, does the Honourable Member mean by 'full particulars'? Whenever we refer elsewhere in the Code to 'full particulars' we indicate clearly what we mean by them. The amendment moved by the Honourable Member would therefore require another section to explain it. Perhaps my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, would say that after we have considered this amendment we should go on and propose a new section to meet this point. Still we have not had any indication as to what full particulars would be required by the Honourable Member. I think, Sir, it is clear that the safeguard inserted by the Joint Committee is quite adequate for the purposes of this clause, and I hope that the amendment will not meet with the approval of this House.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 11:

(a) In sub-clause (1) insert the words 'full particulars of' between the word 'and' and the word 'the'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, the amendment I propose in clause 11 (1) under the head 'ninthly' is a mere formal amendment. In order to make clear what is meant by 'that' officer in that clause, that is to say, the officer who makes the requisition, I introduce the word 'other.' I have been supplied with a draft from the department which makes it even plainer; that is, instead of the words 'that other officer' they suggest the substitution of the words 'the officer who issued the requisition.' I am quite willing to substitute that for my original amendment. For the words 'that officer' the words 'the officer who issued the requisition' are to be substituted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I accept the amendment now proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, viz., the substitution of the words 'the officer who issued the requisition' for the words 'that officer.'

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment proposed:

"That in sub-clause (1) of clause 11 for the words 'that officer' the words 'the officer who issued the requisition' be substituted"

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, the amendment which stands in my name is to omit sub-clause (2) of clause 11. Sub-clause (2) reads as follows:

"After sub-section (2) of the same section, the following sub-section shall be added, namely:

(3) The term 'police-officer' in this section shall be deemed to include such village officers as may be either generally or specially authorised by the Local Government in this behalf."

This means that power of arresting persons mentioned in this clause without a warrant is to be extended beyond the ordinary police officers, to village headmen and to any village officer. I think it would be giving them too much latitude. If this is done any village chaukidar or a lam-bardar or jaidar will be able to arrest anybody without a warrant under this clause. We have been going on for such a long time without that power and very strong and cogent reasons should be brought forward to make this new provision, if it is to stand at all. I do not understand, Sir, why such drastic powers should be given to persons who are not connected with the detection of or enquiring into crimes. They are untrained persons in this matter. It is really a very dangerous doctrine that any village officer should be given the power to arrest any person without a warrant under section 54.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

'Omit sub clause (2) of clause 11'.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member will probably accept our proposal if I told him how it came to be framed. I notice that Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary was also somewhat apprehensive of its results. Indeed he went so far as to say that this was a distinct attempt on the part of Government to take new powers under this section. The exact facts are very simply as follows: Some years ago the Central Provinces pointed out that in Berar the police patel had since 1863 been given power to arrest, but the power rested on somewhat doubtful authority. It was indeed an executive order, but the Local Government asserted that these police patels, although not technically coming within the category of police officers, had acted admirably in that respect and had not exceeded their authority. They merely asked therefore that they might have power to give to them the formal authority which they had actually utilised in the past. That is the very simple reason why we placed this sub-clause in the Bill. It has been before the public ever since the Bill was first published, and I think I am right in saying that it has received no objections. Stay, there was one objection, from the Bar Association in Madras, though not of a very serious nature, for it chiefly referred, I think, to other provisions of the clause.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Madras objections are always weighty.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: No doubt, but this in itself tells against the amendment of Mr. Man Singh, since the Association did not itself lay great stress on their objection. Now it is not correct to say, as the Mover of this amendment said, that we are hereby placing in the hands of a very large number of village officers, be they village chowkidars or any other such officers, an unlimited power of acting as police. The Bill does not do that at all. It is purely permissive; it declares that the Local Government may in certain circumstances grant these powers. Who are responsible for the administration of law and order but the Local Governments? We have no reason to suppose that this permissive clause, if it is put in the Bill, will be abused by them. Why should they raise up trouble for their own Provinces by handing over to a large number of undesirable persons the power of arrest as police officers? Surely we must give Local Governments sufficient credit for at least a passing interest in the welfare of the people of their Province. We must give their local Councils sufficient credit, I think, for protesting against any such course of action as would lead to widespread mischief arising from the abuse of a simple provision of that nature.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: For once, Sir, I shall use the argument which has been so often used by the Government benches in this House, and that is, as for a long time we have gone on without an amendment of this kind, it is not necessary now to tinker with the law and bring in an amendment, because one Local Government considers a particular class of officers in a particular place should be empowered in a particular manner. We have gone on without such a power as that for a long time and I do not think other Governments have felt the same difficulty as the Central Provinces Government. Moreover to empower with a general power a large class of officers of this calibre to arrest a person is simply to place power in their hands which would be sure to be misused, and I do not think that the authorities of the Local Government will be able to distinguish between a particular class of patels and other classes of patels, and the result would be that they would give general power to patels and that would lead to the general abuse of power. The Honourable the Home Member has not shown any reason for a change in the law which has stood for a long time, and the fact that the Central Provinces has asked for it is not a reason for including such a dangerous provision like this, namely giving power to arrest to persons of this low class.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I rise to support the amendment moved. My own Government has been quoted in support of this introduction. It was the Central Provinces Government which needed such a clause and to satisfy the desire of the Central Provinces Government this clause has been added, because in Berar there is a class of people known as police patel who have been exercising such power before Berar was attached to this Government and so that that power should also continue after Berar has been amalgamated to the Central Provinces. My humble reply in that case would be, Sir, that Berar was included in the Central Provinces in the year 1905 or thereabouts and from 1905 to this year, 1923, those police patels have been working without those powers, that is to say, whatever powers they had of arresting have been suspended and they are not authorised now under this present Code of Criminal Procedure to arrest persons. Therefore, if these people could do without these powers for so long, there is no reason why that additional power should be given. Moreover, if it had only been a case of police patels, I might have opposed the amendment and supported the Government; but there is no knowing, as the clause stands, to whom that power may be extended. The Honourable the Home Member says that we should leave this discretion in the hands of the provincial Governments who are supposed to exercise their discretion in a proper way and that, if there is any impropriety in the exercise of their discretion, that might be questioned by the local Councils. I am afraid, Sir, it is not always possible. It may happen sometimes that provincial Governments may even do the improper thing and the local Councils cannot take sufficient action in time. I would just give one instance of my own provincial Government to show in what way they have behaved in regard to certain legislation which was passed by this House in the September Session in Simla. The House will remember that the Police Incitements to Disaffection Act was passed in that session and a clause was added at my request, after acceptance by the Government, that that Act was to be brought into force in such provinces and such parts of the provinces where it might be thought necessary. The Act received the assent of the Governor General probably in the first week in October and it was hardly a fortnight after the assent was given that the Central Provinces Government was the first to introduce and to extend the provisions of that Act in the whole of the Central Provinces and Berar. If the Central Provinces Government thought that such an Act was necessary for a particular part of the province they could have extended it to that part only instead of extending it to the whole of the province and Berar. So, this is the way in which the powers that are delegated to the Local Governments are sometimes utilised. Therefore, I beg to submit that we should not delegate this power to the Local Governments to authorise any person whomsoever they please to arrest persons under this section. We have spent the whole day discussing the way in which police officers have been behaving and acting under section 54 and the whole day we have been thinking of the ways in which we should curtail these powers without causing any inefficiency in their work, but we have not been able to come to a proper conclusion so far, and now in this clause we are extending this power to whomsoever the Local Governments may desire to extend it. Therefore, Sir, I suggest that the power would be a very dangerous one and it should not be extended beyond the powers under the old section 54; and this amendment which has been moved by my Honourable friend should be supported and accepted.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay (Bengal : European): I move that the question be now put.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the question be now put. The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is to omit sub-clause (2) of clause 11.

The question is that that amendment be made.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, the next amendment is likely to take time; we have already sat very late and I beg to propose that the House do stand adjourned till to-morrow.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We shall have no objection to that course, though I cannot agree with the Honourable Member, that, taking our own ordinary hours of work, we have sat very late.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Wednesday, the 17th January, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Wednesday, 17th January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.

Secretary of the Assembly: I have to inform the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. President at to-day's meeting.

Mr. Deputy President then took the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

RAILWAY CONCESSIONS TO TRAVELLERS.

145. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware that in the East Indian Railway and the Bengal Nagpur Railway, concession return tickets for the 1st and 2nd class passengers are being issued at a fare and a third during the Christmas and other holidays?

(b) Do Government propose to introduce similar concession return tickets in all State Railways for the 1st, 2nd and Inter class passengers during the Pujah, Christmas and Easter holidays?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The introduction of concessions of this kind is within the competence of Railway Administrations and the Government have no doubt that they are fully alive to the desirability of restoring them as soon as circumstances permit, but the Government will bring the matter to the notice of Agents.

Mr. K. Ahmed: A supplementary question, Sir. In view of the fact that the company-managed Railway can grant such a concession, could not the Government of India in the State-managed Railway grant that concession?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have already said that the Government of India propose to bring this matter to the notice of Agents.

Mr. K. Ahmed: When will that be, Sir?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Now, Sir.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is it at all proposed to restore the old return tickets independent of the Pooja, Easter and X'mas concessions? If so, when?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I think that was a question which was asked by Mr. K. Ahmed. All I am prepared to say is that we propose to bring the question of restoring concessions of this kind to the notice of Agents in order that they may consider whether now or at some later date they are in a position to restore these concessions. That, I am afraid, is the only answer I can give at present.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Is the Honourable Member aware that the Bengal Nagpur Railway gave some Pooja concessions while the East Indian and Eastern Bengal Railways did not give any concessions? Does he not think it desirable that there should be uniformity in this respect?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask, Sir, why these concessions are extended only to 1st and 2nd class passengers and not to 3rd class passengers?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid I cannot answer that question without examination.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I know if the Government is prepared to consider this question?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No question will be considered without Agents.

INCONVENIENCES TO LOWER CLASS PASSENGERS ON E. B. RAILWAY.

146. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware that in the Eastern Bengal Railway there are certain restrictions, (a) for Inter class passengers who are not allowed to travel by the Darjeeling and Dacca Mails when travelling less than 100 miles, and (b) for third class passengers who are not allowed to travel by the Darjeeling Mail trains when travelling for less than 200 miles?

(b) Are the Government aware that these restrictions are causing great inconveniences to the travelling public as there are not sufficient number of available trains for them which are always over-crowded?

(c) Do Government propose in the interest of the travelling public to remove those restrictions as early as possible?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes. These restrictions were imposed as intermediate and 3rd class accommodation on the trains referred to is limited and the object is to prevent passengers travelling long distances being inconvenienced by other passengers for whom another and a suitable train service is provided.

(b) and (c) Government are not aware that the restrictions referred to cause inconvenience, and do not propose to take any action in the matter.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Are not the Government of India aware that there were a number of trains before the Darjeeling Mail started in the afternoon? For instance, there was the Shillong Mail, passenger and other local trains running within the limited area some time ago?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I did not catch the Honourable Member's question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is my Honourable friend aware that from Sealdah which is a suburban town East of Calcutta on the other side of Howrah, trains are not for the last two or three years running regularly? For instance, the Shillong Mail is not running at all. It used to start by 2-30 p.m. There were other trains also which used to run within the limited area, and they have also been stopped?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The train service is arranged by the Agent, and I have no reason to suppose that the Agent has not arranged a suitable service.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Do I take it, Sir, that the Agent's statement is to be taken as gospel truth and that the Honourable the President of the Railway Board and the Honourable Member in charge are not to answer questions notices of which have been given?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: The principle of Government is to trust their Agents in all cases unless anything is brought to notice in which the Agent is clearly wrong.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not desirable that the department should be abolished? Is it not a burden on the public revenues?

DAMAGE BY FLOODS IN RAJSHAHI DIVISION.

147. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to state—
(a) the number of men, women and household animals that died and the amount and extent of the damage including the losses of crops, huts, goods and chattels, etc., sustained by the people during the flood in the districts of Rajshahi Division in September last; and

(b) what was the extent of damages and the amount of loss sustained by the Eastern Bengal Railway?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: (a) The Honourable Member is referred to the Press Communiqués on points of this kind which have already been issued by the Government of Bengal.

(b) The information is not yet available. It will be supplied to the Honourable Member on receipt.

Mr. K. Ahmed: A supplementary question, Sir. Is it not a fact that Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram, ex Engineer, was deputed by the Government of India to inquire and report on the subject?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Yes.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Has he not submitted a Report on the subject at all?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: I believe he has submitted a Report.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Are we not entitled to get the information that appears in that Report submitted to the Government. If so, may I ask that all these particulars should be supplied to us?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: That Report deals with technical questions as to whether sufficient waterways are provided in these railway lines. It does not deal with Part (a) of the Honourable Member's question. I would also add that a series of questions have been put in regarding Mr. Ralla Ram's deputation, and I would suggest to the Honourable Member that he should wait till the replies are given to those questions.

Mr. K. Ahmed: May I ask if the Government of India will be good enough to lay that Report on the table so that Honourable Members of this Assembly may look at it?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: I have already said that the Honourable Member must wait till the replies are given to the questions which have been put in on this subject. I am not prepared to answer questions of this kind without having papers before me.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will my Honourable friend be good enough to place the Report submitted by Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram on the table of this House?

Mr. Deputy President: I think the Honourable Member has already answered that question.

EMPLOYMENT OF INDIAN AUDIT DEPARTMENT OFFICERS.

148. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: Have Government ever considered the advisability of employing officers of the Indian Audit Department in charge of establishment work in the administrative offices of or under the Central Government?

INDIAN AUDIT DEPARTMENT.

149. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: Have Government ever considered the advisability of giving increased opportunities to officers of the Indian Audit Department to acquire experience of the work at the headquarters of the several departments of the Central Government?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: With the Honourable Member's permission, I will answer these two questions together as they deal with the same subject. There is no doubt that it is frequently useful to have an officer of financial experience in charge of the establishment work in an administrative department, especially where the department's expenditure on establishment is large, and for work of this description officers of the Audit department, possessing special qualifications, have from time to time been usefully employed. Government are of opinion that the deciding factor must be the benefit to the administrative department concerned, rather than the personal benefit likely to be derived by an officer from experience gained in such work.

DECREASES IN PASSENGERS AND PASSENGER EARNINGS.

150. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: (a) Is it a fact that there is a decrease in the number of passengers since the increased railway rates came into force?

(b) Is it a fact the difference between the passenger earnings to date and the amount budgetted for is too big to be covered during the remaining period of the current year?

(c) If so, what steps do Government propose to take to make up the difference?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) The matter is being carefully watched and comparative figures of passenger traffic on the 10 principal railways are examined every week. These figures include figures for non-budgetted lines but they indicate the effect of the new fares. They show that in the current year up to the week ending 23rd December last there was a decrease of passenger traffic of 2.4 per cent. compared with last year. On the other hand, there was an increase of coaching revenue amounting to 162 lakhs.

(b) The reply to part (b) is in the affirmative.

(c) Government do not propose to take any special action at present as they know that Agents have the matter in mind. Government prescribe only maximum fares. If Agents find that the fares imposed are so high as to affect revenue by driving away traffic they will, no doubt, reduce them. But it always takes some time for the travelling public to adjust themselves to new fares.

PAYMENT OF LAND REVENUE BY RAILWAYS.

151. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: Is it a fact that certain railways are required to pay land revenue on the lands made over to them, while others are not; and if so, on what basis is the distinction made?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Under the terms of their contracts certain railways are entitled to the grant of land by Government free of charge. Such railways pay no land revenue.

In other cases (except those of the Assam Bengal and Tirhoot Railways which have special clauses in their contracts in regard to land) capitalised value of land revenue is paid by the Railways at the time of acquisition.

R. & K. RAILWAY: CLAIM FOR WOOD FUEL.

152. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: With reference to the item "Rohilkund and Kumaon Railway Extensions—compensation for waiving claim for wood fuel" in the Railway Revenue Budget, will Government kindly state the total amount of compensation, the amount already paid, the amount yet remaining to be paid and why the payments are not charged to the head "Fuel."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The compensation payable to the Rohilkund and Kumaon Railway Company for waiving their claim for the supply of wood fuel from Government forests was settled for a lump payment of Rs. 30,000 for all claims up to 31st December 1911 and a recurring annual payment of Rs. 10,000 for 1912 and subsequent years. The payments to the Company on this account to end of 1921-1922 amount to Rs. 1,32,500.

In the accounts of the Company these payments appear as an item of receipt. So far, however, as Government is concerned, the precise method of showing the expenditure is a matter of accounting which is dealt with in accordance with the rules on the subject.

RULES APPLICABLE TO COMPANY-WORKED STATE RAILWAYS.

153. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: With reference to the answer given to starred question No. 15, will Government kindly state how the rules not applying to company-worked State Railways can be distinguished in the published codes from those that do apply?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: It is not possible within the limits of a reply to a question or in a general formula to indicate the precise distinction between the rules in the published State Railway Codes that apply to Company-worked Railways and those that do not so apply.

The Honourable Member, however, will be safe in assuming that the rules in the State Railway Codes so far as they relate to classification and allocation of receipts and charges, general procedure of accounts and audit, control of expenditure against grants and estimates and submission of periodical accounts and returns, are more or less as much applicable to Company-worked Railways as to Railways worked by State.

MINOR AND MAJOR WORKS ON RAILWAYS.

154. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: What is the test applied in deciding whether a given railway work is a new minor work chargeable to working expenses, or a new major work to be paid for out of capital funds? Does the test relate to the nature of the new work or to the expense it involves? And if latter, when was the test fixed and when was it last revised?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: In the case of State-worked railways the limit up to which the cost of new minor works should be debited to revenue was fixed at Rs. 1,000 till 1919 and has since been raised to Rs. 2,000. These limits apply to other railways also subject to the provisions of the contracts for their working.

LAND SUPPLIED TO ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY.

155. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: With reference to the answer given on 6th September, 1922, to starred question No. 13, will Government kindly state why the cost of land supplied free of cost to the Assam-Bengal Railway Company is shown in the statement of demands for railway capital expenditure and in what respect this free gift differs from those referred to in the answer to starred question No. 19?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Question No. 13, which was answered on the 6th September, 1922, related to State-owned Railways, whereas Question No. 19 answered on the same date had reference to private-owned railways. This accounts for the difference in the treatment of the cost of land. The Assam Bengal Railway is a State-owned Railway and the land required for it is consequently shown in the Statement of Demands for Railway Capital Expenditure, such expenditure being booked separately as Government capital expenditure outside the accounts of the undertaking.

RAILWAY STATISTICS OF PROFIT AND LOSS.

156. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: With reference to the answer given on 15th September, 1922, to starred question No. 321, will Government kindly state the procedure usually adopted by them (a) firstly, in ascertaining which particular commodity pays and which does not, and (b) secondly in adjusting the rates, so as to make the traffic pay?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) and (b) Government action in the matter of rates is confined to the fixing of maxima and minima rates. Between the limits fixed Railways are at liberty to fix such rates as they think that the Traffic can bear.

RAILWAY CAPITAL EXPENDITURE.

157. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: Will Government kindly lay on the table a statement shewing the amounts spent from each of the different sources mentioned in the answer given on 15th September, 1922, to starred question No. 319, and the pages of the Finance and Revenue Accounts of the Government of India for 1919-20, where those amounts have been recorded?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The information asked for is being collected and will be laid on the table when ready.

ARREARS OF RENEWALS ON RAILWAYS.

158. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: Will Government kindly lay on the table a statement shewing the arrears of renewals as they stood on 31st March,

1922, on the Company-worked State Railways in respect only of the following principal items:

- (1) Permanent way,
- (2) Engines,
- (3) Coaches, and
- (4) Wagons?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The information asked for is not at present available but the subject is one which the Railway Board have under investigation in connection with the question of depreciation.

REMUNERATIVE RAILWAY PROJECTS.

159. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: Will Government kindly state what percentage of the estimated cost of a projected railway is added on account of depreciation of property, to the estimate of working expenses in assessing the remunerativeness of the project?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The estimate of working expenses of a projected railway is usually based on the actual working expenses of an adjoining line, and this includes the cost of renewals and replacements. No other specific provision is made for depreciation.

POWERS OF GOVERNMENT AND OF RAILWAYS.

160. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: With reference to page 4 of Volume II, of the Report of the Indian Railway Committee, will Government kindly place in the library a copy of the "Schedule of Powers of the Government of India and of the Railway Department (Railway Board) in railway matters"?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: A copy of the Schedule referred to by the Honourable Member has been sent to the Library.

CENTRAL PROVINCES PRODUCTIVE RAILWAYS.

161. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: With reference to the answer given on 6th September, 1922, to my starred question No. 17, will Government kindly lay on the table a statement comparing the estimated traffic as given by the local authorities before undertaking the surveys or reconnaissances and the traffic estimated as a result of the surveys or reconnaissances.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Definite estimates of the traffic earnings were not given by the local authorities prior to the carrying out of the surveys.

CARRIAGE OF COAL ON RAILWAYS.

162. Mr. Pyari Lal Misra: (a) Is it a fact that the largest portion of the earnings on account of the carriage of revenue stores is from coal carried over the home line.

(b) Is it a fact that the lowest rate for foreign railway coal is less than the lowest rate charged for the carriage of coal on the home line and if so, on what basis is the distinction made?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes.

(b) The lowest rate for Foreign Railway Loco. coal is on some Railways lower than the lowest rate for coal carried for the Home Line for certain distances.

Coal for Home Railways is carried at a low flat mileage rate, irrespective of distance, while coal for Foreign Railways is carried at mileage rates calculated on a telescopic scale, the mileage rates being high for short distances, and diminishing for longer distances.

I. M. S. OFFICERS ON SPECIAL TERMS.

163. Dr. H. S. Gour: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that the Secretary of State has appointed or proposes to appoint 30 additional I. M. S. officers on special terms?

(2) If so, are the appointments offered or reserved exclusively to Europeans?

(3) Were any of these appointments offered to any European or Anglo-Indian or Indian Medical Practitioners? If not, why not?

(4) Were these appointments made in previous consultation with the Government of India?

(5) If so, will the Government be pleased to publish the despatches on the subject?

(6) Is the Government aware that these appointments have aroused considerable comment in the country and caused great resentment amongst Indian medical men?

(7) Will the Government state what will be the total cost of these appointments?

Mr. E. Burdon: (1) to (5) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given on the 15th January, 1923, to the question asked by Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal, No. 81.

(6) The Government have seen reports to this effect in the press.

(7) Apart from the special gratuity in lieu of pension, the cost of each of these specially recruited officers will be the same as that of an officer recruited in the normal way for the Indian Medical Service as the former will serve on exactly the same terms as the latter.

EXPENDITURE ON EAST INDIAN AND GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAYS.

164. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: With reference to the answer to starred question No. 333, printed at page 660 of the Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume III, will Government kindly state, with respect to the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways, the amounts sanctioned for programme revenue expenditure for 1922-23 and the approximate expenditure incurred up to 30th September 1922?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The information asked in regard to Programme Revenue expenditure for 1922-23, is given below:

	Amount sanctioned.	Expenditure incurred up to 30th September 1922.
	Rs.	Rs.
East Indian Railway	1,73,06,000	58,45,000
Great Indian Peninsula Railway	1,97,75,000	23,25,000

CONCESSIONS ON ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY.

165. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer given on 7th September 1922 to starred question No. 175, will Government kindly lay on the table a copy of the report which the railway authority concerned may have made showing that the advantages secured to the Assam-Bengal Railway by the development of Assam more than make up for any immediate loss through the concession granted to Assam tea gardens for conveyance of their coolies?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The procedure suggested by the Honourable Member involves printing the report in the Council proceedings, and with a view to avoid extra printing charges I am arranging to furnish him with a copy of the relevant extract from the Agent's letter on the subject.

QUERY REGARDING ASSAULT OF COOLIE AT MOGHAL SERAI.

166. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Has there been any case this year at Moghul Serai of a railway coolie being assaulted by a European railway officer of the East Indian Railway?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Government do not know.

CONCESSIONS ON ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY.

167. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer given on 6th September 1922 to starred question No. 13, will Government kindly state whether out of the amount of Rs. 56,42,654 the portion relating to the period ended 31st March 1921, is included in the figure of Rs. 2,83,32,601 mentioned in the answer given on 17th January 1922 to question No. 41 in the Council of State; and if not, why not?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. In regard to the second part the Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to starred question No. 155 by Mr. P. L. Misra.

PRODUCTIVE DEBT ON RAILWAYS.

168. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state the principle in accordance with which all productive debt incurred in connection with railway capital expenditure, that issued in connection with the purchase of railways is alone held to be dischargeable from revenue?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The debt incurred in connection with the purchase of main lines only is being discharged from revenue in accordance with the orders of the Secretary of State and the Honourable Member is referred to the correspondence on the subject laid on the table on 6th September, 1922, in connection with question No. 10 put by Mr. N. M. Joshi.

"SERVANT OF INDIA" ON "RAILWAYS AND THE BUDGET."

169. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Has the attention of Government been drawn to the article "Railways and the Budget," which appeared in "The Servant of India" of 20th July 1922, and if so, do they propose to re-group and re-classify the demands either on the lines therein indicated or on any other suitable lines and increase the number of days allotted?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Government have now seen the article referred to. The number of days for the voting of demands for grants is fixed by the Governor General with reference to the state of business before the Assembly. Government are not aware that the inclusion of railway expenditure in two demands has had the effect of unduly restricting the discussion of the railway estimates within the time allotted, especially as one of the demands for railways comes up for discussion at an early stage of the voting. Any useful suggestions for improving the form of the estimates will always receive due consideration.

STRATEGIC RAILWAYS.

170. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Has the attention of Government been drawn to the article on " Railways and the Budget," which appeared in "The Servant of India " of 10th August 1922, and if so, will they kindly state whether they have considered the advisability of adopting any one of the following alternatives in connection with strategic railways:

- (i) Such railways should be owned by the Army Department and paid for out of non-railway funds. They should be worked by the Railway Department for actual cost for the Army Department, who will take all losses or gains, as is done in the case of some of the railways which are worked by main line companies for actual cost for Provincial Governments, private companies, Indian States and local bodies.
- (ii) Such railways should be taken over by the Railway Department at the cost of railway funds as a going concern for an amount equal to the capitalized value of the estimated net earnings and the difference between this amount and the amount actually spent in construction should be borne by the Army Budget.
- (iii) The Army Budget should make up any shortage in gross earnings necessary to cover interest charges and working expenses.
- (iv) The troops and stores should be carried at such enhanced rates as to produce earnings therefrom sufficient to cover interest charges and working expenses.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Government have seen the article in question.

Various alternative proposals have been considered by the Government and the Central Advisory Council and the recommendations made by the latter body are now under the consideration of Government.

THIRD CLASS RAILWAY FARES.

171. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the article on " Third class railway fares " appearing in " The Servant of India " of 31st August 1922?

(b) Is it a fact that the Indian railways taken as a whole not only do not earn any net profits from the first class passenger traffic, but incur a loss in working that traffic, whereas they earn substantial net profits from the third class traffic?

(c) Is it a fact that the percentage of increases recently introduced in third class fares for distances of over 300 miles is higher than that obtaining in the case of first and second class fares?

(d) If the reply to either (b) or (c) is in the affirmative, do Government propose to remove the inequality (i) either by prescribing the extent to which railway administrations should, within the authorized maxima and minima, vary the fares? or (ii) by revising the maxima and minima?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes.

(b) It is not possible to apportion the net profits earned by railways in respect of the different classes of passenger traffic.

(c) This is correct in the case of certain railways.

(d) As advised at present Government do not propose to take action on the lines suggested. If the new rates press so hardly on long distance travel as to affect traffic and the railway revenue, Agents will no doubt reduce the rates for such travel.

CHARGE OF ANNUITY PAYMENTS TO CAPITAL.

172. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: Has the attention of Government been drawn to the article "Robbing Revenue to pay Capital" which appeared in the "Servant of India" of 21st September 1921 and to paragraph 3579 of the minutes of evidence tendered before the Acworth Committee; and if so, do they propose to treat the annuity payments as a charge to capital?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Government have seen the article in the "Servant of India" and also paragraph 3579 of the evidence tendered before the Acworth Committee.

The annuity payments are charged to revenue in accordance with the orders of the Secretary of State. The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the correspondence on this subject laid on the table on 3th September, 1922, in reply to question No. 10, by Mr. N. M. Joshi.

THIRD CLASS PASSENGERS.

173. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the article on "Third Class Passengers" in the "Servant of India", dated 28th September 1922;

(b) Do Government propose to publish in their future Railway Administrative Reports information as to the amounts spent in the year on:

- additional goods engines,
- .. passenger and mail engines,
- .. first class carriages,
- .. second class carriages;
- .. inter class carriages,
- .. third class carriages,
- .. wagons?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Government have seen the article in the "Servant of India."

(b) They do not consider it necessary to add to information already being published in Appendices 16 and 17, in Volume II, of the Administration Report of Railways in India.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Would not the Government of India like under the circumstances to repudiate the statements and allegations made in those articles of the "Servant?"

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I do not think that that supplementary question arises on part (b) of question No. 173.

STENOGRAPHERS ON GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY.

174. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it a fact that recently one or two stenographers have been brought out from England in the Agent's office of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company? If so, what is their pay and whether suitable candidates could not be found in India?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Government have no information.

The question refers to a matter affecting an employé of a railway company whose employés are not under Government control.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? If the servants of the Indian Railways are not under the control of the Government of India I do not know why the Government of India should find capital for the Railways.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The point is that we have delegated to Company Railways certain powers in regard to recruitment of staff below a certain level of pay. We give them full discretion in regard to employés below that level of pay.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Are we to understand that Government have no voice at all in this matter?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: We do not as a matter of practice interfere.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: But where gross cases occur will the Government interfere?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I think gross cases should first be reported for our information.

WAGON INSPECTORS.

175. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: What is the pay attached to the post of wagon inspectors under the Director of Wagon Exchange?

Is it a fact that all the inspectors are either Europeans or Anglo-Indians, and that there are no Indian inspectors?

Were the appointments filled by public advertisement? If not, why not?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The maximum pay attached to the post of Wagon Inspectors under the Director of Wagon Interchange is Rs. 500 a month. So far only two Anglo-Indian Inspectors one on Rs. 400 and one on Rs. 300, have been appointed.

The appointments were not filled by public advertisement because the services of qualified men were obtained from railways.

Dr. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? What are the qualifications for the appointment of these Inspectors?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid I do not know. If Mr. Hindley were here, he would be able to answer that question, but I am afraid I must ask for notice.

Dr. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Have there been any Indian applicants? The Honourable Member said there was no advertisement.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have already said that there was no advertisement.

Dr. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Have there been any applicants?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I cannot answer that question without notice.

The Deputy President then called on Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava to put his question No. 176 and the question was put.

Mr. K. Ahmed: With regard to question No. 175, Sir. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid I cannot allow the Honourable Member at this stage to put any supplementary question.

DEMOLITION OF HINDU TEMPLES.

176. Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava: (a) Is it a fact that the construction of the new railway line by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company outside the Ajmeri Gate at Delhi is likely to involve the demolition of some Hindu temples?

(b) Are the Government aware that the Hindu mind is very much exercised over the question and strong resentment is being felt in regard to the contemplated action?

(c) Do the Government propose to consider the advisability of preventing the demolition of the said temples by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes.

(b) Several representations have been received.

(c) Friendly negotiations are in progress and it is hoped the desired object may be attained in such a way as to avoid all possibility of hurting the religious feelings of Hindus.

INTERMEDIATE CLASS ACCOMMODATION.

177. Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava: (a) With reference to my question No. 189 published on page 1600 of the Official report of the Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume II, regarding intermediate class accommodation, will the Government be pleased to state if the railway administrations concerned have succeeded in providing intermediate accommodation on their lines?

(b) If not, by what time they may be expected to remove the strongly felt want of such accommodation?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Government can only supplement the information given to Honourable Member in the reply to the question mentioned by referring him to the answer given to question No. 156 on 8th September, 1922.

WHEAT EXPORTED FROM INDIA.

178. Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava: Will the Government be pleased to state in maunds the quantity of wheat exported from India since the removal of the embargo in September last?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Approximately 35,02,000 maunds up to the 6th January.

COMMITTEE ON ARMS RULES OF 1920.

179. Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava: Will the Government be pleased to state whether the Committee appointed to examine the new Arms Rules of 1920 have submitted their report?

(b) If so, what action has been taken on the same?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Yes.

(b) The Report will be published for general information on the 20th January. The various recommendations contained therein are under the consideration of Government.

REALISATIONS ON POST CARDS, ETC.

180. Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing:

- (a) the actual amount realised by the sale of postcards, envelopes and postage stamps of the value of one anna or less since the introduction of enhanced rates up to 1st January 1923;
- (b) amounts realised from the same sources during the corresponding periods in the years 1920 and 1921;
- (c) the estimated amount of income from the same sources for the year ending on 31st March 1923?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The necessary information is being collected and will be supplied as soon as it is available.

BILL RELATING TO USE OF FIRE ARMS FOR DISPERSING ASSEMBLIES.

181. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: With reference to the Statement made by the Honourable Sir William Vincent in the Legislative Assembly on the 26th September 1921 re the Bill to provide that when fire-arms are used for the purpose of dispersing an assembly, a preliminary warning shall in all circumstances be given,

Will the Government be pleased to state when they propose to bring up the Bill for consideration?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given by me to a similar question asked by Mr. K. C. Neogy yesterday.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: A supplementary question, Sir. Have the Government in view any legislation at all in respect of this matter or are they going to content themselves with rules on the matter?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We shall content ourselves with the issue of executive rules on the subject.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Will this Assembly have an opportunity of examining those rules before they are issued?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: No, Sir.

INDIANS IN FOREST RESEARCH INSTITUTE.

182. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: With reference to the Statement of Mr. J. Hullah re the employment of Indians in the Forest Research Institute, made in the Legislative Assembly on the 15th March 1922 (Debates, Volume II, page 8102), will the Government be pleased to state—

- (1) the names of experts appointed and the time when their period of appointment expires;
- (2) the number of Indians appointed to work under these experts; and
- (3) whether the two Indians referred to in the Statement have qualified themselves and taken the place of experts; and if the answer is in the negative, the reasons for the same?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (1)—

Name.	Date of termination of appointment.
Dr. H. P. Brown (Officer in charge Wood Technological Section).	7th December 1923.
Mr. C. V. Sweet (Officer in charge Seasoning Section).	21st August 1923.
Mr. L. N. Sengupta (Officer in charge Timber Testing Section).	11th September 1923.

(2) Only one Indian has been appointed on probation as Upper Grade Assistant to the Expert for Timber Testing. The appointments of Assistants to the other Experts have been held up owing to financial stringency.

The previous statement that two Indians had been appointed was made under a misapprehension as to the nature of the work of an Indian who has, in fact, been appointed to the Chemical and not the Economic Section, and is not working under one of the temporary Experts mentioned in the previous statement.

(3) The answer is in the negative, the reason being that it takes a long period of special study for any one to qualify as an Expert in these subjects.

EMPLOYMENT OF INDIANS IN PAPER SUPPLYING FIRMS.

183. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (1) the names of the firms in India who have contracted with the Government of India for the supply of paper;
- (2) whether the above firms have given facilities to Indians to work as apprentices and if so, the nature and extent thereof;
- (3) whether there are any Indian apprentices working in the firms referred to above, and if so, the number of Indian apprentices working in each firm and their names;
- (4) if there are no apprentices, do the Government intend to take steps to see that these firms entertain Indian apprentices and give facilities for that purpose?

Mr. A. H. Loy: The firms in question are the Bengal Paper Mills, Calcutta; the Titaghur Paper Mills, Calcutta; and the Upper India Couper Mills, Lucknow.

Government have no information regarding parts 2 and 3 of the question.

As regards part 4, the Honourable Member will understand that the agreements made with the Paper Mills are ordinary business contracts, and cannot be regarded as concessions, in return for which Government should insist on the mills entertaining Indian apprentices.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? I understood from previous statements made in this House that when entering into contracts one of the conditions will be the entertainment of Indian apprentices.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: May I answer this question, Sir? I think the Honourable Member is mistaken. The statements mentioned referred to special concessions given by Government. I may say, however, that the High Commissioner has been asked to consider whether in placing contracts in England preference should not be given, other things being equal, to firms which do take Indian apprentices, and I have no objection to considering whether we should not adopt the same practice in India provided of course other things are equal.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Will the Government be pleased to call for information under clauses (2) and (3) of my question?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: We will, Sir.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Is the Honourable Member aware that the Fiscal Commission has unanimously recommended that where contracts are given by Government to any firm, this condition should be insisted on?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: That recommendation will be considered in due course.

OFFICERING OF INDIAN ARMY WITH INDIAN OFFICERS.

184. Mr. B. S. Kamat: (1) Have the Government of India noticed a Reuter's Cable from London published in the Indian papers in early January, in which it is reported that an article in the Fortnightly Review gives currency to an allegation that the "Government of India have conditionally accepted a progressive scheme for the complete offciring of the Indian Army with Indian Officers within 30 years?"

(2) If so, will Government be pleased to say if there is any foundation for the statement?

(3) In this connection, will Government of India be pleased to publish their scheme for the Indianization of the Army, if they are prepared to do so?

Mr. E. Burdon: (1) Yes.

(2) and (3) The statement is unauthorised and inaccurate. The question of the measures to be adopted for the Indianisation of the Indian Army is still under correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State and the Government of India are not in a position to make any announcement on the subject.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind : Muhammadan Rural): Sir, before we begin the business of the day I want a ruling on a point. I gave notice of certain amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code Bill on the 15th instant and I understand certain other gentlemen also have given notices of further amendments to the same Bill. I do not know what the fate of these amendments has been as I have not learnt anything about them. No doubt some of the amendments were out of time because they related to clauses which have already been decided. But other amendments, so far as I can see, are in time. For instance, I have given notice of amendments to sections 250 and 562 and these sections will be taken some time later on. The rumour is that all these amendments that have been sent in after the Session began are not going to be allowed. I should like to have a ruling upon the point from you, Sir, whether they are to be admitted. The only rule that seems to apply to amendments of this kind is rule 76 at page 28 of the Manual of Business and Procedure, which runs as follows :

"If notice of a proposed amendment has not been given two clear days before the day on which the Bill is to be considered, any Member may object to the moving of the amendment and such objection shall prevail, unless the President, in the exercise of his power to suspend this Standing Order, allows the amendment to be moved."

I do not know what is the interpretation that is put upon the words 'before the day on which the Bill is to be considered.' If the interpretation is strictly to be followed, it means 'two days before the day on which the consideration of the Bill commences.' But if the interpretation is to be a little more liberal and to include the day on which particular sections of the Bill are taken into consideration, then these amendments—at least mine—will be in order and within time. Anyway, you have got the power of allowing these amendments to come in under that part of the rule which I have been just quoting, and I would ask you, Sir, to exercise your discretion in favour of those amendments being taken in, for the simple reason that the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure is a very important one and such amendments should not be stifled and ruled out of order in this way, more particularly when they are strictly in time according to the interpretation I have given.

Mr. Deputy President: The Honourable Member has referred to one or two things which I consider objectionable. First of all, he is basing his objection on rumours which he has heard outside this hall. I think it is open to the Chair to take very strong objection to reference being made to what is happening outside this hall and nobody has any right to refer to rumours which he hears outside its precincts. Secondly, he mentioned that it was the intention of the Chair to stifle discussion on certain amendments. That is another statement to which I take very strong exception. I will give my ruling on these amendments as they come up.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I have heard your objections. I beg your most humble pardon. I never meant to say that the Chair was going to stifle discussion upon the subject. What I said was that it was rumoured that it was the intention of Government to stifle discussion. But whatever that be, the reason why I brought this matter up before you this morning is that I have not heard what has become of these amendments. I think I should have heard about them by now whether these amendments are going to be allowed or not, and I think I am in order in asking you for a ruling.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): The Honourable Member has already incurred a rebuke—if I may say so with all respect—a very just rebuke from you. He is going to get a similar one from me. He says it is the intention of Government to stifle amendments on the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure. What basis he has for saying this and on what information he acts, I do not know; he has not vouchsafed an explanation to the House. We have tabled before us 395 amendments on the Bill, yet he suggests that it is our intention to stifle amendments. I must remind him that under the Standing Orders Government has no power whatever in this matter and whatever the malignant intention of Government might be, he is not in order in referring to it. The decision of course is entirely in your hands, and not in the hands of Government, and I am quite sure that any imputation that you are going to yield to the unreasonable demands of the Government in this respect would be resented by the House.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I might with due respect state that, of course, it is not proper in any way to impute motives to Government or the Chair. But so far as this question has been raised, I might say that the interpretation to be put upon the words 'Bill to be considered' does not in any way justify the interpretation 'Bill to be commenced or begun.' I think a liberal interpretation should be put upon them, namely, 'amendments to any provision of the Bill when that provision is being considered' even if those words do not appear there. The object of two days notice for amendments is that the House should not be taken unawares but they should have those amendments printed for them and sent them home so that they may reflect and consider how to deal with them.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): With reference to what has fallen from you that the ruling will be given as the amendments come up, may I inquire what procedure is to be followed for obtaining a ruling if the amendments do not appear on the agenda at all? That is the grievance that the Honourable Member (Mr. W. M. Hussanally) has been making. Unfortunately, extraneous matters have come into this discussion which is to be regretted. But we ought clearly to understand what procedure is to be followed when there are amendments notice of which has been given two or three days before the day that they are likely to be taken up and they do not appear at all on the agenda.

Mr. Deputy President: Does the Honourable Member know of any amendments which do not appear on the paper?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Some have been mentioned.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I have given notice of some amendments.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): May I explain? A very considerable number of amendments has been received,—the earliest I think was received at 11-30 on Monday morning, the 15th. I have not attempted to print these and circulate them. As far as possible, I will do so, but if amendments were to come in every day, it would make the task of the Department rather difficult. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary asked how Members were to obtain a ruling from the Chair if they did not know whether their amendments were on the paper or not. As a matter of fact, the Standing Order which has been cited contemplates amendments without notice and there need not be written notice at all. There is nothing to prevent any Member of this House getting up at any moment and proposing an amendment to a clause of the Bill under consideration. That motion of his,—the amendment—is then proceeded with unless some Member of the House objects to his moving it on the ground that he has not given notice. It will then be the time for a ruling from the Chair suspending the Standing Order or enforcing the Standing Order. But there is no need for any amendment to be on the agenda paper. Any Member can move at any time with notice or without notice. That is why I think, Sir, you explained that you will have to deal with the admissibility of every amendment when an attempt has been made to move it and not before.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Then it will follow that the proposed amendments notice of which has been given ought to be printed and placed on the table?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I will do that as far as possible. If I receive an amendment at 10-30 this morning I cannot very well have it printed and placed on the table by the time the discussion of the Bill commences.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: My amendments were sent in on the 15th.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): In the Manual of Procedure of the House of Commons it is laid down that though notice of an amendment is not obligatory it is usual and convenient to give notice of important amendments. I do not think it can be said that it is necessary that notice of the amendment shall be given. It is a matter of convenience for the Members that it should be given. But when the discussion of the Bill starts, it is quite open to any Member at anytime to propose an amendment without previous notice which will be considered to be right and proper, reasonable and just.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Quite so, subject to the provisions of the Standing Orders.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor : Non-Muhammudan Rural): Sir, I must say in defence of Government that they have not stifled any discussion. On the other hand, they have given every opportunity to enlarge the discussion. That being so, I think it is very unfair to attack Government. On the matter of amendments, I must say that it is a large, technical and complicated Code and for Members to complain that the amendments which they put forward at a very late hour have not been printed and put under appropriate heads is not fair. This is not a new enactment, not an unfamiliar enactment. It is 70 years or 65 years old and this particular Bill has been before the country and before lawyers for the last 8 or 9 years.

Then to complain against Government that they have not been able to print these is, I think, hardly fair. Well, after all where an amendment has been given, the Member who has given the amendment may move his amendment and the discretion is in the hands of the Chair and I suppose the discussion will take place.

Mr. Deputy President: I must repeat what I said that every amendment will be taken up and considered on its merits. It is for the House to decide whether they object to it or not. We will now proceed with the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move an amendment to clause 11 of the Bill. The amendment which I proposed to move was to the effect that every person arrested under this section 54 shall forthwith be released on bail. On further consideration I find that the amendment which I wanted to move and of which I gave notice is very wide and that in many cases it will be very undesirable. Therefore, Sir, with your permission I may be allowed to amend my proposed amendment and to move it in this form:-

'Every person arrested under this section except under clauses thirdly and sixthly shall forthwith be released on bail.'

Sir, under section 54, a police officer is authorised to arrest any person at any stage of his investigation or even before that investigation. Yesterday while explaining this section, the Honourable the Law Member was pleased to say that it was during the course of the investigation and after some material had been found by the police officer that the clause first of this section comes into operation, but I respectfully beg to differ from him and I beg to submit that this section generally comes into operation at a very early stage of the investigation, just at the moment when the complaint or the report is made to police or the information has been lodged with them. Before investigation or during the course of the investigation if there is any material or any sufficient evidence to warrant the trial of such a man, the police would arrest him under section 167, i.e., under the chapter allotted for investigation of offences. If we refer to section 54, clause by clause, we will find that it is desirable that in certain cases where arrest is to be made the person should be released on bail because at the time of arrest there is not sufficient material for the police to put that man under trial or for an inquiry before a magistrate; and on principle that every person has a right that his liberty should not be restricted unless any offence has been brought home to him, a person arrested under this section should be entitled to be released on bail. Therefore, Sir, unless the police in their investigation find sufficient material and evidence to put him for trial such a man should be entitled to be set at liberty on bail. The only safeguard necessary should be that he may not escape from the trial that may be awaiting him or that may take place after the investigation is completed. Therefore only a security should be asked from him to appear at any time when the police or the magistrate may desire. With this object in view I will take section 54 clause by clause. The first clause of section 54 says:

'Any person who has been concerned in any cognisable offence or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made, or credible information has been received or a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned.'

Now this applies to a very early stage of the investigation and as I have said before under this clause if the arrest is to be made the man should be entitled to be released on bail. Coming to the second clause, it is said that "if the man is found in possession of stolen property, property which is suspected to be stolen or in respect of which some offence has been committed he may be arrested." In this case also, he should be released on bail, because if there is sufficient evidence against him he could be brought up for trial subsequently. In the third clause we find that if any person has been proclaimed by the Government to be an offender, that person may be arrested by the police. In this clause I submit that the police or the Government may have the right to take that man under arrest to the magistrate and have the needful done. In this clause, where the offender has been proclaimed it is unnecessary to get any further evidence and so he might very well be kept in the lock up. In clause 4, if the man is in possession of any implement of house breaking. . . . I am sorry I made a mistake. This is clause secondly and the clause I referred to in connection with stolen property is clause fourthly. If a man is found in possession of house breaking implements, some evidence is necessary before that man could be found guilty and the man should be released on bail. Clause 4 relates to stolen property and property that is suspected to be stolen. Here also he should be released on bail. Under clause fifthly any person who obstructs a police officer while in the execution of his duty or who has escaped or attempts to escape from lawful custody may be arrested. I submit that in this case the man should be released on bail. There have been cases in practice in which inquiries made subsequently have shown that the arrests were generally unjustified. Sometimes if a man happens to ask the policeman simple questions criticising his action, he is likely to be regarded as having obstructed that police officer in the discharge of his duty and often he is arrested. In this case it will be a very great hardship if the man is allowed to be kept in the lock up. It may be said from the Government Benches that a person who is arrested under this clause for obstructing a police officer is generally released on bail, but I am prepared to cite to them cases in which respectable persons have not been released on bail, when they have been arrested for the offence of having obstructed a police officer and in one case even the Local Government had the inquiry made and on the basis of the report of that inquiry they held that the arrest was perfectly justified though ordinarily that man was entitled to have been released on bail. When even in cases where the provisions relating to bail are liberal, the persons entitled to be so released are kept up in the lock up, then what is to be said of cases of a non-bailable nature where the person be arrested even though it be under section 54. There is no reason to doubt that the police officer will in any way be hampered in the discharge of his duty if the person arrested under this section be released on bail. The person arrested may not be so released if there be a fear that such a man would escape justice or trial. I now come to clause sixthly. It says that any person who is a deserter from the Army or Navy may not be released on bail. In such cases it is but proper that the person be not released on bail. Clause seventhly relates to persons suspected of having committed offences outside British India. In this case also unless there is proper proof available in British India the persons arrested should be released on bail and be bound to appear before the Courts in a Native State or other territories in alliance with the British Government that made the requisition for the arrest.

Clause 8, Sir, refers to the arrest of 'Any released convict committing a breach of any rule made under section 565, sub-section (3).'

I submit, Sir, that persons coming under clause 8 should also be released on bail. My reasons for that are that under section 565 a person is released on certain conditions and if it is found that he broke certain conditions, then he be again put in the lock up, but after some proof that he did break the condition imposed. In this case also it is necessary to prove that he has broken certain conditions, and unless and until that proof be forthcoming, the man so arrested should be entitled to be released on bail. For these reasons, I submit that the arrest under section 54 should be made subject to release of the arrested person on bail and I commend my amendment, viz., that every person arrested under this section except clause thirdly and sixthly shall forthwith be released on bail.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 11, for the proposed sub-section (3) in sub-clause (2), substitute the following:

'(3) Every person arrested under this section except under clauses thirdly and sixthly shall forthwith be released on bail.'

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I rise to make a suggestion as to the procedure to be adopted before the discussion proceeds any further. We have got a chapter dealing with bails and I think it will be inconvenient to take up the matter like this at this stage. If my learned friend's amendment is discussed in the chapter relating to bail, it would be easy to find a solution for all these difficulties. Some of us have given notice of amendments as regards the nature of the bail and as regards the circumstances under which bail should be granted. If this matter is brought up under that Chapter, there will be no difficulty, because, then, I think, the Government and ourselves will be able to come to some agreement as regards the classes of persons who should be granted bail and as regards the stages at which bail should be granted. If we take it up now, I think it will to a great extent hamper the discussion of the chapter relating to bail. Therefore, Sir, I make the suggestion. If Government is agreeable to that and if my learned friend is agreeable to that, we may consider this matter later on when dealing with the chapter relating to bail.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, may I explain the difficulty?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We should have no objection to that course being adopted. It was one of the objections—one of the many objections—that I desired to bring against Mr. Agnihotri's amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: The difficulty before me is that I wanted an amendment with the object, that a person be released on bail even though he may not be entitled to be so released under the chapter for bail; for instance, in the case of offences punishable with death or transportation for life. Supposing the House decides that persons concerned with offences punishable with transportation for life or with death may not be released on bail, then such a man if arrested under this section will not be released on bail, while under this amendment even such a person if arrested for an offence involving punishment of death or transportation, will be entitled to be released on bail until the investigation against him is completed and until the offence against him has been brought home to him. Here under section 54 a man is liable to be arrested on a mere complaint, on mere information, if it is a reasonable information. This I think is not proper and even such a man should be released on bail pending inquiry.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I support my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, and point out that if we accept Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, it will make a mess of the Code. In this Code Chapter XXXIX deals with bail. I want to draw the attention of my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, to section 63 which says:

'No person who has been arrested by a police officer shall be discharged except on his own bond, or on bail, or under the special order of a Magistrate.'

The necessary safeguards are provided under this Chapter. A man is arrested for murder. He is caught red-handed and he is a desperate character. Does Mr. Agnihotri maintain that he should at once be released on bail? Is not a householder or a citizen entitled to much more protection than a confirmed criminal? I shall point out to him the safeguards that this Chapter provides. Section 60 says that a man may be arrested but

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. As Mr. Agnihotri objects to the postponement of this amendment to a later stage, I think the discussion must proceed.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: With your permission, Sir, I beg to accept the suggestion made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, that my amendment may be considered under the Chapter for bails. I have no objection to that.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: The proper procedure for Mr. Agnihotri is to withdraw this amendment.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: I oppose the course proposed. Let us discuss this particular amendment on its own merits. I think Mr. Agnihotri in assigning reasons has sufficiently demolished the case for the amendment and let us dispose of it once for all. It has nothing to do with the amendments of the sections in regard to bail, which are proposed by my friends over there. I therefore submit that the consideration of the amendment be proceeded with in spite of the fact that he has withdrawn it. He has no permission to withdraw. Unless we allow him he cannot withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that Mr. Agnihotri be given leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I do not want to withdraw my amendment, but I only want to have the consideration of the amendment postponed to a later stage.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I formally move that the consideration of this amendment be postponed till we come to Chapter XXXIX, and make a correction of what Mr. Samarth said. We will be placed in a very awkward position when we come to deal with the amendments which we have given notice of as regards bail. If we refer to Rule 33 on page 85, we find that an amendment on a question must not be inconsistent with a previous decision on the same question come at the same stage of any Bill, so that if we come to any decision on this question, we will be tying our hands down when we come to deal with the Chapter concerning bail. (Mr. N. M. Samarth: 'No.') That may be my friend, Mr. Samarth's view, but we will be tying our hands if we come to any decision now. Merely because we are angry with Mr. Agnihotri because he has brought it at a particular stage or that he has given reasons that have demolished his amendment, let us not tie our hands now in dealing with the substantial question of bail, which is a very important question. Let us deal with this amendment when we come to that Chapter, when we can exhaustively deal with it and postpone the decision till we come to Chapter XXXIX. I therefore formally move that it be so deferred.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

'That the consideration of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment be deferred until the clauses of the Bill relating to Chapter No. XXXIX are reached.'

The Assembly then divided as follows:

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: My amendment relates to section 56 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure which, as it is sought to be amended, will run as follows:

'When any officer in charge of a police station or any police officer making an investigation under Chapter XIV requires any officers subordinate to him to arrest without a warrant (otherwise than in his presence) any person who may be lawfully arrested without a warrant, he shall deliver to the officer required to make the arrest an order in writing specifying the person to be arrested and the offence or other cause for which the arrest is to be made.'

The object of my amendment is that as in the case of warrants, as provided in section 80 of the Code, the contents of this order in writing should be communicated to the person to be arrested. That is the object of my amendment, when I say that the provisions of section 80 of the Code shall apply to the execution of the order in writing referred to in this section. A slight alteration has been made in my draft by the Legislative Department, which I accept, and, therefore, I will move it in the form in which they have put it, namely:

"That in clause 12 after the word 'inserted' the following shall be added, namely:

'The officer so required shall before making an arrest notify to the person to be arrested the substance of the order and, if so required by such person, shall show him the order.'

I, therefore, Sir, move that amendment in the form suggested by the Legislative Department.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, by accepting the redraft of his amendment, which has been suggested to him by the draftsman, has removed one of my objections to the amendment of which he gave notice. The amendment in the form in which he drafted it was obviously unsuitable. It was necessary, if anything were to go into the Code at all, that there should be a self-contained provision in section 56 requiring that the officer who received the order in writing should on the lines of section 80 inform the person he was arresting of the substance of the order. But the redraft does not remove all my objections to this amendment. In the first place section 56 and section 80 deal with two entirely separate matters. Section 80 deals with the case of a man who is being arrested on a warrant, a warrant being laid down by the Code as a condition precedent to his arrest. It is the case of a less serious offence and it is reasonable that the man should be told what he is being arrested for. In section 56 we have the case of a person being arrested without a warrant. Now what happens in the ordinary case. The officer in charge of the police station or the officer making the investigation can arrest a man without a warrant. Does he tell the man anything? Does the law require him to tell the man anything? It does not, he just effects the arrest. No doubt it may be desirable for his own protection that the officer making the arrest should give the person some information, but the law requires nothing at all to be said to the man who is being arrested without a warrant. That being so, when the officer in charge of the police station or of the investigation deposes to somebody else his power to make the arrest by an order in writing, what additional reason has arisen that the person to be arrested should be informed of the substance of the order in writing? I think that we must draw a distinct analogy between the two cases of arrest without warrant and arrest with warrant. The Code itself says that where there is arrest without warrant it is quite unnecessary to tell the man you are arresting the offence with which he is charged.

Here again I would remind the House that there are safeguards against unlawful arrest and abuse of this power and I would like to take this opportunity of clearing up what appeared to me to be a misunderstanding in the minds of certain Members yesterday in this matter. It was suggested by more than one Member that there were all sorts of difficulties in the way of prosecuting a police officer for abusing his powers of arrest without warrant and we were referred to section 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Now, if Honourable Members will look at that section and read it carefully, they will find that it applies to a very limited class of cases. An officer, a public servant—and I do not deny that a constable is a public servant—cannot be prosecuted without previous sanction in cases where he is only removable by the Local Government or some superior authority. That is the only restriction. Now, you do not want the sanction of Local Government or of some superior authority to remove a constable. I believe, as a matter of fact, that the lowest officer to whom that section applies, would be an Assistant Superintendent of Police. If I am wrong, my friend, Mr. Tonkinson, will correct me.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Inspector of Police in Madras.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Deputy Superintendents of Police.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: My friend, Mr. Tonkinson, tells me Deputy Superintendents of Police. After all, the whole of the arguments used on this point were based on the dishonesty of the constable. We were not talking about Deputy Superintendents or Assistant Superintendents or of any superior officers. Therefore, there are the safeguards, as I said yesterday, and I think the House will now be prepared to admit that these safeguards exist. As I said just now, it may be desirable for a police officer for his own protection to inform the man of the cause of his arrest; that is entirely from the police officer's own point of view, but nothing is required by the law. I suggest that this amendment is quite superfluous.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the Honourable Member has been giving exceedingly good reasons for accepting the amendment proposed by Mr. Rangachariar. He said that a police officer, when he arrests, need not give any information to the person arrested. In the case of a warrant there is this guarantee, that the case goes before a superior officer, it goes before a Magistrate and, therefore, there is the guarantee that the matter has been considered fully by the authorities. Therefore, when a warrant is issued, there is some guarantee that there has been an offence committed. In the case of a policeman arresting without warrant, if he has not to give information to the person arrested on what charges he is being arrested, on what grounds the arrest has been made, it would be leaving the arrested person in a very unenviable position.

For example, his relations might like to know why this man was arrested, and they might be in a position to give evidence for the purpose of proving that the arrest is illegal and improper. Under these circumstances it is absolutely necessary where a police officer acts without a warrant of arrest that he must notify to the person who has been arrested the reasons for arresting him. If he has not got to give reasons, that will put the arrested person in a very grievous position. If it has not been the law hitherto, it is absolutely necessary that the law should be made to be more kind to the accused than it has been hitherto; and I think the reasons given by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith are the very reasons which should induce this House to accept the amendment proposed by Rao Bahadur Rangachariar.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish to confirm what has fallen from Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, and draw attention to the particular point that we must always consider the extreme cases in regard to proposals of this sort. Suppose we get the case referred to by Mr. Chaudhuri of a policeman who sees a murder being committed by a man. According to this proposal he has to produce an order in writing to show it to the man. There are cases in which there is absolutely no need for showing the order in writing to the man. It depends upon the particular circumstances of the case, and the policeman can exercise his discretion in the matter. He is allowed to do so. He can show it if he wishes to do so, but he is not obliged to.

Again, this is a provision which has been in force for many years. No objection has ever been raised to it; and now at the last moment it has been brought up.

I would also just like to draw attention to the fact that section 56 comes under the heading of 'Arrest without Warrant.' The whole procedure there is entirely different from the procedure followed where an arrest is made with warrant; not merely are the two parts of the Code different, but the whole procedure right through is different. It is a matter for the discretion of the police officer, and no definite provision is necessary in order to compel him to communicate the order in writing to the man whom he may be arresting.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I am afraid, Sir, I cannot agree with Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith or my friend, Mr. Percival. I think the reasons given by both of them would support the amendment moved by Rao Bahadur Rangachariar being carried.

In the case of a police officer arresting a person without a warrant, he does it on his own responsibility; but when he deposes a subordinate officer to go and make an arrest on his behalf, the responsibility does not lie with the man who actually arrests the offender. Therefore an order has to be given to him in writing to go and arrest the man. And if he is in possession of the order, then I do not see why that order should not be shown to the person. It is in the nature of a warrant; though not a warrant by a Court of law, at the same time it is in the nature of a warrant which he possesses at the time he makes the arrest; and therefore there is nothing lost by the policeman showing that order to the man whom he is about to arrest. For the sake of his own safety, I think that order ought to be shown to the man he is going to arrest. All the same he arrests without a warrant no doubt, because a warrant means an order by the Magistrate, whereas this is an order not by a Magistrate but by a superior police officer, and therefore the section rightly lies within the chapter on "Arrests without Warrant." Therefore I say it is in the interest of the person making the arrest as well as in the interest of the accused that the order be shown to him, and I hope the amendment will be carried.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I desire to oppose this amendment. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar spoke with much force on the desirability of introducing a provision in the Code to make it necessary for a police officer when arresting without a warrant to explain to the person arrested why he is taken into custody, and he based his support of this amendment—which refers to the case of a policeman who is instructed by another police officer to arrest without a warrant, he based his support of this amendment on the desirability of introducing a similar amendment into section 54. Now, Sir, if the matter is of such importance as Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would have the House believe, why did he not introduce an amendment to section 54?

Mr. T. V. Sheshagiri Ayyar: An oversight.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: Quite so; an oversight. The matter is of such small importance that when the principal section was before the House Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar did not find it necessary to amend that section.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Section 54 has not yet left the House.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: The Bill has been before Honourable Members for months and months. They have had plenty of opportunity to examine its provisions, and if this is a matter of so much importance, certainly Honourable Members should have introduced an amendment to section 54, and put the amendment in this section as a mere corollary to that.

Now, as regards Mr. Hussanally's argument, he says it is very desirable that the policeman who is furnished with a written order should show it to the person arrested. Well, in 99 cases out of 100, it will be desirable, and the police officer in his own interests will show it. But there is no need to make it compulsory. But I think it may be fairly contended as against the amendment that an amendment of this sort ought not to be put in now at this stage when it will render the whole position of section 54 illogical. I will again repeat that the proper course to adopt would have been to amend section 54 and let the amendment under this section follow as a corollary to that; and I trust, Sir, in order to prevent confusion creeping into the Code by amendments being introduced 'through an oversight' that the House will reject this amendment.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Sir, I find that every speaker who rises on his hind legs to oppose the amendment, as a matter of fact supports it. The best illustration is of the Honourable the last speaker, who said that in almost all cases probably a police officer will communicate these contents. Well then, why not make it actual law? That shows that it would be in the interests of justice and that it would be desirable that a police officer should communicate the order, or the particulars which are subject matter of the amendment, to the person arrested. I draw the conclusion from that that he thinks it would be desirable in that case. If it is desirable, then surely it is safer to have that on the Statute Book.

Then Mr. Percival referred to the case which was cited by Mr. Chaudhuri. Supposing there was a case in which a police man catches red-handed a murderer, where is the necessity of explaining the offence to that man? But he forgets that section 56 does not relate to these cases. Section 56 relates to the case of one police officer deputing his duty to another police officer. So that a case won't arise under those circumstances, of a police officer catching red-handed a murderer. That argument therefore cannot hold water. Another argument put forward by Mr. Percival and which was a mere repetition of arguments that were put forward day before yesterday and yesterday, was that for so many years, 60 or 65 years, this provision has remained on the Statute Book and therefore it should be allowed to continue even now. I think that is a very feeble argument, because if that argument were to stand, it would follow that once a particular law is passed it should never be amended. I contend that anything that suggests itself by way of commonsense to mankind by their experience and by their powers of reasoning may be introduced even if it was not made the subject matter of the original law. At this very moment you have the instance of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar telling you that it was through oversight that he did not suggest the amendment in section 54, when he was taxed by the previous speaker, because there are many things that do escape our reasoning, or our memory or our observation.

But that is no reason why this provision should not come into 56. I think that kind of argument was entirely beside the point; because Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar did not propose an amendment to section 54, therefore he is out of court when he supports an amendment to section 56. The only valid argument for an opposition to take up would be to show that such an amendment under section 56 is not relevant, that it does not fit into the section, is not appropriate. I say it is appropriate. The words that Mr. Rangachariar has embodied in his amendment which has been laid before you, Sir, do fit in with section 56 as it stands. Therefore there is nothing in that objection. So, I say, Sir, as I said in the beginning that the case for the amendment is being strengthened from time to time from the mouth of every speaker who gets up to oppose it and therefore it should be supported.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadian Rural): I propose, Sir, that the question be now put

The motion was adopted

The amendment* under discussion was adopted.

Clause 12, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clause 13 was added to the Bill.

Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao (Guntur cum Nellore: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, the amendment that stands in my name is that proviso (a) to sub-section (6-A) in clause 14 be omitted. That proviso runs thus:

'Provided that no such inquiry shall be made if, in the opinion of the Court in which the claim or objection is preferred or made, the claim or objection has been designedly or unnecessarily delayed.'

Honourable Members will be able to see the importance of this amendment if they will consider the provisions embodied in these new sub-sections. It will be seen that under section 88, the Court, issuing a proclamation under section 87, may at any time order the attachment of any property, moveable or immovable, or both, belonging to the proclaimed person. Now these new provisions relate to claims preferred as regards property attached by an order of the Court under section 88. Under sub-section (6-A) if any claim is preferred within six months from the date of the order of attachment, such claim should be inquired into and the Court may allow or disallow it. These provisions are perfectly reasonable and I have no complaint against them. You have next to see the provision embodied in sub-clause (6-C):

'Any person whose claim or objection has been disallowed in whole or in part by an order under sub-section (6-A) may, within a period of one year from the date of such order, institute a suit to establish the right which he claims in respect of the property in dispute.'

Thus it will be noticed that under sub-section (6-A) the magistrate is bound to inquire into a claim put forward within six months from the date of the order of attachment, and that claim may be allowed or disallowed. If the claim is inquired into and disallowed the party is given a remedy by suit under sub-section (6-C). Now what is the effect of this proviso which I wish to be deleted? If inquiry is refused by a magistrate on the ground that the party has unnecessarily or designedly delayed, though he is within six months prescribed, the result is that no order of disallowance could be made under (6-A), and therefore he has no right of remedy under sub-section (6-C). A right to sue is given only when an order of disallowance is made and an order of disallowance can be made only after an inquiry under (6-A). Therefore if a magistrate holds that, though a claim is within the time fixed there has been unnecessary delay or that delay has been designedly made, then there can be no inquiry and no disallowance and the party is left without any remedy by a suit. I think this is really unreasonable and inequitable. If in sub-section (6-C) the words are added— "Any person whose claim or objection has not been inquired into"—I shall not have much to say. As sub-section (6-C) stands, the party is left without any remedy whatsoever; there is no provision by way of appeal in the Criminal Procedure Code and he has no right to bring a suit to establish his right to the property, simply because a magistrate thinks that the claim has been unnecessarily or designedly delayed. Honourable Members know that criminal courts are not presided over, as in the case of civil Courts, by officers who have had judicial training and who are well versed in law. We know there are magistrates of the first class, of the second class and of the third class, and that many of these are taken from the clerical department and have absolutely no legal training or knowledge whatever. It is difficult therefore to expect that they can bring a really judicial frame of mind to bear on the disposal of these claims. It is easy for a magistrate to say "You have unnecessarily delayed in this case." The words are elastic enough. For these reasons, Sir, I move that this proviso be deleted, and I hope that the amendment will commend itself to this Honourable House.

* Vide p. 1187 supra.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, we are dealing now with those provisions of the Code which relate to processes to compel the appearance of persons and particularly of those in sections 87 and 88 of the Code. Now under section 87 when a warrant has been issued a Court may publish a written proclamation if it has reason to believe that the person against whom the warrant has been issued has absconded or is concealing himself. If a proclamation has been issued the Court may issue an attachment order under section 88. Under that attachment order the movable or immovable property of the proclaimed person may be sold. The amendments proposed by the Bill will be clear if Honourable Members will refer to the edition of the section in which amendments are shown in loco. In the section provisions have been introduced relating to claims by third parties. We have not had such provisions in the Code before, and the Honourable Mover of this amendment has definitely stated that he has no complaint against them. I understand that he considers that it is a most desirable amendment of the Code. He objects, however, Sir, to the proviso (a). Now, Sir, these provisions are due partly to Sir George Lowndes' Committee and partly to the Joint Committee. When they drafted these provisions they had before them very similar provisions in the Code of Civil Procedure relating to cases in which claims are preferred to or objections made to the attachment of property in execution of a decree. Honourable Members in this House are no doubt very fully acquainted with the Code of Civil Procedure. I would refer to rule 58 of Order XXI and if Honourable Members will compare the wording of that rule with the wording of the proposed sub-section (6-A) of section 88, they will see that this rule has been adopted by the draftsmen. The proviso to sub-rule (1) of Rule 58 of Order XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "Provided that no such investigation shall be made where the Court considers that the claims or objections are designedly or unnecessarily delayed." Now, Sir, we have had no provisions of this kind before. If the third party in question designedly and unnecessarily delays his application, surely we ought not to add to the labours of our magisterial courts in the work of investigating such claims. It is true, Sir, that the Honourable Member bases his objection upon another point altogether. He refers to the provisions of the proposed sub-section (6-C). Now, Sir, I will repeat once again what I said before that we have had no provisions regarding inquiries into claims by third parties who object to attachment of their properties hitherto. Does, however, the Honourable Member consider that if a proclamation has issued and if attachment of the property of third parties has been made by mistake in the past, that then that third party could not bring a civil suit to recover his properties? And in what respect, Sir, will the present law in this matter be affected? The proposed sub-section applies only to cases where a claim or objection has been made and inquired into by the court. If the claim or objection has not been made and inquired into by the Court, there is absolutely no doubt, Sir, that notwithstanding the provisions of the proposed sub-section (6-C) the third party will be able in a civil court to recover his property. As, Sir, the Honourable Member does not object in principle to the proviso (a) but merely to this one point, and in view of what I have said as regards that, I hope he will be able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I rise to support the amendment moved by my friend, Mr. Srinivasa Rao. The reply from the Government Member has not shown us the necessity of retaining this proviso (A). He has compared the new provision in this clause with that provided in Rule 58 of Order 21 of the Civil Procedure Code. If we compare these two provisions, we find that the provision made in Rule 58 does not prescribe any period of limitation for such objections while in the sub-clause which we have added to the clause now under consideration, we find that the period of limitation for preferring objections has been prescribed to be six months. When once we prescribe the period of limitation for preferring objections, where is then the necessity of limiting the right of a man as is done by this proviso (A)? Either we should do away with the period of limitation prescribed or we should do away with the proviso (A). I would rather prefer to do away with the proviso A, because when we provide the period of limitation of six months, every person who wants to bring in an objection is at perfect liberty to put in his objection even after the expiry of five months and 29 days after the attachment. Why should we limit further that he should put in his objection say 10 days after the attachment of his property? Therefore, I submit, Sir, that proviso A should be deleted as proposed by my Honourable friend. Moreover, as to the plea that a person is entitled to go to the Civil Court even if such an objection has not been admitted or is rejected by the Criminal Court, my humble submission is, that a man should be allowed to have a summary remedy also, which will be obtained in a shorter period, instead of a remedy which will be obtained in a far longer period as is the case in the Civil Courts? Therefore, this proviso A is absolutely unnecessary, and every man should be given the right to put in his objection within the period of limitation provided in this clause, and proviso A should be deleted.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, my reading of sub-section 6 (A) with the proviso (A) leads me to think that the latter renders the former nugatory. In section 6 (A) the words are as follows: "If any claim is preferred to, or objection made to the attachment of, any property attached under this section, within six months from the date of such attachment, by any person other than the proclaimed person, on the ground that the claimant or objector has an interest in such property and that such interest is not liable to attachment under this section, the claim or objection shall be inquired into, and may be allowed or disallowed in whole or in part." Now the proviso (A) says 'No such inquiry shall be made if, in the opinion of the Court, in which the claim or objection is preferred or made, the claim or objection has been designedly or unnecessarily delayed'. Now, Sir, I point out to the House that in sub-section (A) a certain specific period is fixed, which, for all intents and purposes, may be considered as limitation for instituting that claim, by the third party. It is a statutory time allowed by the Code, but when we come to proviso (A), it eloquently tells us "no, the question of limitation will not be taken into consideration at all". A door is open to a Magistrate or to a Court which may decline to make the inquiry if according to his or its way of thinking the claim is delayed unnecessarily or designedly. Sir, when a claim is lodged within six months from the date of attachment of a property, it cannot be considered to have been designedly delayed. Therefore, the argument which has been advanced from the Government Benches, I may very respectfully submit, has got no force. Now, reliance has been placed on the provision of the Civil Procedure Code. That provision is embodied in Order 21, Rule 58, of that Code. I need not read that provision, because it has already been referred to by Mr. Agnihotri. The crucial point, which is to be seen, is whether in Order 21, Rule 58 of the Civil Procedure Code, any limitation is provided. But a simple perusal of that provision will prove that no time limit is given there. Therefore, the Legislature very rightly, and very wisely, provided that, if the claimant is too late, intentionally, or unnecessarily, then his claim will not be attended to. Why? Because the Civil Court is fully competent to give determination on the question of delay, but here, the Criminal Court has not been given that competency. Here the law has, as I have already submitted, clearly specified six months. Any claim which comes before the expiry of that period of six months cannot be considered too late. Therefore, the analogy which has been drawn, with due deference to the Government Benches, is altogether misplaced. Therefore, the motion for amendment seems to be a very forcible one. It commends itself and I can entertain every hope that the official Benches will feel inclined to agree to it, unless they want the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code to last until the Court and subsequently the lawyers argue this point.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, my submission in support of the amendment and against this clause is based on two grounds.—(1) the inconsistency which this clause involves, and (2) its impracticability and clumsiness. The doctrine that rights are lost by acquiescence or delay, short of the specific period provided by limitation, is now exploded. Here, we have in clause 6-A a specific limitation of six months provided for the making of an application under it. Six months is not a very long time, as things move in the courts of law in this country, for a person to find out, if he was absent, that his property has been attached and for him to formulate his claim. Having given that six months definitely by law, and having provided in clause (b) that, if a claim is made within the time prescribed, the death of the claimant shall not cause it to abate but his representative may carry it on, nevertheless in the middle we have this clause (a) introduced, which leaves it to the ideas and idiosyncrasies of each particular Magistrate as to whether or not a claim should be inquired into, albeit it may be within the time-prescribed. That, upon the face of it, is inconsistent; and I think that above all things it is essential that a Legislature should be consistent with itself. But the impracticability of clause (a) is still greater. It provides that inquiry is to be refused where the claim or objection has been 'designedly or unnecessarily delayed'. A claimant comes up five months after the attachment and makes his application. The court may, under 6-A, inquire into it. Or the court may, under this sub-clause (a), do what? Refuse off-hand to inquire into it? No,—hold a preliminary inquiry to question whether application has been 'designedly or unnecessarily delayed.' Now, how is the court to do this? Surely no one will support a Magistrate who says: 'You might, I think, have made this claim within one month, you have made it in two months; I think you must have designedly or unnecessarily delayed', and so saying summarily throws out the claim. No High Court would allow a Magistrate to dispose of the matter in that way. Therefore, every court called upon to inquire will have to hold a sort of preliminary inquiry, take evidence and so on, as to whether the claim or objection has been designedly or unnecessarily delayed. Obviously, all the time that is taken in holding that preliminary inquiry might be very much more profitably spent in holding an inquiry on the merits of the claim.

Therefore, it is submitted, that clause (a) seems to be, more or less, a draftsman's error. Nothing better than that. And I support the amendment that it should be removed.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, I think the Government would be well advised in accepting this amendment, and saving time unless under sub-clause (6-C.) it wants to see the work of the civil courts very much added to. Mr. Tonkinson is commendably anxious that the work of the criminal courts should not be added to. The inevitable result of summarily dealing with these investigations under 6-A (a), as has been very aptly pointed out, will however be to add considerably to the work of the civil courts.

There is a further reason—a small reason from certain points of view but fairly big from others. Six months is never too long in these matters, even with regard to civil proceedings. Where an attachment of property has taken place in a village in a criminal case, we can well imagine and picture to ourselves the commotion and almost the panic that takes place in the family or among the share-holders. It takes a longer time for them to gather themselves up as it were and obtain advice and to take their claims to the court than a civil attachment would involve. That is another phase of it that makes it very necessary that the limitation of six months should not be interfered with in the way that is proposed. Supposed parity of reason between the Civil and Criminal Codes, as has been pointed out, cannot for a moment hold water, for the circumstances are utterly different. I do not think what is given with one hand under clause 6-A should be taken away by the other under clause 6-A (a).

Mr. M. M. Samarth: I have, Sir, an amendment to propose to this amendment. My amendment is:

"That the following words be added at the end after the words 'unnecessarily delayed,' namely:

'Beyond the six months from the date of such attachment.'"

Now, my reason is this. It may be that you provide here six months. There are many cases in which the High Court or the Court before which the case goes has power to excuse delay and an application may be made to show that, although six months have really expired—well, it may be by two days or three days, there was sufficient cause for delay and in such a case the proviso will say that no such inquiry shall be made if, in the opinion of the court in which the claim or objection is made, the claim or objection has been designedly or unnecessarily delayed beyond six months but not if it has been so delayed with lawful excuse or with excuse which may be permitted.

Therefore, I submit that the following words be added at the end: "beyond the six months from the date of such attachment".

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: With regard to the amendment which has been put forward by Mr. Samarth I wish to call your attention to the fact that it is one of substance. We have provided in the Bill for a period of six months. Our only dispute at present is whether the investigating Magistrate should be allowed to refuse an inquiry in cases which have been unnecessarily delayed within that six months. Mr. Samarth's amendment is really a proposal to increase the period of six months.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: It will be made clear by my amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Samarth's proposal is an entirely new point of substance which it is, I suggest, inadvisable to admit at this stage.

With regard to Mr. Srinivasa Rao's amendment, our feelings are that it would be better if the Bill were allowed to stand as drafted. It was very fully considered by the Joint Committee and accepted by them. But it is not a point on which we are inclined to attach great importance, and, I would add in the interests of the time of the House, that it is not a point on which we should ourselves press for a division. I think it would be better, therefore, if we simply accept the excision of proviso (a) and pass on.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I do not think, Sir, that the amendment proposed by my friend, Mr. Samarth, can be accepted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It has not even been admitted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Is it not before the House?

Mr. Deputy President: No. The original question is before the House.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Then I support my friend, Mr. Srinivasa Rao's amendment. The law has fixed the period of six months within which any objection can be made, and having given those six months, it proceeds by means of proviso (a) to take away that right by giving power to the Magistrate to reject a claim or not to entertain the claim on the ground that the matter has been delayed. Having fixed a period within which claims can be made I think the law ought not attempt to take away that right. I therefore support the amendment of my friend, Mr. Srinivasa Rao.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

'That in clause 14 in the proviso to proposed sub-section (6-A.) omit clause (a).'

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In sub-section (6 BB) omit the words 'or second'"

By adopting my amendment, sub-section 6 BB would read as follows:

'Provided that, if it is preferred or made in the Court of a District Magistrate, such Magistrate may make it over for disposal to any Magistrate of the first class or to any Presidency Magistrate, as the case may be, subordinate to him.'

In Civil Courts, it is the Court in which the objections are filed that decides the objection. The Joint Committee say in their report about clause 14:

'The sub-sections which the Bill adds to section 88 imply that the Court which issues an order of attachment or endorses the same under sub-section (2) is to investigate and determine a claim or objection. We think that a limited power to transfer claims and objections for disposal to subordinate Magistrates would be useful, and we have, therefore, provided that District Magistrates may transfer such cases to Magistrates not below the rank of second class Magistrates, and that Chief Presidency Magistrates may likewise transfer cases to Presidency Magistrates subordinate to them.'

Sir, from this it is clear that the court in which the objection is preferred is the proper court to decide the objection, but some power has been given to the Chief Presidency Magistrates and the District Magistrates to transfer such objection cases to the file of any other subordinate Magistrate. The Joint Committee provide in the Bill that such objections may even be transferred to the second class Magistrates who could dispose of such cases. But I do not know why they did not extend that power to third class Magistrates. So far as I can understand, I think that their reason in limiting this power was that probably the third class Magistrate was not regarded as very efficient in deciding such objection cases. They have therefore limited it to second class Magistrates only. My submission is that on that very ground on which that limitation has been made even the second class Magistrates should be debarred from inquiring into such objection cases that are filed before the court of the District Magistrates and the discretion that has been given to the District Magistrate should not be extended far enough. He should only have power to transfer such cases to first class Magistrates who are more experienced than Magistrates of the second and third class, and they only should be empowered to inquire into such cases that might be transferred from the Court of the District Magistrate. Therefore, Sir, I submit that the power for transfer given to second class Magistrates to inquire into such cases be taken away and be restricted to first class Magistrates. The cases before the District Magistrate are very serious and sometimes it may happen that even the objection cases may also be important. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment for the consideration of the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the Honourable Member has explained that he wishes that the right of transferring inquiries into these claims which is given to the District Magistrate and to the Chief Presidency Magistrate by the proviso to proposed sub-section (6 BB) should be restricted so as to enable the District Magistrate and the Chief Presidency Magistrate to transfer such inquiries to Magistrates of the first class only. He takes his objection, Sir, upon the ground that Magistrates of the second class are not competent to make such inquiries. If that, Sir, is his objection, I would venture to suggest that he ought to have proposed amendments to other provisions of this section. He himself, Sir, drew attention to the provisions of proposed sub-section (6B). Under that sub-section claims or objections under sub-section 6A may be preferred or made in the Court by which the order of attachment is issued. Now, Sir, what courts issue orders of attachment?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I may explain, Sir, that it is not my object that Magistrates of the second class should not be empowered to inquire into objections regarding property attached and filed in their courts, but my only point is that the District Magistrate should not have power to transfer inquiries into objections filed in his Court to Magistrates of the second class.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Is the Honourable Member raising a point of order?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I was simply explaining the object of my amendment which I thought was not properly understood.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I will proceed, Sir, with the remarks which I was making when the Honourable Member interrupted me. I was indicating that the only ground which he had given in favour of his amendment was the ground that second class Magistrates were not sufficiently efficient to hold these inquiries. I was pointing out, Sir, that second class Magistrates will make these inquiries, and now when he interrupted me he says he does not object to that. That being so, I will proceed somewhat further to indicate what cases will usually be covered by the proposed proviso to sub-section (6B). If Honourable Members will refer to sub-section (2) of section 88 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which we do not propose to amend at present, they will find that orders for the attachment of property may be issued for the attachment of property in other districts than that in which the Magistrate issuing the order exercises jurisdiction. Those warrants of attachment may be executed in such other districts if they have been endorsed by the District Magistrate or the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Well, Sir, the proviso will generally take effect in these cases. We do not want to require the Chief Presidency Magistrate or the District Magistrate to hold the inquiries in such cases, and I submit that second class Magistrates according to the Honourable Member who has moved this amendment, are fully competent to inquire into such claims or objections if there are claims or objections in regard to attachments issued by the Court. Thus, Sir, there is no reason whatsoever why such inquiries should not be transferred to them in these cases to which I have referred.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Then, why not extend it to third class Magistrates?

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: My amendment is No. 25 which runs as follows:

"At the end of clause 14 insert the following:

'(6D). If the proclaimed person appears within the time specified in the proclamation, the Court shall make an order releasing the property from attachment'."

I must briefly explain to Honourable Members what is the procedure with reference to proclamation and attachment of property. Sections 87 and 88 of the Code are the sections dealing with that subject. Under section 87 "If any Court has reason to believe that any person against whom a warrant has been issued by it has absconded or is concealing himself so that such warrant cannot be executed, such Court may publish a written proclamation requiring him to appear at a specified place and at a specified time not less than thirty days from the date of publishing such proclamation." Section 88 authorises the Court in the following terms:

"The Court issuing a proclamation under section 87 may at any time order the attachment of any property, moveable or immoveable, belonging to the proclaimed person."

So that, even before the 30 days are over the Court is entitled to order the attachment of the property, both moveable and immoveable. The object of this proclamation and attachment is a compulsory process to compel the party to appear in obedience to the summons or warrant of the Court, and there is no provision here ordering the release of property from attachment in case he complies with the condition contained in the proclamation. This is a slip, I take it. Whereas section 89 provides that if within two years from the date of attachment any person whose property is or has been at disposal of Government—or has fallen at the disposal of Government after the time specified, appears and shows that he has sufficient cause for not appearing, then the property shall be restored to him or, if the property had been sold in the meanwhile, the proceeds shall be restored to him. But if he appears within the time limited, there is no provision ordering the release of attachment. An attachment has got some legal effect as Honourable Members are aware. It prohibits the party from alienating the property. It prohibits the Civil Court from attaching the same property over again and various other complications do arise. Therefore it is necessary that once the condition on which the attachment has been made is fulfilled, the attachment should cease ipso facto. Therefore, in order to make it clear, I propose this that if the proclaimed person appears within the time specified in the proclamation, the Court shall make an order releasing the property from attachment. I therefore move the amendment as it stands in my name.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has suggested that the omission of this clause is due to a slip. I would suggest that the amendment that he has moved is quite unnecessary, in view of the provisions of sub-section (7) of section 88. I am aware that Mr. Rangachariar referred to this sub-section himself. That sub-section says:

"If the proclaimed person does not appear within the time specified in the proclamation, the property under attachment shall be at the disposal of Government."

That is the only provision, Sir, which we have had hitherto. If the person appears in response to the proclamation, then clearly the property never becomes at the disposal of Government, and as for the Magistrates—what have they done hitherto all these years? They always at once release the property from attachment as my Honourable friend is quite aware. If it goes on beyond this period to such periods as are dealt with in section 89, which has been referred to, then we have provisions for the restoration of the property or the net proceeds to the proclaimed person. I think it is quite unnecessary to make an addition of this proposed sub-section to section 88 of the Code.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: What Mr. Tonkinson fails to note is this. If there is an attachment, it debars the alienation of the property; and it puts a difficulty in the way of the property being dealt with. It may be that under sub-section (7) the Government may take certain action under certain contingencies. Suppose the Government does not take such action. Still the attachment is there, if once an attachment is made, unless there is an order of Court releasing the property from attachment, the attachment will subsist. What we want is that there should be power to make an order releasing the property from attachment. If you make a provision for releasing the property from attachment under that same sub-section, it may not be necessary for Mr. Rangachariar to press his amendment. But there must be a provision somewhere that if the person does appear within six months the property shall be released from attachment. The attachment should not be allowed to subsist, for that will make it impossible for the man to deal with the property. That was the point made by Mr. Rangachariar and Mr. Tonkinson has failed to meet it.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar says that there must be an order releasing attachment, and that unless this amendment is made in the Code, there will be no order withdrawing the attachment. That is entirely wrong. If the man appears within six months, then the attachment is automatically withdrawn. (Voices: 'No, no.') What I mean is that the Magistrate automatically makes an order withdrawing the attachment.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Give him that power.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It is quite unnecessary and quite superfluous. The original framers of the Code cannot have omitted this provision by an oversight. The Code has been overhauled again and again and every time this particular amendment has been regarded as unnecessary. It has been left for Mr. Rangachariar after all these years to discover what he thinks has escaped the attention of the Legislature.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I never had a hand in it before.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

Mr. Deputy President: Mr. Rangachariar's amendment No. 25 is before the House.

Amendment moved:

"At the end of clause 14 insert the following:

"(6D). If the proclaimed person appears within the time specified in the proclamation, the Court shall make an order releasing the property from attachment."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I move Amendment No. 27 which runs as follows:

"After clause 14 insert the following clause:

"14A. In sub-section (7) of section 88 of the said Code, the words 'or until the final disposal of any claim preferred or objection made under the provisions of this section' shall be inserted between the word 'attachment' and the word 'unless'."

Amendment No. 26 will be moved later. When a claim petition is made in reference to an attachment made to property by a third party, it has to be made within six months from the date of the attachment and there will be an inquiry and decision under the procedure prescribed in clauses 6A and 6B. Now, under clause 7 of that section, Honourable Members will notice that if the proclaimed person does not appear within the time specified in the proclamation, the property under the attachment shall be at the disposal of Government, but it shall not be sold until the expiration of six months from the date of the attachment. That is all that it provides. It does not provide for a case where a claim is made and not disposed of within six months. Then the property may be sold as the section stands now. I therefore propose that the property should not be sold until after six months (retaining it as it is) and we must also ensure that the property should not be sold until the claim is disposed of. That is the object of the amendment. The wording as it stands in print I wish to alter somewhat simply to bring out the meaning clearly. The wording as I propose now will be: "or until any claim preferred or objection made under sub-section 6A has been disposed of under that sub-section, whichever period is later." That is to say, six months is allowed for objections being made. There may be one claim, there may be more than one claim. Suppose one claim is made and that is disposed of within the six months and then too the property should not be sold for six months, because you may get other claimants within the six months. Therefore I provide "whichever period is later." If there is any claim at all, that is disposed of. If there is no claim, six months should elapse, so that the property should not be sold till the matter is clear that there is a claim or there is a claim which is disallowed. For that purpose I propose the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Did the Honourable Member say "date" or "period"? Is it "whichever date is later"?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Which do you think is better? I will bow to you. The thing is until the claim is disposed of. It contemplates a period. "Whichever date" I do not mind. I bow to whatever suggestion you may put forward.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"That clause 14 be re-numbered 14 (1) and that to that clause as re-numbered the following sub-clause be added, namely:

'2. In sub-section (7) of the same section after the words 'date of attachment' the words 'or until any claim preferred or objection made under sub-section 6 (A) has been disposed of under that sub-section, whichever date is later'."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I think it will be perfectly suitable as now framed by Mr. Rangachariar if the word 'and' is substituted for the word 'or.'

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: That is what I originally thought. I quite accept that. It brings out the meaning. We may omit the words "whichever date is later." It will run thus:

"And until any claim preferred or objection made under sub-section 6 (A) has been disposed of under that sub-section."

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"That clause 14 be re-numbered 14 (1), and that to that clause as re-numbered, the following sub-clause be added, namely:

"(2) In sub-section (7) of the same section, after the words 'date of attachment' the words 'and until any claim preferred or objection made under sub-section (6A) has been disposed of under that sub-section'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Although my motion* comes under amendments, what I have really proposed is not an amendment or alteration of a sentence or word in clause 14, but what I have proposed, is an explanation of certain words. So, it will be necessary for me to read the clause itself, and then point out why this explanation is necessary in this case. Sub-section (1) of section 88 runs as follows:

"The Court issuing a proclamation under section 87 may at any time order the attachment of any property, movable or immovable, or both, belonging to the proclaimed person."

In sub-clause (3) of the same section we find:

"If the property ordered to be attached is a debt or other movable property, the attachment under this section shall be made:

(a) by seizure; or

(b) by the appointment of a receiver; or "

and so on. Then we find also in sub-section (4):

"If the property ordered to be attached is immovable, the attachment under this section shall, in the case of land paying revenue to Government be made through the Collector of the district in which the land is situate, and in all other cases:

(c) by taking possession; or

(f) by the appointment of a receiver; "

and so on.

Now the explanation that I want to be added, is this: The words 'belonging to the proclaimed person' are capable of interpretation in such a way that they will entail hardship unless they are explained and probably the whole object will be spoiled. That is why I wish to add an explanation that when the offender is a member of a joint family, 'property belonging to the proclaimed person' means the specific interest of such a person. Sir, perhaps, in a country like England or France, or other countries where people generally live separately, this explanation will be absolutely unnecessary. In a country like England or France probably as soon as an infant grows up, and becomes a man or a major and wants to marry, he will seek a home of his own, and unless he has a home of his own, probably he will not marry, so that practically all grown up men live separate. But in the case of India, whether they be Hindus, Muhammadans, Indian Christians or Parsees, or hold other religious beliefs, generally they live in joint families. You find in a family a grand-father, grand-mother, father, son, uncle, nephew, niece, perhaps a great-grand-father and a great-grandson all living together, and if a son wants to live in a separate home, he is looked down upon as having broken the home and having separated from his parents. It is looked upon with disapproval

* To clause 14 add the following at the end:

"To sub-section (7) of the said section 88, the following shall be added:

Explanation:—When the offender is a member of a joint family, property belonging to the proclaimed person means the specific interest of such person."

if a son or brother should live separate, but in other countries it will probably not be looked at in the same sense. The result is, in India, people almost invariably live in joint families. As regards the rights of different persons, it may be different. In the case of a Hindu who is governed by the Mitakshara law the right of survivorship and co-partnership come in. Hindus living under the Daybhaga law, the Indian Christians and the Muhammadans, Sikhs and others also live in joint families. They may not have ancestral property, but still they hold property jointly. If a person, who has committed an offence does not appear, somehow or other, the Court is justified in issuing a warrant and then a Proclamation and attachment side by side. Under section 87:

"If any Court has reason to believe (whether after taking evidence or not) that any person against whom a warrant has been issued by it has absconded or is concealing himself so that such warrant cannot be executed, such Court may publish a written proclamation requiring him to appear at a specified place and at a specified time not less than thirty days from the date of publishing such proclamation."

And section 88 provides:

"The Court issuing a proclamation under section 87 may at any time order the attachment of any property, moveable or immoveable, or both, belonging to the proclaimed person."

The Court is not to wait even 30 days after issuing the proclamation, but may at any time order the attachment of any property, moveable or immoveable, or both, belonging to the proclaimed person. Now if such a proclamation is issued, what will be the result? Really a person may have gone to any interior part of the country on business or trade. Then what happens? We know that every place is not accessible to the railway; nor have we got postal or telegraphic communication. A man may go into the interior somewhere where you cannot get a letter even in a fortnight, and if he seeks to come home from there to a railway station or a distant place, it may take a fortnight to travel from such interior place to the headquarters station. And in the meantime a proclamation will have been issued against him without his knowledge. Of course it will be to the interest of the complainant to represent that he is concealed, or if the police do not find him in the house, and do not take further steps and say, the man is concealing himself, what has the Magistrate to do? A warrant has to be issued, a proclamation has to be issued and the man's property is to be attached. I must say here, before any guilt is established, not only is the man punished but all the members of his family are punished by the attachment order because the attachment order provides that the property can be taken possession of and so on. To be more clear I shall say, for example, several persons are living jointly; they have no ancestral property, but have acquired a house. No sooner this attachment order is issued, what will be the result? The Receiver will come and take possession of the house. Suppose I am living with my brothers and their wives and children in a house. Suppose the house belongs to A, B, C, and D jointly and attachment orders are issued against the property as belonging to D, there is no wrong in taking possession of it, because it belongs to D as well and you cannot find fault with a Magistrate because he has issued an order of attachment against the same property for it belongs to him. Suppose I have a cow and my brothers and other members of the family have a share in the cow and my children and their children are living upon the milk of the cow. Now, if I have committed some offence, or if for some offence alleged against me, the police comes and takes possession of the cow, under an attachment order by a Magistrate, you cannot blame the

[Mr. B. N. Misra.]

Magistrate for his action saying it belongs to me. There is no safety in such procedure. If the cow is taken possession of, my brothers' children, or my own babies would be deprived of her milk. Say I have a house and am living under the Hindu Mitakshara family law. There is my wife who has got a right of residence in the house. Now are you going to punish my wife and turn her out although she has committed no offence, simply because a case has been filed against me rightly or wrongly and I have not appeared before a court not having any knowledge of such a fact? And will that law be sound and for the benefit of society and even in the interests of criminal law? I submit, Sir, this will be really a very hard and a very unwise law, if it will be a law where an innocent person can be turned out of a house because it jointly belongs to another. If for instance there is a joint partnership, business or firm and a case is filed against one of the members of the firm for some supposed crime. Suppose he has gone away somewhere on business and other members are carrying on the business. If this is really the law, you cannot blame the Magistrate for attaching the partnership property or the joint property belonging to the firm. It also belongs to the offender undoubtedly. He may have a hundredth share or a tenth share, but it belongs to him, and the property may be attached and taken possession of.

I need not multiply instances to show how this law will entail hardship on innocent members of a family because by the custom of the country they are living together. No provision has been made in this case. I submit, Sir, the House will consider the reasonableness of the explanation I have given, not only in the interests of members of joint Mitakshara families but of all members of the Hindu or Muhammadan community, or Parsees or Indian Christians, or any community that is living jointly. Other members should not be punished for the alleged offence committed by an accused person.

Now, Sir, I have explained the other difficulties. Probably the prosecution may say, if a man is concealing himself, 'Attach the property and the other members of the family will be compelled to produce him.' The object of our criminal law is never to punish innocent people. It is a very laudable object to punish the guilty and I have never said a thing whereby a guilty person should escape or not be brought to trial. What I say is that the other members should not suffer. Supposing a man in a village has committed an offence. There is the complainant to produce him, there is the police also to find him out, there are so many agencies really to find out the man. It may be the case that a complaint has been lodged against a person who has perhaps gone away on business or without his knowledge some false complaint has been filed against him and it has been made to appear to the Magistrate that the man is absconding or concealing himself. The section says:

"If any Court has reason to believe (whether after taking evidence or not) that any person against whom a warrant has been issued by it has absconded or is concealing himself, etc."

So that as soon as a representation is made the Court can issue an attachment. It generally happens that the police comes and says 'so and so is concealing himself' or the complainant comes and tells the Magistrate 'so and so is concealing himself, we cannot find him, issue a warrant against him and also this proclamation and attachment order.' Then, the result is that we have to punish the other members of the family who are quite innocent, who would themselves be interested to point out the accused if he could be found.

Now, Sir, probably it may be said 'Well, there are already provisions for a claim; if any person's property is attached, the other members having any right or claim to the property can lay a claim.' My submission to this House is, that is really the most undesirable part of it. Now, Sir, the average family is not rich nor can they file a claim. You cannot simply go to the court and file it; you must come with money to file a claim. You must substantiate your claim, and by that time what has happened? Your wife, who never came out, is in the street and your children are somewhere not knowing where to get their food. If you had any granary or paddy or gram or wheat in your house, all that is attached. You have no food, no house to live in and no cloth to wear. Can you imagine any one in such circumstances coming and laying a claim very easily? He must pay his pleader, his mukhtear or his petition writer, whoever he may be, and must pay his court fees and adduce evidence. After all this paraphernalia has been gone through, he does not know what the decision of the Magistrate will be in such a case. If the whole provision was not on the Statute Book, it would be really wholesome, but, since there is a provision, and since some offenders may evade a trial, I think, when the Crown is prosecuting or when the Crown is the complainant, as the burden of proof always lies on the prosecution, this burden must also lie on the prosecution to specify the interest of the accused person. The prosecution can very easily find it out; I do not think there will be any difficulty. If a particular person lives in a family, his relations or interests are known to the complainant or to the police, whoever lodges the complaint. Under the Hindu law the complainant knows this man has got a certain share in the property. Even under any other system of law you must know that he has so much share or that other persons like his wife and mother have got a right of residence or his old grand-mother or old grand-father has got a right of residence. These things can be known very easily and it ought to lie on the prosecution to show the interest that an accused has in a property. Of course, so long as you do not proceed against property there is no trouble, but once you attach property you do not touch the accused alone, you touch all the relations, all the surroundings, all the members. For instance, a poor tenant has some fields and you come and take away the paddy heaps he has harvested. The poor tenant has toiled the whole year to get some paddy from the field and you come and take away his paddy, simply because it belongs to the landlord. This morning we had so much discussion about this attachment. I submit this House will remember these difficulties of attachment and the trouble and expenses one has to undergo over these attachments. Why put a man to all this trouble, why drag him to Court and then so charitably release his property after putting him to so much trouble.

This House will also remember that, even in the Civil Procedure Code, when you attach property, at least some things are exempted from attachment, for instance, the implements of a workman or some paddy grains or paddy seeds for the poor peasant or some other things which are absolutely necessary. I think that is not at all illiberal. Will our Criminal Procedure Code be so illiberal as not to leave anything? You will attach everything without exception. No exemption of property is made under this, you lose everything. Supposing there are two brothers who have got a pair of bullocks for ploughing the land. One brother has committed or is supposed to have committed some crime. You come and take away the pair of bullocks and do not spare for the other brother even one bullock with which he could otherwise have cultivated his land. It is very hard to attach the property of a proclaimed person who is responsible for all this business, because it may belong to ten persons as well as to the proclaimed person.

Then, Sir, for wrongful attachment under the Civil Procedure Code there is some remedy. But, supposing a man wrongfully applied to the Court and said 'So and so is concealing himself' and the court issues an order of attachment for all the property, there is no provision for protection against the wrongful attachment of his property under this Code. If it is done under the orders of the Magistrate, the civil court will say 'You cannot proceed, you have no remedy practically, it was an act of a Court.' It would mean an action and then you would have to make the Secretary of State for India a party. But in practice this is never done. The 3 P.M. interest is never specified. So in the case of joint families it is absolutely a hard and difficult procedure that has been laid down here. Under these circumstances I propose that this explanation should be added, so that the Magistrates, whether they be third class or second class, whether they be new men or experienced men, may not commit an error and innocent people may not be harassed. With these words I propose that this amendment should be carried.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I think, Sir, that the amendment proposed by my friend, Mr. Misra, is quite unnecessary, because under the section what the Court attaches is the property belonging to the defaulting man. What the property of the defaulting man is, is a question to be decided in each case as it comes up. The rights of members of a joint family are not the same all over India. They are different under different laws. Mitakshara in that respect is different from Daybhaga. Whatever it is, what the property belonging to a defaulting member is, is a question of fact to be decided in each case as it comes up. I do not see what will be gained by adding an explanation to that section, and I therefore think that this amendment is quite unnecessary.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I endorse every word of what my friend, Mr. Pantulu, has said and I think the amendment proposed by my friend, Mr. Misra, is unworkable. It is impossible for the attaching officer to know what the specific interest of a particular person would be in a joint family estate. That is a matter of fact which must be ascertained on a regular inquiry and that inquiry will come in when a claim is put in by the other members of the joint family, to claim that property or specific share of the property as their own. In the commencement when a property belonging to a person is attached, the officer attaching has absolutely no grounds of inquiry as to what specific interest that man has in the property. Therefore I say the amendment proposed will be entirely unworkable and I think quite unnecessary.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I rise to support the amendment, but I may preface my point by stating at once that the amendment proposed suggests wholly a question of onus—that is to say, it suggests that the person attaching the property of an absconder should start with the idea that the property he is going to attach is the property of the absconding person. There is a great deal in a clear formation of this preliminary idea, and the difficulties arising from indiscriminate procedure have been pointed out by my friend, the proposer of the amendment. In the Civil Procedure Code when an attachment is intended, an application has to be filed in which a declaration has to be made as to the property intended to be attached. The petition has to be verified and it has to be stated that to the best of the declarant's knowledge, information or belief as the case may be, the contents are true. But there is no such obligation laid upon the Magistrate who proceeds to attach the property of an absconder and therefore a certain amount of carelessness is likely to come in and does come in, at times. That is a thing which ought to be avoided, if possible. No doubt a judicial inquiry cannot be held at that stage, but if Magistrates come to know that they have got to pay some attention to the matter and make out a prima facie case connecting the property to be attached with the absconder before they proceed against the property of the man, it will certainly be a step forward towards the realisation of the object of the amendment. I submit, Sir, if the point be looked at in that way, there is something in the amendment. If it be accepted, Magistrates, before attaching the property of the absconder, will try and ascertain, as far as possible, whether it really belongs to the person who has committed the offence. That being so, a safeguard which is not to be found now in the Criminal Procedure Code will be introduced into it by indirect means, by the proposed amendment. Therefore, Sir, I submit that instead of putting indiscriminately all persons who may have some interest in the property wrongly attached, to the necessity of coming into court and proving his case, in order to save it from wrongful disposal, the Magistrate should be required to pay more attention to this matter of attachment, and find out in the beginning whether the property that is going to be attached is really the property of the absconder or not. Therefore, Sir, I submit that the amendment ought to meet with acceptance in the House. There is nothing harmful in the proposed amendment. It merely attempts to clear up the question of the duty of a Magistrate in this connection to a greater extent, than now. The difficulties which are likely to arise and are likely to be faced in the beginning of the proceedings are calculated to be removed, to a great extent by the House adopting the underlying principle of the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I wish to offer some words of explanation for the consideration of the Mover of this amendment to say whether his amendment is really necessary. The explanation deals with the joint family. Now a joint family may be under the Dayabhaga law or under the Mitakshara. Take the case of the Mitakshara family. The law differs from Province to Province as regards the right of an undivided member of an undivided family. In Madras every member has got the right to alienate his interest in the property or rather his share, at the date of the alienation, in the property. In other Provinces where the Mitakshara law prevails, he has not got that right. No doubt in all Provinces the Court can seize and sell the interest of an undivided member in the family property. Therefore to speak of specific interest of an undivided member in a joint family jars on my ears, because there is no such interest in the joint family property. There is no specific property. It is not consonant with law to speak of an undivided member having a specific interest. You can talk of undivided interest—that is, his share on partition, if a partition should take place.

This section has stood so long and I do not think any difficulty has been felt in the application of it. It is not a new wording. The wording has been there all the time and the section has not given any trouble at all. The matter came up once before the Madras High Court, and there it was decided by my Honourable friend sitting on my left when he was on the Bench and another learned Judge. But of course you cannot seize the whole property, you can only seize the undivided interest of the absconding member. Even if a Receiver is appointed—and in that case I believe a Receiver was appointed—the Receiver can only take the interest of the undivided member, restoring the rest of the profits to the family members.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Misra, no doubt has pointed out the difficulties in the way; but of course his explanation is not likely to remove those difficulties. How does he remove those pictures that he has drawn to us of a wife and other members of the family being thrown on the streets and all that? It is still open under his explanation to attach the undivided interest of the absconder, and when you have attached you can appoint a Receiver and of course there must be some remedy and some means of getting at the offender. Therefore I do not think really it would improve matters if we add this explanation. On the other hand you are introducing a new thing; probably in provinces where the man has not got alienating power, it may be possible for them to contend that it is not property belonging to the offender at all, whereas now you make a definite statement by adding the explanation here saying that in the case of a particular joint family he may have an interest in that property. Therefore it is better to leave it as it is because the law differs from province to province and it has not created any difficulty so far and the specific interest is unknown to law, and therefore you will be introducing a thing which is unknown to law. I do not think, therefore, we will improve matters by adding this explanation.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur (Bhagalpur, Purnea and the Santhal Parganas Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the Honourable Mover seeks to add an explanation to the words used in section 88—'belonging to the proclaimed offender.' He wants to have an explanation added that the words 'belonging to a proclaimed offender' in the case of a joint family should mean the specific interest of such person. This explanation if adopted will complicate matters more than the difficulties already pointed out. In a joint family governed by the Mitakshara law where the law of survivorship prevails, there is no member who can say what his specific interest is in his family property; he has got an undivided share, but not a specific share; unless there is an amicable partition made between the members of the family or unless there is a partition suit instituted in a civil court and the matter is decided and the interest defined, no one can say what his specific interest is. In a case where there is an attachment under section 88 the Magistrate has to attach the property 'belonging to the offender.' In a joint undivided family that would mean the undivided interest of that offender and as has been pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar it has been held by the Madras High Court that even an undivided share in a joint Hindu family can be attached. But if an explanation is now added, and if it is said that you must attach the specific interest of the offender, what would be the result? The result would be that the Magistrate must specify the interest of the offender before he can put up the property to sale. Will the House expect the Magistrate to go to the civil courts and have a partition suit instituted and have the interest of the offender defined before he can put up the property to sale? Certainly, Sir, this House cannot expect Magistrates to go to civil courts to have the interest of an offender defined before they can put a property to sale. Furthermore if you put in the words 'specific interest' there will be no purchaser forthcoming, unless the specific interest has been defined; so that if you add these words as an explanation, the complications would become more complicated. Then, Sir, you will find that the result of this amendment if accepted would be that an offender will be at large with immunity and the other members of his family will have every facility to screen him and keep him from the law. I consider, therefore, that this amendment, although the object in bringing it may be good, is not one which this House can accept or ought to accept. The illustrations given by the Honourable Mover regarding the cow and a house, I am sorry, do not appeal to me in any way. The offender, if there is a cow in the family, has got some interest—an undivided share—in it. The cow has to be attached, but a portion of it cannot be attached. You cannot say to the court "well, this portion of the cow is the specific interest of the offender." You have to attach the cow and take it to court, sell it and sell the undivided share, whatever it is, in the cow and the other members of the family may have the sale proceeds. That is all that can be done. In the case of a house the undivided share of an offender can be sold, and I do not think any case has cropped up till now where the ladies of the house have been turned out of the house because the offender's share has been sold. So, Sir, I have tried my level best to find if this amendment can be accepted, but I am sorry that I have not been able to follow the argument of the Honourable Mover that this amendment will improve the situation. On the contrary, my own impression is that it will complicate matters more than what he has described. With these remarks I beg to oppose the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mover.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I beg to move that the question be now put.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the amendment be made.
The motion was negatived.

Clause 14, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"In clause 15 insert the following at the beginning:

"In sub-section (1) of section 103, for the word 'two' the word 'five' shall be substituted."

Sir, as regards searches it is provided that there should be two or more respectable inhabitants of the locality to attend a search; the officers generally take only a small number, say two persons and they are really the village headmen or some others who are really interested in the prosecution. Now under clause (5) of this section we have "Any person who without reasonable cause refuses or neglects to attend and witness a search under this section when called upon to do so by an order in writing delivered or tendered to him, shall be deemed to have committed an offence under section 187 of the Indian Penal Code." So strictly speaking there will be no difficulty in getting more witnesses.

In excise and other cases where smuggling of opium and other drugs are in question, generally the department comes forward with one or two informers who attest the search list when it is made. In these cases other villagers or respectable men are not called to attest the list. Strictly speaking, in any village two or more people can be found, and there will be no difficulty to get more persons to avoid suspicion. There is another difficulty, Sir. Sometimes you have got only two witnesses in the search list; sometimes they fall ill or they don't come, and when the case comes up it has to be adjourned from time to time till those witnesses turn up. (A Voice: "There is the word 'more'.") Well, if you take the word "more", accept them as five, there is no objection to that; but the difficulty is, if there are only a small number of witnesses, it is not good, because some of them may happen to be interested only in the prosecution, or sometimes they may not be present when they are called, on account of illness or any other cause, and the case will have to be adjourned many times. It is of course a simple matter, my amendment does not really deal with the substance, but it is simply a safeguard. If there are more persons it is better. That is why I have put the word 'five' in place of the word 'two'. Instead of giving the option to two, you can have more than five and there will not be any hardship. With these observations, Sir, I commend my amendment to the House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I do not know, Sir, whether the House desires that I should argue this section? (Cries of "No, No.") I am probably right in assuming that they think this amendment is unnecessary.

(A Voice: "Unworkable.")

(Voices: "The question may now be put.")

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the amendment be made. The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): Sir, the amendment that stands in my name reads thus:

"Omit clause 15 or in the alternative if the amendment to omit the whole clause fails, add the words 'if necessary' after the word 'may' in sub-clause (1)".

I would speak only on the first part of my amendment for the omission of clause 15. Clause 15 gives power to a police officer making an inquiry to compel any person to sign as a search witness. He may issue an order in writing to them or any of them so to do. After that clause you have "After sub-section (4) of the same section the following sub-section shall be added, namely: 'Any person who without reasonable cause refuses or neglects to attend and witness a search under this section, when called upon to do so by an order in writing delivered or tendered to him, shall be deemed to have committed an offence under section 187 of the Indian Penal Code.'" I may submit, Sir, that really speaking this sub-clause creates a new offence or rather brings a certain act within an offence which does not already exist. In 26, Madras, 449, it is held that refusal to sign a search is an offence under section 187 or 188, and it is now held that a police officer should be given authority to ask anybody whom he likes to sign as a witness. If that order is in writing and if the person to whom it is issued refuses to sign, then he is liable to be prosecuted under section 187.

This practically means giving an additional power to the inquiring police officer there and then to ask anybody to be a witness and then, if he refuses, to prosecute him under section 187. I submit, Sir, that in creating any new offence or say in bringing any acts within the sphere of any offence by a new Act of Legislation, a very good case should be made out in favour of this innovation. Personally, I have not known many cases where the police officers have found very great difficulty in finding such witnesses. The effect of this amendment would be that the inquiring officer will have an additional means of harassing respectable people in the villages whomsoever he would like to do. There might be certain persons who would be expected to be defence witnesses or there might be certain persons who for certain reasons may not be able to sign the search list or they would not like to be put to the trouble of signing that search list, and when we find that there has not been any special difficulty up till now and we have done without this power for so many decades, I see no reason why this innovation should now be made.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: As Mr. Man Singh says, this is of course a case in which we add a new penalty to the Code. I recognize that it is our duty to explain clearly to the House the circumstances in which we propose to add this provision. I can best do so by reading an extract from the recommendation of Sir George Lowndes' Committee—which dealt with this matter, and which added this clause:

"We accept the proposal of the Bill to penalise an unreasonable refusal or neglect to attend as a search witness, but would make it a condition precedent that the person in question should have been required to attend by an order in writing from the police-officer. In order to make this clear, we have, in addition to the new sub-section (5), made a small amendment at the end of sub-section (1).

We think that the power thus given to the police, practically to compel the attendance of respectable witnesses from as near as possible to the place where the search is to be effected, should go far to put an end to the objectionable practice of bringing semi-professional search witnesses from a greater distance, and will also prevent the frustration of searches by the unreasonable refusal of witnesses to attend, which, we understand, is by no means uncommon. If executive instructions are issued to the police that, with this new sub-section to back them, they are, whenever possible, to require the attendance of respectable witnesses from the immediate vicinity, we think that a considerable improvement will be effected."

The new provision therefore has two aspects. Firstly, it is designed to prevent the frustration of searches by witnesses refusing to attend. That, of course, is a provision made to assist the administration of justice. But secondly, as the recommendation I have just read out to the House clearly shows, it is also intended to prevent an actual malpractice—a malpractice of which I dare say some here have seen instances—namely, the practice of bringing in as search witnesses men who are practically professional witnesses. It was, therefore, made for the protection of the public. Now, it is true, as Bhai Man Singh says, that we have done without this provision for a number of years. He implies, however, that, because we have done without it for a number of years, we ought still to be able to dispense with it. Surely not, Sir, if malpractices actually occur, and if we can prevent them by the insertion of this provision. He is, I think, afraid mainly of the penalty section. I may point out that this section only becomes operative if any person, without reasonable cause, refuses or neglects to attend. I do not argue the case regarding the requirement that notice should issue in writing since this is really only a condition precedent to the penalty provision. For my own part I do not feel that it is in any way unreasonable that when searches have to be made, the ordinary citizen should be required to assist in such searches and to witness and sign the search list; it is not a very heavy or very onerous requirement, and it is far better that power should be given to compel the attendance of respectable witnesses than that it should be left entirely to the discretion of the police to bring in their own semi-professional witnesses.

Bhai Man Singh: May I know if any special difficulty has been felt up till now?

Mr. W. M. Hussainally: I may tell my Honourable friend that in large cities, especially Karachi, as a Magistrate I know that the police have had difficulties in finding people to go with them to witness searches very often.

Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur: (Surma Valley cum Shillong: Non-Muham-radan): I bear the same testimony from my experience also.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I see on looking through our files that the Local Governments have frequently pointed out the necessity for some such requirement as this, owing to the difficulty frequently experienced in obtaining search witnesses. I would further point out to the Honourable Member, in justification of the provision which we propose to insert, that it was published at an early date as part of the Bill and I think that we have received only one criticism of it, and that criticism was of a very mild nature. It merely suggested that, in issuing executive instructions, we should make it clear that witnesses should come from the immediate vicinity.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment proposed:

"Omit clause 15."

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: I do not propose to move the other part* of my amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I propose an amendment to clause 15. My amendment runs as follows:

"In clause 15, sub-clause (1) after the words 'to do', add the following proviso:

"Provided that no pleaders, barristers, solicitors, attorneys, or mukhtars shall be required to attend and witness the

My object in moving this amendment is that these are the persons who have to deal with courts of law and who have to deal also with the accused and the offenders in such cases and also with the property involved. These are the persons that may have to conduct the prosecution or the defence of such offenders and may have to file suits regarding the property damaged or destroyed in the search. Therefore so far as possible, these persons should be left alone. I therefore propose, Sir, that these persons should not be required to attend and witness the search as is intended under section 103. They are exempted from being jurors or assessors. I therefore submit, Sir, that my amendment be accepted by the House and clause 15 be amended accordingly.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: May I request my Honourable friend, the Mover, to add the words 'medical men'?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Here again, Sir, is a matter which I am doubtful if the House desires that we should argue at length. There are many members of this honourable profession in the House and I am not at all sure that Mr. Agnihotri really voices their wishes in this matter. May I point out one consideration? I do not suppose that members of the legal profession have any stronger desire than other classes of society to avoid their obligations to the public, and to their fellow-men. They are probably as ready as any men to recognise their duties. Again, busy men as they are, they are not the only busy men in ordinary life. My friend, Mr. Hussanally, pointed out that there are doctors, and he might have added that there are engineers, there are merchants who have equal difficulty in giving up their time. It is difficult, therefore, to see why we should make an exception in favour of this one class. But I can give a substantive reason why, on the other hand, it is advisable to include them, for I can imagine no class of men are more likely to keep a critical eye on the proceedings of the police than the class to which Mr. Agnihotri refers.

Reo Bahadur T. Rangachariar: There is some misapprehension on the part of the Honourable the Home Member. The object is not to save ourselves the trouble of taking part in this sort of function, but really to enable an accused person to have the services of pleaders and barristers in case he has to defend himself. That is why they are exempt from jury, and that is why they should be exempted from this sort of work which renders them liable to be called as witnesses. If perhaps at a remote place there are only one pleader or two and they are called on to witness a search, they would disable them from defending the accused person because they will be witnesses and the accused will be prejudiced. It is a well-known rule in the Bar and in the profession that no person who is a witness in a cause can undertake the conduct of such a case. It is a well-known rule amongst us and I do not think that any respectable member of the profession will depart from it. If he is likely to be called as a witness, he should refuse the brief. It is therefore throwing a disability on the profession and that is why this amendment is sought to be made.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: With all deference to those members of my profession who take a different view, I venture to oppose this amendment. I agree with the Honourable the Home Member in saying that the members of our profession ought to take their fair share in furthering the administration of justice. I do not think that if I were a witness to a search, that mere fact would, upon any ground of forensic etiquette with which I am acquainted, prevent me from acting as counsel either on behalf of the prosecution or on behalf of the defence in the case which might arise as a result of that search. Moreover I think that the proposed amendment is largely unnecessary. We should look at the practical effect of the proposed exemption. We have a great deal of protection in the natural aversion of a police or other searching officer to ask any barrister or pleader or other member of the legal fraternity to take part in his investigation or search proceedings. It is true, as has been remarked, that members of the legal profession are exempt from service on juries. It seems curious and inconsistent that they are not exempt from service as judges; and perhaps there may be arguments against their exemption from juries. But analogies are not safe, and on this simple matter of exemption of the profession from witnessing searches, I say that the danger to the profession is so remote and so small that we need not encumber the Code with this amendment.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): I support the amendment on monetary grounds. I think every member of the Bar who practises on the criminal side has to fear this a great deal and he must support this amendment. Supposing a police officer thinks that such and such a man is my client and reposes great confidence in me, he may be tempted just to take me as a search witness. And if I happen to be a search witness my position will be very critical because I will not be able to accept a brief on behalf of my client and at the same time be a witness against him. On this point I think it is advisable that this amendment should be accepted and a proper latitude and a free hand should be given to the legal practitioners who should not be hampered in the discharge of their proper duties.

Mr. J. Ohaudhuri: I would oppose this amendment. In the interests of the general public it is important to select reliable witnesses and it is very difficult to get the proper sort of persons to attend a search party. Apart from the narrow view that my professional friends take, I think it will be in the interests of the public that they should get some respectable people to accompany them in the search and if they are lawyers, it is all the better and therefore I oppose this amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: I support this motion for amendment which speaks for itself. I do not only look to the monetary interests of the lawyer class but also to the practical phase of the question. Supposing a Barrister or a Pleader or a Vakil or a Mukhtar is brought on the list of those persons who may be called upon as witnesses to see the search and the time fixed for searching the house is, say, 10 o'clock and he has got two cases in which he defends the accused in Court, he cannot perform two public duties. The latter is not less responsible than the former. The police ask him to come as a witness. He ought to perform that duty but on the other hand he has got his professional duty to defend an accused. For the defence of the case of his client he, as you know, is responsible. He cannot perform two duties at one and same time. He must ignore one to do the other. Therefore, it will not serve any useful purpose to bring members of the Bar on the list of witnesses who may be called upon to examine or witness the search, and, consequently, an exemption may be extended to them. And we have got a very faithful analogy in support of it, which is this, that lawyers are not enlisted as assessors or jurymen and the underlying principle is,—that in the first place they are very busy, and in the second place, their profession is of great usefulness to the public at large. Therefore, it is quite proper that exemption may be given to them and I am in favour of this amendment which has so ably been moved.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I do not wish to give a silent vote upon this matter. It is not a question of pure selfishness on the part of the legal profession, which has prompted Mr. Agnihotri to move this amendment. The position is this. If a lawyer is asked to be present at a search and thereby to become a witness to the search, in the subsequent stages when the case itself is being heard, (if he is a witness), he would not be allowed, as decided by the Allahabad High Court, to appear as a pleader. It is not only handicapping him at the outset, but it will make it impossible for him later on to do any work for the client who knows him and wants him. After all, the search would not suffer by excluding this class of persons. It has been considered as a good principle of law, that persons who are connected with its practice should be exempted from serving on the jury. And what is the necessity for making a change now and asking lawyer to witness the search? Any number of people could be got to witness the search. To make a lawyer witness the search and subsequently debar him from being of service is putting a double penalty upon him, which I do not think this House should countenance. I therefore think that Government and this House should accept the amendment which has been moved.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I rise, Sir, to oppose this amendment, chiefly on the grounds mentioned a few minutes ago that if lawyers are to be exempted, there is much more reason why medical men should be exempted, also because they are very frequently concerned with cases in which the life and death of their patients are concerned. Suppose, Sir, a medical man is on his way to visit his patient, and that it is a very urgent call, and on the way he is waylaid by a police officer and compelled to attend a search, what is the poor man to do? Is he to visit his patient or is he to obey the commandments of the law and accompany the police officer? If lawyers are to be exempted, I see no reason to compel medical men to attend these searches, and if medical men are to be exempted, why not Engineers? Then, practically it comes to this that all professional men are to be exempted from attending such searches. The difficulty pointed out is not very great. As regards the contention that lawyers will not be able to defend their clients, if they are witnesses to the search, as a rule there are a number of lawyers in almost every station, so that if one gentleman has been by chance waylaid by a policeman to attend a search, there are a number of other gentlemen available to be engaged in defending the client.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I move that the question be now put

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 15, sub-clause (1) after the words 'to do', add the following words:

'Provided that no pleaders, barristers, solicitors, attorneys, or mukhtars shall be required to attend and witness the search'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 15 was added to the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: We now come to the chapter dealing with the power of Magistrates to demand security for keeping the peace. The first of those sections is 106. Section 106 enables a Magistrate to impose a double penalty. He convicts the person and sentences him to the punishment he deserves, and in certain cases he is also authorised to demand security from that person by ordering him to execute a bond for a sum proportionate to his means, with or without surety, for keeping the peace for such period, not exceeding three years, as he thinks fit to fix. So that is an additional punishment imposed on an accused person who is convicted. Naturally therefore the law restricted it to certain cases where the public peace was likely to be involved by the crime committed by the accused person, so the language of section 106, as it stood was:

"Whenever any person accused of rioting, assault or other offence involving a breach of the peace, or of abetting the same, or of assembling armed men or taking other unlawful measures with the evident intention of committing the same, or any person accused of committing criminal intimidation, is convicted of such offence—" then the Magistrate may impose this additional punishment. Now the object of the amendment proposed by Government to this clause is to enlarge the scope of the offence for which such an order can be made. In the first place, I do not think any case has been made out for making any amendment of this section 106. I have been looking at the literature furnished by the Government in respect to this matter. All I find is that in the report of the Lowndes Committee there is a small paragraph, on page 4, on the notes on clauses—I do not know if Honourable

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Members have got their copies with them—clause 18 (1) was the proposed clause apparently; I have not seen what that clause was. They say:

"We do not like this amendment. We would, however, redraft section 106 (1) as shown in the amended Bill. We think that it is better to enlarge the scope of this section by including all offences under Chapter VIII of the Penal Code, than to involve the Court in an inquiry whether the offence of which the accused has been convicted, though not involving a breach of the peace, was nevertheless likely to have occasioned a breach."

That is the reason which they give for including the whole of Chapter VIII. The amendment now made by the Joint Committee to this Bill as it was originally put in is to exclude only, as Honourable Members will find, section 153A from out of that Chapter, because the amendment, as it now runs, reads:

"Whenever any person accused of any offence punishable under Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code, other than an offence punishable under section 153A thereof, or of other offence involving a breach of the peace, or of abetting the same."

So that they retain the words 'or other offences involving a breach of the peace'. Now I do not see how by the proposed section they are in any way making it easier for Magistrates to come to a conclusion. Section 106, as it stands, specifies certain offences, namely, rioting and assault, assembling armed men or taking other unlawful measures with the evident intention of committing the same, or any person accused of committing criminal intimidation or other offences involving a breach of the peace. So that specified offences are named there as instances of offences involving a breach of the peace. Now the whole of Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code is supposed to include offences involving a breach of the peace. If you will look at Chapter VIII it includes all sorts of offences and I do not see why the whole of the Chapter is included except section 153-A, which is a well-known section dealing with the creation of differences between different communities. I will briefly run through the various sections coming under Chapter VIII of the Penal Code. First of all we have being a member of an unlawful assembly. Unless, therefore, the events connected with the transaction were such that the particular unlawful assembly were guilty of acts, although they did not actually commit acts of rioting which would indicate that it was likely to involve a question of a breach of the peace, then it was left to the discretion of the Magistrate to impose this penalty. Now, 'whenever a person accused of an offence under section 143 is convicted.' It leaves it open to the Magistrate to impose this additional penalty, whether really the public peace is threatened or not. After all, this is a preventive section and not a punitive section. That has to be remembered. It is preventive, that is to say, the Court has to be satisfied that the person convicted is also a person likely to commit hereafter a breach of the peace. In order to prevent that breach of the peace, security is demanded, it is not an additional punishment which is in contemplation. The whole object is to prevent a breach of the peace, it must be necessary for the Court to be satisfied that a breach of the peace is probable. Therefore, it would have to depend upon the facts of each case, upon the circumstances of each case whether really such preventive action should be taken. In the case of rioting, of course, it is obvious; that is why the Code has taken care to specify it. In the case of assault it is obvious. There has been a breach of the peace, and, therefore, if he is a man likely to continue such acts, then, of course, it will be necessary to impose this penalty.

Again if a man is convicted of assembling armed men, then obviously his object is to commit a breach of the peace; or if he is convicted of criminal intimidation, where, of course, by force he extorts property and other things—in such cases the Code has left it at that. In Madras I have not found that there have been any cases of difficulty felt by Courts in applying section 106. There have been hardly any cases where the Courts found any difficulty in construing this section and I do not find there in the commentaries (which are voluminous) any very serious cases which involved the Courts in any considerable difficulties. Let us remember also that by no amount of legislation can we avoid difficulties in Courts. You may have the most ably drawn Code. I do not think there can be any better Code than the Indian Penal Code, and even there you find frequently difficulties arising in the Courts. Courts exist for such difficulties. Courts exist to construe the real intention of the Acts; and therefore I do not think it is necessary to consider that as a valid ground. I will use the argument adopted by the Government benches yesterday, that where a Code has worked well without much difficulty you should not tamper with the Code. A case has still to be made out. No reason is given in Lowndes Committee's Report. They think it is advisable. • Why should they think so? Have they condescended to give reasons why all the sections under Chapter VII should be included?

I propose just to draw the attention of Honourable Members to Chapter VIII. 'Joining an unlawful assembly'; 'Joining and continuing in an unlawful assembly.' As we all know, even women and children get caught in an unlawful assembly and it is very difficult for them to extricate themselves. Without warning an assembly is ordered to disperse, and they still continue to be members of an unlawful assembly. Is it contemplated that in such cases the Court should be empowered to impose this additional burden? Of course where they may be armed with deadly weapons and all those things, and again, knowingly join or continue in an unlawful assembly of that sort the case will be different. I do not know why, on the reasoning adopted by them here, this Joint Committee excluded 153-A from the scope of the Bill. When you promote enmity between classes, that is the surest method of bringing about a breach of the peace and yet that is excluded. I do not know why. (Mr. N. M. Samarth: "As a sop to Cerberus.") They give no reason.

Section 154 deals with an owner or occupier of land not giving information of a riot on his land. Such a person may be convicted. I don't see why he should be called upon to give security and be punished also for not giving information. Why should he be called upon to give security as if a riot is going to take place periodically unless it is shown that it is a place where frequent risings occur? It may be a temple dispute or a land dispute between rival parties. Why should you assume that he is not going to give information? After all the punishment is for not giving information of a riot. Once he is convicted, why should he be called upon to give security for keeping the peace? He is not a rioter. He is owner of the land on which the riot took place. Once he is convicted he is sure to take the lesson to heart and next time a riot takes place on his land he is sure to give information. But how has he committed an offence for which you can demand security? I think, Sir, the whole thing is merely due to the fact that the Lowndes Committee said so and it must be so.

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

This measure has come before us without proper examination of the various sections. I do not think it is necessary to tinker with the Code as it is. It has not led to any practical difficulty. The Courts have administered it without causing any irritation to the public, nor has the public peace suffered by not enlarging the scope of this section.

Therefore, Sir, I would leave well alone, even if it is unwell, to adopt the language of my Honourable friend from the United Provinces whom I welcome to this Assembly as one who contributes weighty and valuable additions to our debates—even if it is unwell, as we cannot improve it, let us leave it at that. I therefore propose to omit clause 16 (1) which proposes to amend the present section.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Mr. Rangachariar began by arguing that this was an attempt to take greater powers on the part of Government. But from his subsequent remarks it is clear that he laid no great stress on that statement. He realised (what is indeed a fact) that this provision of the Bill was intended merely to clear up doubts. I have read through all the papers on the subject; there never was a suggestion that we required to take greater powers in this respect. The contrary is really the case; for it is clear that under the existing Code the Court might pass an order against a man who had been convicted under 153A, whereas the new clause omits this section. Mr. Rangachariar himself thinks that it should be able to pass such an order. By this Bill we exclude . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It is anomalous that it should be omitted and other comparatively innocent offences should be included.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Well, as to that, I will give the House the precise reason why the Lowndes Committee excluded 153A. They received a forcible representation on the subject from the Madras Vakils' Association. Whether Mr. Rangachariar is still a member of that association or not I am not aware; whether he joined in that representation or not I am equally unaware. . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It must have been done in my absence.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I must have the fact as it stands. But to return; the reason why this clause was introduced in its present form was simply to clear up doubts. The first authority which complained that the Act was not sufficiently precise was one entitled to consideration even from the Madras Vakils' Association; it was the Calcutta High Court. In 1911 the High Court suggested that the wording of the section was too narrow. When the matter was subsequently commented on by the various judicial authorities consulted, many pointed out that the wording left the Courts doubtful; a man might be convicted of an offence—but I will give the exact words of one critic:

"Whereas the section provides that an order cannot be passed against a convicted person unless he is convicted of an offence of which breach of the peace is a necessary ingredient it often happens that the scope of the offence discloses a likelihood of breach of the peace even though accused is guilty of an offence of which breach of the peace is not a necessary ingredient."

The first proposal placed before the Lowndes Committee was therefore to redraft simply in order to do away with that doubt, a doubt which forces the Courts continually to inquire whether the particular offence did or did not involve a breach of the peace or was likely to cause a breach of the peace. They objected however to the form of words proposed and thought it simpler to draft in the sense of the present clause, under which any offence punishable under Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code other than an offence under section 158A could be made the subject of an order by the Magistrate. That is the simple explanation why we have got this particular form of draft. That there was actually a difficulty arising from the drafting of the existing Code is, I think, clear. Mr. Rangachariar said that he was unaware of any ruling which showed that the matter had been in doubt by the Courts. Well, I have here a reference to what seems to me a very large number of rulings on that particular point. It seems to me that the commentaries show that there has been very great doubt on the subject, and that it has involved a good deal of trouble to the Courts. I quite agree with Mr. Rangachariar, and it is a proposition which I welcome from him, that where a section of procedure has stood for many years and has involved the Courts in no difficulty, it is better to let it stand; but that is not the case here; it is clear from the commentaries that this section has actually involved the Courts in a good deal of difficulty.

Now I come to the substance. I am prepared to admit with Mr. Rangachariar that in taking the whole of Chapter VIII—and its scope is somewhat extended—we may have gone somewhat beyond the strict requirements of the case, though the difference is more nominal than real. It is perhaps unnecessary that we should include such a section as 154: I agree with Mr. Rangachariar as to the absence of necessity for including such a section. A remark of the same nature might equally be made perhaps against 151. We are quite willing, as far as we are concerned, and provided that we can get the clause into a form in which there will be no difficulty involved on the part of the Courts in the matter of interpretation, to exclude such sections as seem to be entirely unnecessary. I think that if that were done, Mr. Rangachariar's point of substance would be met, while at the same time the work of the Courts would be facilitated, and facilitating the work of the Courts of course makes things easier to the public. I should be quite prepared to indicate when we come to discuss the subsequent amendments exactly what are the sections which we think it unnecessary to include, but I would put it to the House that it is advisable that we should have something definite on the lines of the drafting now proposed instead of leaving the Courts to determine on each occasion whether an offence on which a conviction had been secured did or did not involve a breach of the peace.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Sir, in regard to this clause. I must say that I cannot agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. These words in Chapter VIII have been put in order to prevent the Courts from embarking upon an enquiry as to the character of the offence. That is one object. Another object is that power is vested in Courts of first class Magistrates and higher magisterial Courts, and that power would be exercised only after considering the evidence that is placed before the Courts. If a Court comes to the conclusion that there is in the character of the people whom it had convicted a tendency to repeat the offence, this power will be utilised; it is not in every case where men are convicted that these powers would be utilised. Therefore it is the Courts trying the case which will decide the matter. Now in regard to conviction also, there is the safeguard of scrutiny by a higher Court. Well, that is so far as the merits of this case is concerned. Now we cannot admit that offences coming under this Chapter are offences which ought not to be put down in the interests of society—I shall not use the words 'law and order' which are frequently used. When there are powerful landholders or powerful people behind, such offences are committed; they are not offences committed by peaceful inhabitants, and therefore a provision like this is necessary. You cannot say that the provision is unnecessary nor can we sneer at a provision like this. But with regard to the recommendation which is contained in the Lowndes Committee Report, I, as a member of the Joint Committee, will always look with great deference to a recommendation made by that Committee. That Committee consisted of the most eminent lawyers, men of great ability, and I should deprecate, with all respect to Mr. Rangachariar, speaking lightly of that Committee, because at that time and probably even now you cannot find a set of men who have obtained such great eminence in law as that Committee.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not deny that.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Therefore, it is hardly fair to say because the Lowndes' Committee said so and they have not condescended to give reasons their decision should not be respected. Well, I think the amendment has tended to simplify the task of the Courts which do require a certain amount of definite guidance and the power is not used by irresponsible persons, it is used by the superior Courts. Therefore, I think this clause ought to be retained and I am sorry I must oppose my friend, Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. 153A was omitted for the strong expression of opinion coming from the colleagues of my Presidency: "Section 106 as now revised may in times of political excitement be used so as to bring into disgrace prominent leaders on the one side or the other whom the Magistrate may not like. The section as it stands at present is sufficient for the purpose of preventing the commission in future of similar offences by convicted persons." It is with regard to that emphatic expression of opinion that 153A was excluded. This is the opinion of the Madras Vakils' Association, of which my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is an ornament. Therefore, I think we would do well to leave the clause as it is.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Sir, I also oppose Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. I do not think by leaving the section in the fluid state in which it is at present we improve matters. There has been, so far as the nature of offences for conviction of which security may be required is concerned, a good deal of discussion and division of opinion and the amended provision in the Bill, such as it is, at any rate, makes it definite that offences must fall under Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code; but the other clauses of that section remain and those clauses will limit again the application of certain of the sections of Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code to which I would draw attention.

The section proceeds to say:

"And such Court is of opinion that it is necessary to require such person to execute a bond", for what?, "for keeping the peace."

Further, 'such Court may, at the time of passing sentence on such person, order him to execute a bond for a sum proportionate to his means, with or without sureties '—again for what?'—'for keeping the peace during such period'. The application in practice or judicial decisions in reference to this clause of this section will, therefore, be that it must be an offence which will involve the necessity for the offender to keep the peace and not other offences falling under Chapter VIII of the Penal Code, which do not relate to keeping the peace. If the clause remained, the natural interpretation in a court of law would be, or at any rate it is quite open to an accomplished lawyer like Mr. Rangachariar to argue before a Court and argue successfully, that the restriction therein laid down must govern the application of the section to a restricted class of offences under Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: There are two independent conditions—one is conviction for special class of offence, and the other is proof of necessity for making the order.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: But what does the law require? Keeping the peace. That is the essence of the matter, and none of the offences which do not involve the necessity of keeping the peace would come under the purview of that section. Therefore, it is important to my mind that the section should stand as it is in the Bill and I am opposed to Mr. Rangachariar's amendment and am in favour of the proposed amendment of the section as contained in the Bill before us.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, I also cannot support Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. It will, I think, be to the prejudice of the general public if section 153A is left out of this section. We considered that in the Select Committee and we deliberately arrived at the conclusion that section 153A should be excluded from the scope of section 106. What does my friend gain by leaving the section as it is? He does not gain anything at all. I invite his attention to the words of the present section, "other offences involving a breach of the peace". That expression is comprehensive enough to include all the offences mentioned in Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code and much more. As regards section 143, i.e., being members of an unlawful assembly, an assembly does not become unlawful unless they have a common object of committing an unlawful act. This implies that the object of the assembly is more or less to break the peace. But the mischief of including section 153-A—will be much greater. That will be the result of Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: No, no. I did not say that at all. My friend is entirely under a mistake. I did not say section 153A should be included. I say leave out all the sections and leave it to the court as it was.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I would rather specifically leave out 153A because 153A falls within a different category. What is known as the law of sedition in English law is embodied in the Penal Code under the two sections 124A and 153A. Promoting enmity between classes, in English law, is well-known to form part of the law of sedition. So I would not leave any ambiguity with regard to these sections. We have always advocated the liberty of the press and of public meetings. A man may deliver a speech or write an article and it may be interpreted as rousing racial feeling and such racial feeling as likely to cause breach of the peace. We ought not to empower the Magistrate to act under section 106, Criminal Procedure Code, in such cases. That is why we have advisedly exempted offences under sections 153A and 124A of the Indian Penal Code from the scope of section 106, and I do not think that if we accept Mr. Rangachariar's amendment it will be any improvement or that we shall be safeguarding public interests in any way. That is why as a Member of the Joint Committee and as a Member of this House I oppose the amendment.

(Several Honourable Members: 'Let the question be now put'.)

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the question be now put.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment proposed is:

"Omit clause 16 (i)."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: I think it will be convenient if the House considers the next two amendments and the first portion of the third amendment together.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I do not want to press my amendment No. 82.

Mr. Deputy President: It will be convenient if the House takes Bhai Man Singh's amendment No. 33 and the first remaining portion of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment No. 34. I therefore propose to call upon the proposer of amendment No. 33 and Mr. Agnihotri and then to consider one by one sections of the Indian Penal Code which are dealt with in the two amendments.

Bhai Man Singh: The second portion of my amendment is as follows:

"For the words and figures 'other than an offence punishable under section 153 A' substitute the words and figures 'other than the offences punishable under sections 143, 144, 145, 150, 151, 153, 153A, 154, 155, 157, 158, 159 and 160'."

Of course, I would request you, Sir, to take those sections separately, because as a matter of fact

Mr. Deputy President: I have already informed the House that I propose to do so.

Bhai Man Singh: I would simply speak about section 143. This is a section that is included in my amendment as well as my Honourable friend Mr. Agnihotri's amendment. The offence under this section consists simply in being a member of an unlawful assembly. I should submit that it is quite a different thing to be a member of an unlawful assembly at a certain time and to be guilty of rioting. Really speaking, section 106, Criminal Procedure Code, is meant to bind down persons who are of a temperament that is very dangerous to the public peace. A person may be merely a member of an unlawful assembly and simply for being such a member, section 106 provides that extra punishment for him. There is no reason why that extra punishment should be inflicted on such a person simply because he is a member of an unlawful assembly. I may also submit that the Madras High Court and the Punjab High Court have under the existing law held that being a member of an unlawful assembly does not come within the purview of section 106 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Section 106, as it at present stands, as my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has just pointed out, contains the general words 'offences involving a breach of the peace'. Both these High Courts have held that being merely a member of an unlawful assembly is an offence involving a criminal breach of the peace. There is no reason why we should expand the sphere of section 106 and include this section therein.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I take it that we ought to proceed section by section. I would therefore speak later on the other sections in my amendment and will for the present confine my remarks to section 143. My reasons for moving for the substitution of these sections are exactly those as were suggested by the Madras High Court Vakils Association on whose weighty authority even the Home Member and the other Members of the House declined to delete clause 16 (1) as proposed by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar. Sir, as was pointed out by Mr. Rangachariar there may be assemblies which may at some time or other be declared to be unlawful assemblies and there may be people who may happen to be in those assemblies quite innocently but because of the assemblies having been declared unlawful assemblies they are likely to be convicted under the law, in which case they are liable also to be bound over under section 106. The House, I hope, has it in its experience and knowledge that during the year 1921 there were many cases when assemblies were declared unlawful that would otherwise have been lawful so much so that even at the capital place of a province the Congress Committee meeting was declared an unlawful meeting and some persons attending that meeting were convicted. If section 106 is made applicable to the case of such people, even respectable and educated people would be liable to be bound over and therefore I submit that a section which does not involve the use of force or collection of armed people for using violence should be omitted from the purview of section 106. With these words I support the amendment that section 143 should be deleted from the operation of section 106 and be included in the exceptions.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that section 143 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I wish to make a general observation in regard to the procedure that should be adopted in eliminating certain sections. The principle which ought to be kept in mind is one which would enable Courts to construe this section on the theory of ejusdem generis. You have for example in this section the words 'or other offence involving a breach of the peace.' The rule that ought to be observed by the Legislature is that the offences which go before must also belong to the same category. That is the principle of what is known as construction by ejusdem generis. You must have the same class of cases to proceed as is mentioned in the general clause coming after. The question therefore which this House will have to decide in excluding or including certain sections, is whether those sections involve an offence relating to the breach of the peace. If that is not the intention of the Legislature, then I think the wording of the section should be completely altered. Now, as regards section 143, I do not see why it should be included. It simply is a punishment section. In section 143, you will find nothing relating to any offence. You will find two or three sections of that nature. I do not think there will be any difficulty so far as section 143 being tacked on to section 153A. But, as I said, the principle which I want the Government benches to keep in mind—and I want the Honourable the Law Member to advise the Government in the matter—is the principle of ejusdem generis. You cannot have any offence which does not involve a breach of the peace included in this category of sections; and so far as section 143 is concerned, I do not think the House will feel any difficulty.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Punishment for what? Do you wish to include the definition section or the offence section?

Mr. T. V. Seahagiri Ayyar: Certainly not. Punishment does not create an offence. You do not create an offence under that section.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that section 143 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question now for discussion is that section 144 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

Bhai Man Singh: I do not want to press for that.

Mr. Deputy President: The question for discussion now is that section 145 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

Bhai Man Singh: So far as section 145 is concerned, the case is just the same as of section 143, except that the assembly is ordered to disperse and it does not break up but continues. It is also practically the same thing as section 151, which provides against continuing to be a member of such assembly when it is commanded to disperse. I think, Sir, that exactly the same arguments apply in favour of section 145 as in favour of section 143, except that in the one case they have been commanded to disperse and in the other case they have not been so commanded. I submit that the mere fact that a command of dispersal has been given does not make a man guilty of having committed riot or breach of the peace. I see no reason why he should be bound over under section 106. If a member of a certain committee which is declared to be an unlawful assembly for certain political or other reasons is not to be bound over under section 143, there is no reason why he should be bound over for continuing to be a member of that assembly.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I think we have to look to the whole intention of this part of the Code. The intention here is to place an instrument in the hands of Magistrates which will be, in its truest sense, preventive. Now there is a great difference between a person who merely joins an unlawful assembly, (for he may frequently be in doubt up to the last minute whether that assembly is unlawful or not) and a person to whom the following description applies:

"Whoever joins or continues in an unlawful assembly, knowing that such unlawful assembly has been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, . . ."

He can be under no kind of doubt as to his action. Mr. Rangachariar said that it was ridiculous to make women and children who continued in such assemblies liable to an order under section 106. But, it is first of all necessary that they should be charged and convicted under this section 151, and it is exceedingly unlikely that they will be so charged. And you will never arrive at satisfactory legislation if, in considering your law, you emphasize only extreme cases that might be brought under a section, oblivious to the fact that you must provide for ordinary cases, and good cases, for which provision is required. There are undoubtedly cases for which we must provide under a section of this nature; I can conceive, and I am sure the Members of this House would be able to conceive, of highly dangerous assemblies, highly criminal and violent in their nature, which have been commanded to disperse, and members of which are rightly convicted because they have refused to disperse. There are such cases, and it is only reasonable that in the cause of law and order and the public generally, persons so convicted should subsequently be held to security.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I can recognise that such a man mentioned by the Honourable Member ought to be punished. The question is whether the offence is one which is likely to be repeated by the individual. Unlawful assemblies, as is well known, take place in the excitement of the moment. There is some temporary exciting cause and unknowingly some people join, and several other people join the assembly because they have got a temporary grievance. Unlawful assemblies are not recurring diseases; they always have got a provocation behind them. That provocation may be great or small, but often you will not get unlawful assemblies in this country without some provocation behind them. You are postulating here that such men should be bound over to keep the peace. They may be persons who have got some temporary grievance, perhaps a revenue grievance or something which excites them at the moment and therefore they join the assembly. You do not expect them to go on joining unlawful assemblies. Have you ever come across such cases? It is really confusing the issue by saying it is a dangerous offence. It is a dangerous offence, and therefore you punish the man, but the question is, is it an offence likely to be repeated by the individual, and is it necessary to impose this further penalty? That is why the Legislature would generally drop this. Now you want to include it. What is the reason given? That it is a dangerous offence. But is it a reason why you should go on demanding security for three years as in the case of a habitual offender? I therefore think, Sir, no reason is made out why 145 should be included.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): Sir, I am afraid my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, in the observations which he has offered upon this particular matter, has ignored a very material portion of the original section 106 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In order to bring any case of a conviction under any one of those sections mentioned in the Act, two things are necessary, not one thing only to which he has over and over again referred in the course of his observations. It is not merely conviction under the sections named that will justify an order under section 106. The Code goes on to say something further and it is to this second requisite that I wish to invite the attention of the House in particular. The first paragraph of this sub-section (1) merely describes the particular sections of the Penal Code, a conviction under which may make a man liable to the order specified in this section. But the second paragraph goes on to say 'and such Court (i.e., the Court convicting that man) is of opinion that it is necessary to require such person to execute a bond for keeping the peace' that the order under section 106 will be passed. That is to say, the mere fact that a man has been convicted under any one of these sections will not necessarily make him liable to furnish security under section 106. It is only when the Court is further satisfied, by reason of the peculiar circumstances of the given case before it, that it is essential in the interests of the maintenance of public tranquillity that such order should be passed that the Court will pass the order. In other words, the Court will not pass an order under section 106 in every case in which it chooses to convict a person. It is really the second essential mentioned in this section 106 that lies at the root, at the basis of the order requiring a man to furnish security.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Then why differentiate? Put in the whole Penal Code.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Let me illustrate my meaning. My Honourable friend has laid emphasis on the case of an ordinary conviction for being a member of unlawful assembly, or offences of a similar kind. Now, supposing a man has been convicted for being a member of an unlawful assembly. Six months after that he is again convicted for being a member of an unlawful assembly. Six months or a year after that he is again convicted of a similar offence. Now, the mere fact that he has been convicted of what my Honourable and learned friend supposes to be a very ordinary offence may or may not justify the passing of an order under this section. But, when a man has repeatedly been twice or thrice convicted of this simple offence, will not the Court then be satisfied that, in the interests of public tranquillity such a man is obviously a habitual offender, a man who is given to committing this so-called simple offence, and will then call upon him to furnish security. The section requires in express terms that the Court should be of opinion that it is necessary to require such person to execute a bond for keeping the peace. I, for one, have not the slightest hesitation in saying that, ordinarily, the courts of law will not consider it necessary to pass an order under this section unless by reason of the particular circumstances of the case before them they are satisfied of that necessity. Therefore, I submit that it is really beside the point to say that an offence described under a certain section is a simple one and ought not therefore to be included.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I draw the attention of the Honourable the Law Member to section 110 (e) which deals with a person who habitually commits, or attempts to commit, or abets the commission of, offences involving a breach of the peace. That section provides for that class of cases.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: I merely gave an instance; that is all.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: With regard to this amendment of section 145, I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has got in his mind the use of the section in regard to political assemblies—that is, assemblies which are called by that name. But if he excludes those political assemblies, if he looks to the use of the section in cases not involving any political matters, probably he will think that the section is all right.

Now take the case of religious processions. There is a dispute in regard to certain religious processions, and a certain set of people are convicted of being members of an unlawful assembly on one occasion. It is well known that on a subsequent occasion the leaders or some of the men concerned in the first offence will repeat the same kind of offence. Now in such cases is it not well that such a section should be put into the Code.

Again take the case of the rights over immoveable property. On one occasion the obstructors may be charged for being members of an unlawful assembly. The trying Courts know full well that the offence will be repeated. It may be that these people who have violated the law sincerely feel that they have a right which has been disturbed. Whatever their feelings or convictions may be, the fact remains that if the Court is convinced that these people will repeat the offence, is it not better in the interests of those people themselves that they should be told that action under this section will be taken in order to prevent them from doing it. The ordinary class of cases which this section will cover are not political matters but matters in which there is party feeling in regard to private or communal rights; and therefore the use of the section, which can only be made by superior Courts—that is, first class Magistrates and other superior Courts—is not I think likely to lead to any cases of misuse. Therefore I say that if my Honourable friends will just for a moment forget such cases of the use of this section with regard to political assemblies and look to the application of it with regard to the ordinary affairs of the country, then I think there can be no doubt in their minds as to the need for this provision.

One word I would like to say here with regard to the use of this section against political assemblies. Every power, every authority which has got the upper hand uses its power to suppress contrary opinions of a political character—not only in this country but in other countries. You may attenuate this section as much as you like; they will find other sections for their purpose. You cannot prevent that by mutilating the general law of the country. You can prevent it by the exercise of such powers as you have in this Council and elsewhere; and therefore on that ground I should be sorry to see this section attenuated. After all, an unlawful assembly is a more serious thing than an offence committed by an individual. It involves a number of innocent men. Offences which comes under this section oftentimes involve innocent men. When innocent men are involved by the action of these obstinate lawbreakers, you cannot, in order to protect these innocent men, let the really guilty men, the prime movers in a disturbance, go scot-free. One of the consequences of this is that less guilty men, by joining or helping in the formation of such disturbance, also get into trouble. You cannot prevent this and I do not think they deserve to be protected from getting into the clutches of the criminal law. Therefore I strongly appeal to the House to consider the matter dispassionately, taking into consideration the general state of affairs of the country and not merely political matters.

(An Honourable Member: "I move that the question be now put.")

The motion was adopted.

The question that section 145 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that section 149 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, section 149 of the Indian Penal Code refers to persons in an unlawful assembly of which one member or some members are guilty of violence. It reads:

"If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person who at the time of the committing of that offence is a member of the same assembly is guilty of that offence."

Sir, there is much force in what my friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, has put before the House that if we keep aside the political side or political assemblies from our consideration then the provisions for binding over persons convicted of being members of an unlawful assembly is often necessary and should be allowed to remain. But we have omitted section 158A on the same basis. It is in times of panic and excitement that such sections are found to be very harsh in their operation. It thus becomes necessary that we should exclude such sections from 106 and there is no possibility of any hampering of justice or cheating justice in any way or doing away with the principles of law and order if we delete these sections that I have enumerated in my amendment. Because if a man is found to be dangerous he is convicted; if he is found guilty of any of these offences he is convicted and he is convicted for a period which the Magistrate may think will be quite enough to give a cold douche to his rashness or indiscretion. Further, after his return from jail, if the Magistrate finds that this man has not improved he can certainly bind him over under section 107, and there is no necessity why section 106 be made to apply to the case of such persons. If after binding him over under section 107 it appears that the man is incorrigible he can certainly be proceeded against under section 110. So there are ample provisions to meet the justice of the case and law and order will not be disturbed in any way if we were to include such sections as 149 and 150 in the exceptions under this Act. With these words, Sir, I commend to the House my proposal that section 149 be deleted and included among the exceptions to the section.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Sir, I do not think it is necessary to argue this section.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that section 149 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, I want section 150 to be included in the exception, but I do not press it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: If the Honourable Member presses this, we shall have a long discussion.

Bhai Man Singh: I do not press it myself.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I do not press it myself.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, 151 practically goes with 145.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I do press for it, Sir, because section 151 says:

"Whoever knowingly joins or continues in any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace after such assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse shall be punished, etc."

and there is no reason why section 151 should not be excluded, because it is exactly the same as the section that deals with the membership of an unlawful assembly. If an assembly has been declared to be unlawful by certain legal technologies some people who happen to be members of that assembly may continue in that assembly and will be punished. It will thus happen that innocent persons may be involved. How is it possible that such a man will repeat that offence if once convicted. Therefore I submit that 151 may be included in the exceptions.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: When you put the motion to the House, Sir, Bhai Man Singh gracefully withdrew his amendment, while my friend Mr. Agnihotri in spite of cries of 'withdraw' from various parts of the House still maintains his claim.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: You are also willing to concede.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We argued the case of 145 at some length, and the House agreed that 145 ought to be maintained.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: We did wrong then.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If I consider that the House does wrong I do not permit myself to say so. But with regard to section 151 (which is very strongly analogous to section 145,) the House will see that it is necessary, in order to fall within the scope of the section, that a person should knowingly join or continue to join in an assembly likely to cause a disturbance and should stay on after such assembly has been commanded to disperse. There is therefore a double requirement which must be complied with before he becomes amenable. It is only reasonable, therefore, to conclude that a person who does take such action is a person who is likely to repeat it. We are indebted to Mr. Subrahmanayam for the recognition that we must not in connection with this section think purely of political offenders. We have seen many cases of assemblies which had no connection with politics, and which led to very violent results, rioting, arson and murder. They are common enough in districts addicted to violence; they are well known to Magistrates in charge of such districts, and the case of those concerned in them has to be considered by those who legislate for the maintenance of order and justice. I do not believe that anybody who really had at heart the general peace of our districts at large would care to deprive magistrates of preventive powers in such cases as these, and I shall appeal to the House to deal with this on exactly the same lines as 151; it would be entirely consistent to do so.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, by way of personal explanation I might say that I am strongly in favour of bringing in 151 in the exceptions. Why I did not press my point was that, since my amendment regarding 145 was defeated, I thought that there was no use in pressing this now.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: You are quite right. There is none.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is that section 151 be included among the exceptions.

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: Section 153 refers to giving provocation with intent to cause a riot. A man might say or do something in a heated moment and a riot may be caused. He may be quite careless at a certain time—it is not so great an offence that anybody should be liable to be bound down. I do not wish to say anything more at this late hour.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Neither do I, Sir, as the Honourable Member has deplored.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is that section 153 be included among the exceptions.

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: I move that section 154 should be included among the exceptions. I think the case for the inclusion of section 154 among the exceptions is perhaps the strongest. The offence consists of an owner or occupier of land not giving information of riots. One really fails to understand why a man who fails to give information, if he is convicted, as he can be under section 154, should be considered such an offender that he should be liable to be bound down for so many years to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour. I think it would be terrible for any body who does not come out to give information of a certain riot that has taken place. I own land at Ambala, supposing a riot takes place and I don't go out to give information, one really fails to see where the dangerous character in me is if I do not go out to give information, that I the poor fellow should not only be convicted under section 154 but should also be bound down for three years.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Sir, I have not interrupted the Honourable Member while arguing his case because I saw the argument gave him considerable pleasure. But he knew already from what I said before that we did not intend to dispute the inclusion of section 154 among the exceptions.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, I move that section 155 should be included among the exceptions. My arguments for 155, if not more weighty, are no less weighty than for section 154—which refers to the case of "a person for whose benefit or on whose behalf a riot takes place and who does not use all lawful means to prevent it." It is quite a different thing to judge a man's character while doing a certain act, or while abetting it, but it would simply be a very dangerous doctrine to extend these things and to call a man dangerous who does not use all lawful means to prevent it. All lawful means would mean a good deal. Supposing there is a very good man: there is a certain dispute about his land or something of the sort and certain people begin to fight. He says "don't fight for God's sake." He is not such a strong man that he should be able to go and actually stop them from fighting or to be able to go and take some other steps to stop the affray or the riot. I do not understand why he should be taken to be such a dangerous man that he should also be bound over for three years over and above being convicted under section 155.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The kind of case that is contemplated by this section is something as follows. There is a dispute about a land, and the landowner knows that a certain section of his retainers or it may be his tenants are likely to attack and cause a riot—a well known case of this kind caused a serious disturbance some time ago—and he does not take lawful means to prevent their doing so. Taking lawful means for preventing their doing so may frequently be merely the issue of an order that none of his servants should use violence. But he stands to gain by the result of the riot. He benefits by the act of his servants and he does not take lawful means to prevent it. Therefore, he does not discharge his obligations to the State or to the Society. (An Honourable Member: "If he is convicted?") If convicted, it is proved that he has so failed, and should be held to security. That is the class of offences contemplated by this section; the House will see its effect more fully by reading the section itself than by merely referring to the schedule.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved is:

"That section 155 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that section 157 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

Bhai Man Singh: I do not press this, nor those relating to sections 158 and 159 of the same Code.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that section 160 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions.

Bhai Man Singh: I would like to read out the definition of affray to my Honourable friends here.

Section 160 says:

"Whoever commits an affray shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees or with both."

[Bhai Man Singh.]

Again section 159 says:

"When two or more persons by fighting in a public place disturb the public peace they are said to commit an affray."

This is such an ordinary thing, that every man at some time or other commits this offence and I do not see why such a serious aspect should be given to it and why should we take it as such a serious thing. It means that everybody in the world should be impotent and should have absolutely no spirit in him. My friend Dr. Nand Lal has pointed out that whereas the sentence is for one month the man can be bound over for three years. I think, Sir, you will see the strange position of law if you include this section within the purview of section 106.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If the remark regarding the universal tendency to indulge in assault had been made in Ireland, instead of in a peaceful Assembly like this, I could have understood it better. I should be sorry to think with Bhai Man Singh that everybody is liable to commit an affray at times. To turn to the law. Let me point out to him that section 106, as it now stands, contains these words "assault or other offence involving a breach of the peace." Now, it seems to me that if we retain in the preventive sections the words "assault or other offence involving a breach of the peace" we are equally entitled to retain in those sections the offence of affray. It is exactly the kind of person who, as Bhai Man Singh says, is liable to repeat assaults or affrays that we desire should be bound over to keep the peace.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That section 166 of the Indian Penal Code be included among the exceptions."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 16 (1) for the words and figures 'section 153 A' the following be substituted:

'Sections 143, 149, 153 A or 154.'

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 18th January, 1928.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 18th January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.

Secretary of the Assembly: I have to inform the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. President at to-day's meeting.

Mr. Deputy President then took the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

REPORT BY RAI RALLA RAM BAHADUR ON RAILWAY EMBANKMENTS AND FLOODS IN BENGAL.

185. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (a) Have the Government of India made any enquiries as to what extent the railway embankments were responsible for the disaster, caused by the Northern Bengal Flood in the Naogaon Sub-Division and the eastern portion of Bogra district on the 26th of September last? If so, have the Government of India received any report with regard to such enquiries? When will the Government be in a position to place the report on the table and publish it for general information?

(b) Was Rai Ralla Ram Bahadur deputed to make the enquiry? If so, when and on what terms? Was he not the officer responsible for the construction of the broad gauge line between Sara and Santahar and above?

(c) In deputing him to enquire, did the Railway Board take into consideration the fact that he was to pronounce judgment on his own work? Why did not the Board associate with him an independent expert railway engineer and an expert irrigation engineer to hold the enquiry and submit a joint report?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Enquiries have been made and a report received. It is hoped to publish it shortly.

(b) Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram was deputed to make the enquiry early in November 1922. The terms have not yet been finally settled.

Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram was Engineer-in-Chief of the Eastern Bengal Railway from 1913 to 1919 during which period work was in progress on the broad gauge line Sara to Santahar and above. This line was built alongside the meter gauge line which was built more than 40 years ago.

(c) All relevant facts were taken into consideration in deputing Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram to make the enquiry.

An independent expert Railway Engineer in the person of the Senior Government Inspector of Railways (Circle No. 2) and the Irrigation Officers of the Bengal Government were associated with him in holding the enquiry, but a joint report was not considered desirable.

BREACHES CAUSED BY FLOODS.

186. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Will the Government be pleased to state the length of the breaches in the permanent way on either side of the Adamdighi Station of the Santahar-Bogra line and at what cost the temporary diversions were made for restoring traffic along the line?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The length of the breaches was 600 feet on the east and 1,320 feet on the west of Adamdighi Station.

Information regarding the cost of restoring traffic on the line referred to is not yet available.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Will the Honourable Member furnish the information when it is received,—will he ask for information as to the cost of making a temporary diversion on either side of the breaches?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Do I understand that the Honourable Member wishes to know the cost of making temporary diversions to carry the traffic?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Yes, owing to the breaches. My point is that it is better to provide waterways than to incur expenditure for repairing breaches. Will the Honourable Member obtain the information?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: I can obtain the information later.

FLOOD WATER CHANNELS ON SARA-SIRAJGUNGE RAILWAY.

187. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (a) Are the Government aware that two very important monsoon flood-water-channels have been dammed since the construction of the Sara-Sirajgunge Railway between Dilpashar and Lahiri Mohanpur Stations and that the railway agents have been repeatedly petitioned by the agricultural population of the neighbourhood for the opening out of sufficient waterways and thus save their crops from being annually submerged?

(b) Will the Government enquire if the late President of the Railway Board remember that this fact was mentioned by me to him in 1921 as also that an adequate opening for free passage of flood water was urgently required at the 153rd mile of the Sara-Sirajgunge Railway and he promised to enquire of the agents of that Railway and take steps for providing such water passage and will the Government be pleased to state what steps had been taken by the Railway Board and the Agents, in that connection?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: (a) Complaints and petitions regarding the insufficiency of waterways in the locality referred to have been brought to the notice of Government.

(b) Government have ascertained that the matter is as stated by the Honourable Member. The matter was brought to the notice of the Railway Administration and estimates called for. The original proposals are now being revised having regard to the floods of September 1922.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Who is responsible for these disastrous floods?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: In reply to that question, I can only ask the Honourable Member to await the report of Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram which will be published shortly.

• WATERWAYS AND EMBANKMENTS ON SARA-SERAJGUNJ RAILWAY.

188. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Has Rai Ralla Ram Bahadur now recommended that opening should be provided where the Bamanjan river had been completely blocked by the high and massive railway embankment at the 153rd mile of the Sara-Serajgunj Railway and another important water passage blocked at the 154th mile?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Rai Bahadur Ralla Ram has recommended one opening between mile 153 and mile 154.

BRIDGE OVER DILPASHAR RIVER, BENGAL.

189. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (a) Are the Government aware that the bridge over the Dilpashar river not being of sufficient height and width, the river develops such a strong current at the bridge during the monsoon that boats can not pass along it without grave danger and that it will appear from the local police report that many boats have been known to capsized there resulting in losses of life and cargo?

(b) Do the Government propose to make an enquiry with regard to this from the District Magistrate of Pabna and the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Sirajgunge and take steps for remedying the defective construction of the bridge?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The attention of Government has been drawn to the alleged loss of boats and lives at the Dilpashar bridge which is mentioned in a pamphlet by the Honourable Member on the Bengal floods.

(b) The necessity for the inquiry suggested does not arise as a scheme for substituting larger spans at this bridge has already been approved.

APPOINTMENTS TO I. M. S.

190. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether the Secretary of State for India has consulted the Government of India with regard to the 30 appointments that he proposes to make in the Indian Medical Service? Have these appointments been made in England and, if so, on what principle have the selections been made?

(b) How many Indians were temporarily appointed by the Government of India to the Indian Medical Service, during the War and how many of them have been provided with permanent appointments and how many of them are still serving in the temporary capacity and how many have been demobilized?

(c) Have the claims of those who are still serving in the temporary ranks of the Indian Medical Service for being appointed permanently to at least half of the 30 appointments, been represented to the Secretary of State by the Government of India and if so, with what result?

(d) What is the total strength of the permanent staff of the Indian Medical Service at present and how many of these are Europeans and how many Indians?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) and (c) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given to question No. 81, recently asked by Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal.

(b) The total number of Indians granted temporary commissions in the Indian Medical Service during the war was 1,004; of this number, 97 have been granted permanent commissions. The number still serving in a temporary capacity is 154, while the number of officers demobilised plus casualties is 753.

(d) The present strength of the Indian Medical Service is 700; of this number, 554 are Europeans and 155 Indians.

REVERSE COUNCIL BILLS.

191. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Have the Government of India made up the account of the losses that were incurred over the sale of the Reverse Council Bills? If so, will they be pleased to state the amount?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: It has been calculated that the loss on the sale of Reverse Councils in 1920, i.e., the difference between the number of rupees received in India and the cost at which the funds for meeting the Reverse Councils were remitted to England, amounts to between 28 and 29 crores of rupees. A Memorandum on Exchange gains and losses during the five years 1917-18 to 1921-22, inclusive is about to be published in response to a request which was made in the other House last year.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: As regards the sales of Council Bills now being advertised, do the Government expect to profit out of these, or are they likely to have the same result as in 1920?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The question of profit and loss in exchange is rather a difficult one to answer questions about, when you have a rate for accounting purposes which is 2 shillings and a rate of something like 1s. 4d. obtaining in the market. There is obviously a theoretical loss as compared with the 2s. rate; on the other hand, at the present moment exchange is being sold at something over 1s. 4d. and there is obviously a gain as compared with 1s. 4d.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Why are Government advertising for the sale of Reverse Councils?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: These are not Reverse Councils. They are Council Bills, and, as was publicly stated at the time, the sole purpose of the sale of Council Bills at the present moment is to put the Secretary of State in funds for the purpose of meeting Indian expenditure at Home, and it does not imply a decision for or against any particular policy.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: What will be the effect of the sale of Council Bills on imports and exports?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: That is certainly a question of opinion, but obviously what the sale of Councils at the present moment is doing is to pay for a certain number of exports.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Is it not the proper thing when exchange shows an upward tendency? It does not prejudice Indian finances?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I do not think that question really arises, but perhaps I may be allowed to express the opinion that it is better, if you have to remit, to take advantage of the moment when exchange is there than to be forced to remit at a moment when exchange is not there.

INDIA'S WAR DUES.

192. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (a) What was India's total war dues from England at the close of the financial year 1919-1920 in rupees at the then current rate of exchange and how and when have the same been paid and how much has been credited to Indian revenue in all in equivalent of rupees? (b) What losses, if any, has India suffered owing to fall of exchange in respect of such war transactions?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) and (b) The amount due by the War Office to the Government of India (including expenditure incurred in England by the India Office on behalf of the War Office) at the end of 1919-20 was £715,316. This amount was repaid by the War Office in April, 1920. The outstanding amount was for March, 1920, when the rate of exchange was 2s. 9d. the rupee and at the time of payment the rate was 2s. 8d.

The claims against the War Office were converted at the rate of exchange current for the month or period in which the expenditure was incurred by the Government of India and there was therefore no loss on exchange on the transactions.

EXPENDITURE ON N.-W. FRONTIER EXPEDITIONS.

193. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Will the Government be pleased to state the total expenditure incurred in connection with Waziristan and other North-West Frontier expeditions from 1920 to the end of 1922?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total military expenditure incurred in connexion with the North-West Frontier and the occupation of Waziristan, including the Wana Column, during the years in question, was as follows:

	North-West Frontier expeditions.	Occupation of Waziristan and Wana column.
	Rs.	Rs.
1920-21	6,81,80,544	14,40,10,490
1921-22	8,76,544	6,92,79,139

The figures under North-West Frontier expeditions for 1920-21 represent arrears charges on account of the Afghan War and those for 1921-22 readjustments on account of the Afghan War.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it worth while spending such a huge amount of money considering that there is not much prospect of getting back the amount spent?

Mr. Deputy President: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Are these figures with which my Honourable friend has furnished me inclusive of the expenditure up to the end of December, 1922?

Mr. E. Burdon: No, those figures are not available yet.

OPERATIONS ON N. W. FRONTIER.

194. Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (a) How many officers and men are now employed in active service in the North-West Frontier? (b) What is the strength of the aircraft and airmen in active service there? (c) Have the air operations resulted in any saving in military expenditure there? If so, to what extent?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) and (b) It would not be in the public interest to furnish the information desired by the Honourable Member.

(c) In so far as the matter can be judged by present experience, it cannot be said that the air operations have yet effected a saving in military expenditure.

UNSTARRED QUESTION AND ANSWER.

NON-CO-OPERATION MOVEMENTS.

87. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: (a) Are the Government aware that non-co-operation against the present system of government is being preached and practised extensively in India by a certain section of the people?

(b) If so, are the Government aware of the causes of the non-co-operation movement?

(c) Have any steps been taken or are they proposed to be taken to remove the causes which lead to the non-co-operation movement?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: (a) I am aware that it is preached; I am not aware that it is extensively practised.

(b) and (c) The Honourable Member is referred to the White paper published in England and reproduced in the columns of the Press in India on 18th May, 1922. I cannot, within the limits of an answer to a question, enter upon an exposition of causes and policy.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, may I ask if anything can be done to improve the temperature of this room?

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): May I ask in what direction?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): Does the Honourable Member refer to the moral or physical temperature?

Mr. Deputy President: I take it that it is the Honourable Member's intention to draw the attention of the Department concerned to the temperature that prevails at present and to warm it up. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes.) Well, I have received complaints from several Members with regard to this matter and I am sure the Department concerned will do the needful to meet the wishes of the Members.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. Deputy President: We will now proceed with the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I move that:

"At the end of sub-clause (i) of clause 16 the following be added:

'for the words 'three years' the words 'one year' shall be substituted'."

Section 106 comes under the Chapter for the prevention of offences. Under that section, if a Magistrate is of opinion that it is necessary to require some person to execute a bond for keeping the peace, the Court may call upon such person to execute a bond to be of good behaviour for a period not exceeding three years. So far as I have been able to find out, Sir, before the amending Act of 1898 the period specified under this section was only one year and it was changed to three years in the amended Code. In section 107, which is also a preventive provision the period fixed for a bond to prevent a breach of the peace is only one year. Similarly in section 108, also a preventive section, the period is fixed at one year. It is only under section 106 that somehow or other the period has been fixed at three years. Under sections 107 and 108 when a breach of the peace is apprehended a man can be bound over for one year. But under this section after a man is convicted of a breach of the peace, he is, in addition to that, asked to execute a bond. Under this section he has therefore to suffer two penalties instead of one, as is provided in sections 107 and 108. Moreover the punishment for the offences specified under section 106, may even extend up to seven years. Under these circumstances I submit that a period of three years in section 106 is rather excessive. It should ordinarily be fixed at one year, and if at the expiry of that period the man has not improved, then action may be taken against him under section 107 or 108. It is not necessary that at the very moment of conviction for an offence a man should be made to suffer the additional penalty of being bound over for three years. I therefore commend to the House that the period of three years provided under section 106 is excessive and unnecessary, and in its place a period of one year be prescribed.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): The Honourable Member is I think inaccurate in his history of the case. If I understood him correctly, he said that, until the revision of 1898, the period had only been one year. I find, however, that in 1861 the period was one year if the order was passed by a Magistrate and three years if the order had been passed by a Court of Session. Subsequent Codes, for instance the Code of 1882, give three years when passed by a Magistrate. The provision, therefore, has stood for a considerable period of time.

Now, I do not wish to lay too much stress on the mere length of time during which this provision has stood in our Code. I think it can be defended on its merits. The Honourable Member says that, since under section 107 one year is sufficient, the period of three years under this section is, to use his own words, "rather excessive." I note that on this occasion he is milder in his condemnation of the preventive sections of our laws than he has sometimes shown himself, and he is obviously not fully convinced of the injustice of providing this period of security. But what are the facts? Under section 106 a man must already have been convicted of an offence and it must be an offence, as we saw yesterday, of a nature which argues in itself that he is likely to repeat an action which will lead to a breach of the peace or other disorder. Now, there may be parts of the country where people generally are of so peaceable a disposition that violent breaches of the peace, at all events on a concerted scale, are not common. But those who know Northern India will bear me out when I say that there are areas where vendettas live long with its baleful history of crime, there are places where a village quarrel once begun involves not only long litigation but a long history of violence. Is it unreasonable, therefore, that, when people have been convicted of rioting or one of the graver offences which we left yesterday in the section, that the Magistrate should say "There is every reason to believe that these people will continue in their career of violence. It is no use my binding them to keep the peace for twelve months. There will be no really preventive or deterrent effect unless I am able to bind them over to keep the peace for three years." That is not an unreasonable requirement in itself. But there is another side to the question. When the Magistrate has a case of this kind before him he is himself able to temper punitive justice. He can give a shorter period of imprisonment if he knows that by a due use of this salutary section he will secure a longer period of keeping the peace; and this constitutes the substantive reason why it is necessary and advisable to provide for so long a period as three years. I do not remember that we have received suggestions elsewhere for curtailing this period. As I have said, it has stood long. I would put this consideration to the House that, if the public generally, if legal associations generally, if the High Courts, in commenting on the provisions of our amending Code, have found nothing seriously at fault with a provision of this nature, it is inadvisable here and now to upset it on what seems to me at all events a priori considerations and on—and I do not wish to use too harsh a word—the somewhat vague considerations put forward by the Honourable Member.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, I am afraid I must join issue with the Honourable the Home Member with reference to the last portion of his remarks. We are here, Sir, as representatives of the people and we cannot delegate our functions to other persons however highly placed they may be. We are here to see that legislation is properly enacted. The mere fact that other persons have not noticed the hardship of a particular legislative provision is no ground for us to refuse to consider that question on its merits. Sir, let us consider this question on its merits. I am really surprised that the Government should take this attitude on a matter like this. Here we have yesterday included offences which ought not to have been included under this section. The Honourable the Home Member told us to-day that we have taken care only to include offences which involve a likelihood of a repetition of a breach of the peace. I doubt whether we have done so at all. If two women quarrel in a bazar, that is a common affray. If we, for instance, go to a railway station and have hot words with the railway or the ticket clerk, that is an affray. It is a public place. And, for instance, if some of us lose our temper here and exchange hot words, as may not be unlikely, that is also an affray. For all these things you can give one month's simple imprisonment or even let off with a fine of Rs. 5. But the section says you may be called upon to give security for a period not exceeding three years.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Will the Honourable Member kindly read the definition of "affray."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I will gladly be corrected if I am wrong, but I do not think I have overdrawn or underdrawn the picture.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: But read it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Anyway, in simple offences for which a man may merely get a fine you still give the power to a Magistrate to bind him over for keeping the peace for three years. Look at the hardship of it; look at the difficulties of getting sureties. After all you have to get sureties to stand for you and they have to be watching your movements for three years. It will be a considerable hardship on people to produce those sureties. What is the necessity for giving such long periods, as if the man will not improve within the year. It is merely keeping a sort of machinery in terrorem over his head. Look at the moral effect it has upon the man. You do not give him a locus poenitentiae and you keep him as a suspected citizen and make him more and more troublesome to the country. I do not think it is at all right that this sword should be kept hanging over a man's head for such a long period. One year is a reasonably long period and I do not see that there should be any objection to reducing it. I do not understand what is the logic of it. As we all know this period commences after he comes out of prison. First of all he is sentenced to imprisonment for the offence and there he is safe away, it may be for one year, for two years or for three years, as the case may be. Having been in jail, he comes out and then security is to commence from that date for two years or three years after the date of his release from jail. You do not give him a chance to improve; on the other hand, you make a worse citizen of him than he would ordinarily be.

Therefore, considering it from all points of view, I submit that the amendment moved is a modest one and I commend it to the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, the Honourable Member declined the invitation of the Honourable the Leader of the House to read the definition of an affray.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I have not got it with me, otherwise I would have done so.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: So I propose to do so now. Section 159 of the Indian Penal Code reads as follows:

"When two or more persons by fighting in a public place, disturb the public peace, they are said to 'commit an affray'."

I would only invite the attention of the House to the fact that section 106 has always included assault. It has also always included offences involving a breach of the peace. Sir, if two or more persons disturb the public peace by fighting in a public place, surely that is an offence involving a breach of the peace. The section in question has always been included within the purview of section 106 and could not have been excluded having regard to the words which follow in section 106 as it will be when amended by the Bill.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): What do you mean by "disturbing the public peace" when two people quarrel in the street.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Those are the words, Sir, in the Code.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: True, but you can disturb the public peace by words.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: You certainly cannot commit an affray.

Mt. H. Tonkinson: "By fighting in a public place" are the words in the section.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I think there is some misapprehension with regard to the scope of this clause to which exception is taken by the Honourable Mover of the amendment and those who sustain it. The arguments that they have advanced in support of the amendment appear to me to proceed upon this basis, that in every case a man is to be bound down for three years. It is nothing of the kind. That period is merely a maximum giving power to a Magistrate in an extreme case to pass the maximum sentence. The actual term which is to be fixed for each particular case must necessarily be left to the discretion of the tribunal called upon to make the order. A celebrated lawyer of England once said that the wisest rule that the brain of man can devise can be reduced to an absurdity by putting up an extreme case. I readily admit that if upon a first conviction for a simple affray in the street or at a railway station a Magistrate were to convict the parties, fine them Rs. 10 each and then bind them down for three years, the order would be an absurdity. But I will take the very illustration which my extremely able friend, Mr. Rangachariar (if I may so speak of him) took, that of an affray caused by the action of a railway official at a railway station. Now I take it that my friend has come from time to time to Delhi. Let us suppose that on the platform there is a ticket-collector, an Irishman, with an uncontrollable temper. We will take it that his rudeness leads to an affray which comes before a Court and for which he is punished during one session of this Assembly. At the next session he repeats his rudeness to my friend again, and again brings about an affray. On this occasion the Magistrate says "It is not enough to fine you. You are evidently a man who has not got much control over himself and therefore I will bind you down to keep the peace for a year." Notwithstanding that, at the next session the whole thing is repeated once more. Surely, in a case like that, though it is only an affray, the whole of the public will call upon the Magistrate to tie down that man for three years so that the public may have peace for that time at least. That is a case of a simple affray where the wise discretion of the magisterial power would be able to meet the case to the satisfaction of all people. This is only an enabling term to meet all possible cases. It is in one case of affray probably out of a hundred in which any Magistrate would resort to these powers at all; and it is certainly not more than one case out of five hundred in which he would be impelled by his sense of justice to fix anything like the maximum period. Therefore I say that we are not condemning all offenders to a three-year bondage. We are merely giving a Magistrate a maximum power which would be rightly exercised by him in a case which was extreme. Therefore unless it can be shown that granting this power to the Magistrate has been the cause of abuse or undue persecution or injustice in the past, we ought not in this work of amendment to interfere with an old standing rule.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the amendment has been based on a number of grounds—as for instance, that the preventive section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code only fixes one year, that in the case of a man who has already been convicted, section 106 will be applied simply to prevent him from committing the same offence again, and that in the present Criminal Procedure Code we have only this session introduced also Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code, therefore the period of three years seems to be very excessive. To my mind, none of these grounds has categorically been refuted. Now the grounds which have been advanced in opposition to this amendment are that the law relating to three years has stood the test of many years, that it is simply a period which will hardly be used in practice in respect of petty cases, and that it is a maximum period which in all cases probably will not be resorted to. These are the grounds which have, as already submitted, been advanced in opposition to this amendment. Now we have got to examine these grounds. After having compared them I feel constrained to arrive at this conclusion, that the contentions, raised on behalf of the Government, have no force.

Now, great emphasis has been laid on the interpretation of sections 159 and 160, Indian Penal Code. When I read the provisions of section 159 the words which I think have got greater applicability are the words "disturb the public peace." But when we come to the provisions of section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, the words are "likely to commit a breach of the public peace." Now the Honourable the Home Member will readily accede to my contention that there is a great difference between these two forms of wordings "To commit a breach of the public peace" and "to disturb the public peace." These two different expressions have got quite different meanings. I think he will agree with me when I raise this point that to disturb the public peace is of a very mild character, and if he concedes that, then he will, I believe, concede so far as the mitigation of the period also goes. Now, Sir, at the time of framing any rule or making any rule of law, three things ought to be taken into consideration very seriously; one the propriety of that rule of law; and the propriety of that rule of law is to be judged with reference to the circumstances or with reference to the data which formulates the grounds and reasons for framing that law. Now, in the present Code, as I have already submitted, section 160 of Indian Penal Code has also been incorporated; and what is the punishment? The punishment, you will be glad to see, is one month or fine. Now a man is punished to undergo one month's imprisonment or sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 5; but when he gets released from jail then he may be bound over for three years. Is there any propriety in this? The fine is five or ten rupees, or the imprisonment is for one month; but after his release from jail he may be bound over for three years. (Cries of "Why?") It is quite true the words are "may be"; of course I cannot ignore the words "may be." But the first class Magistrate can pass that order; there is no law that prevents him from passing that order. He has got the competency to do that. If he is competent to pass that order, there will be no clog in his way to do so. I do not mean to say that the Magistrate shall; he may; therefore, there is yet no propriety, and I think the Government Benches will be well advised if they will accept this amendment. The second point which I wish to urge is, that in most cases severity of sentence produces a great amount of sympathy for the man who has been punished. So if this provision, relating to the period of three years, is incorporated in the present Criminal Procedure Code it is sure to invite criticism in some quarters and there will be great sympathy with the man who has been bound over for three years and that sympathy will go against the proposed provision of this section, under discussion, namely, 106, Criminal Procedure Code. Therefore on that score also I appeal to the Government Benches that they will very kindly accede to this contention which has been raised by the Honourable Mover of the amendment, that the period may be reduced to one year.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I am afraid I cannot agree with the proposal that the period of three years be reduced to one year. As a Magistrate of some experience, more especially in the outlying parts of Sind and the Upper Sind frontier district, where there are almost perpetual feuds between some sections of the community which begin with very small beginnings but go on for a number of years, sometimes even up to 20 years, I have found that revenge has been taken not only by the sons of the people originally involved, but even by their grandsons; and disputes lead to very serious results in the course of time, even to murders and bloodshed. In such cases it is necessary that such breaches of the peace should be nipped in the bud by binding down people for a much longer period than one year if the peace of the country is to be maintained. At the same time I admit that the period of three years looks rather a long period, more especially as I believe this order is not appealable—I am speaking subject to correction—but at this present moment I do not remember that this order is appealable. . . .

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Yes.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I think it can only be revised but not appealed against. . . .

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Subject to the provisions of sections 411 to 418 of the Code any person convicted has a right of appeal.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Not against the order of being bound down. On that point I am not sure at the present moment, but my impression still is that the conviction can be appealed against but not the order binding him over for a particular period. But whatever that may be, I think it will be a fair compromise if the period of two years is put down. If that is approved by the Government as well as by my friends on the other side, and if I am allowed to move that amendment I shall do so with pleasure.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I trust the House will not allow themselves to be led away by the arguments that have been used by Mr. Rangachariar and Dr. Nand Lal. Both these speakers have argued their whole case by choosing an extreme proposition and it is the more remarkable that they should have done so—at all events that Dr. Nand Lal should have done so—after the very careful exposition of the matter which the Honourable the Home Member has given. Now, do any Members of this House really seriously believe that any magistrate is likely to bind over for a period of three years a person who is convicted for the first time of a pretty assault or an affray at a railway station? Honourable Members know perfectly well that such a thing is most unlikely to happen, and that if it did happen, there are superior Courts which could certainly deal with the case. It can be dealt with on appeal or, quite apart from the question of appeal, there are such authorities as District Magistrates and Sessions Judges who would call for the papers in such cases and upset an absurd order of that character; and in the last resort there is the High Court. Those Honourable Members who ask us to amend the clause in order to provide against an absurdity of this sort really ask us to alter the Code so that the magistrate should not have the power to bind over for three years, even though in serious cases they do require it. We have heard from the last speaker from his own experience that small beginnings may develop into very serious matters that may call for a long period of restraint by means of a bond; and if the House is going to yield to these arguments it means that the magistracy will be deprived of a power which they now possess of maintaining the public peace. There is one further point which was referred to by the Honourable the Home Member which I should like further to emphasise. And that is, the fact that the provisions of this section empower a Magistrate to give a small substantive sentence because he knows that he can keep the peace for a further period merely by the imposition of a bond. I have no doubt that many Honourable Members have studied the recent Report of the Committee which was appointed to investigate Prison Administration, and one of the points which they have dealt with at great length is the necessity for some provision in the law which will make it possible to keep offenders under supervision without condemning them to undergo actual detention. This is one of the sections in our existing law which makes that possible and I have no doubt that every Member of this House, who is also a Magistrate, must on several occasions have had an opportunity of making use of this section to enable him to inflict a smaller substantive sentence.

Finally, there is just one point which I should like to refer to in Mr. Rangachariar's speech. He inquired, where was the logic for giving a First Class Magistrate power to bind over a man to keep the peace for three years when he can only impose a substantive sentence of two. Well, I confess this is a mathematical argument which I find it rather hard to follow. If it is going to be carried to its logical conclusion, we ought to give a Sessions Judge power to bind over a man for 7 or 10 years or 20 years or even for life. I do not really think that it is an argument on which any stress can be laid. I would again appeal to Members of this House to realise that if simply on account of the bad cases, the imaginary bad cases, that have been put up before them, they are going to alter the law, they will be causing a serious defect in the Code and I would add that if it had been the intention of Honourable Members who support this amendment really to do away with the possibility of Magistrates requiring a bond for a long period in petty cases such as an affray, the proper means to adopt would have been to move a separate amendment bringing cases of that kind under a separate regulation, and not to impair the power which the law gives to Magistrates to deal properly with really grave cases.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban). I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I have also given notice of the same. I think if the fate of this amendment is decided I shall not have a chance of speaking.

Mr. Deputy President: I shall give the Honourable Member an opportunity to move his amendment at the proper time if he likes.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, the amendment is the same.

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That at the end of sub-clause (i) of clause 16, add the following:
'for the words 'three years' the words 'one year' shall be substituted'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President (to Mr. B. N. Misra): Does the Honourable Member wish to move his amendment?

Mr. B. N. Misra: That is why I was appealing to you to give me an opportunity to speak on my amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: I am told it drops out. It cannot be moved.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I do not wish to press my second amendment* contained in item No. 36.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 16, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to move:

"Renumber clause 17 as 17 (iii) and before sub-clause (iii) insert the following sub-clause:

'(i) in sub-section (1) of section 107 of the said Code for the word 'informed' the words 'satisfied on information and on taking such evidence if any, as is adduced' shall be substituted and the words 'by wrongful act' shall be inserted after the word 'person'."

Mr. Deputy President: May I draw the Honourable Member's attention that he might deal with the first part only?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Yes, Sir. I wish to take the first part only. Here I think I am on surer grounds according to the Honourable the Home Member because the word 'informed' has been found to be very contentious and there have been many rulings by High Courts as to what the word 'informed' should mean. It is desirable therefore that the meaning of this word be made more clear when we are now amending section 107. I therefore propose, Sir, that for the word 'informed' the words 'satisfied on information and on taking such evidence if any, as is adduced' be substituted. Under the law as it stands, the Magistrate has no other alternative but to proceed against any person under section 107 the moment he receives an information as to the likelihood of his committing a breach of the peace. Of course, the High Courts have been vested with large powers to give proper interpretation to the words used, but the law as laid down in that section is not clear. It is therefore with a view to avoid the difficulties that have been felt by Magistrates that the meaning of this word be made clear. In certain provinces circulars have been issued asking the police officers not to put up such cases until the District Superintendent of Police permits them to do so. All these difficulties could be overcome if we were to put in, in clear language the exact meaning of this word in the way I have suggested. It is also necessary that the Magistrates should not proceed on the mere information of a police officer but they should require some evidence to support the allegations on the report of the police officer. It is just possible that in emergent cases it may not be convenient to produce witnesses before the Magistrate to support the police report, but in practice we find that the police officers generally put up cases where they have received a number of complaints to that effect. At the same time, during the period necessary for referring the matter to higher officers and for obtaining permission the necessary evidence could be secured for production before the Magistrates. I therefore submit, Sir, that it is necessary in the interest of justice and to safeguard the interests of the people that the courts should be satisfied on any information and on taking such evidence as is adduced, before they issue any such process as provided in section 107. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment for the acceptance of this House.

* "In clause 16 omit sub-clause (ii)."

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment proposed is :

"Renumber clause 17 as 17 (iii) and before sub-clause (iii) insert the following sub-clause :

'(i) in sub-section (1) of section 107 of the said Code for the word 'informed' the words 'satisfied on information and on taking such evidence if any, as is adduced' shall be substituted and the words 'by his wrong act' shall be inserted after the word 'person'."

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I have dealt only with the first portion of the amendment, Sir.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, may I be permitted to move a small amendment to this amendment of Mr. Agnihotri's? I am sure my Honourable friend will also accept it. I would move :

"That the words 'or evidence' be substituted for the words 'and on taking such evidence, if any, as is adduced.'"

I may explain, Sir, what I mean by it. Having regard to the nature of the case the Magistrate has to take action in order to prevent a breach of the peace. He either acts on information or on evidence. The information will be in the shape of police reports, I take it. It is clear, as the section now runs, he is merely informed. I want him to take some responsibility before he takes action. I am quite prepared to trust the magistracy of this country, as the Honourable Mr. Haigh would ask us to do, but there are Magistrates and Magistrates. I know a Magistrate who, if Rangachariar travelled from Howrah to Madras and the Magistrate on the way at Waltair receives information that Rangachariar is going to deliver a speech at Madras, he takes action at Waltair station under section 107. When I am in the train I am arrested, taking action on some information from the Howrah police or some telegram or other, and I am detained at Waltair to prevent me from giving a speech at Madras. Will the Honourable Mr. Haigh believe that such things happen? They do happen. They have happened. There are Magistrates and Magistrates. Would the Honourable Member believe that 107 is used for all sorts of purposes? If I go and stop outside a toddy shop and preach to my friends "don't drink," the contractor says. "Rangachariar is going to commit a breach of the peace by preaching 'don't drink.'" The contractor, of course, gives information, the Magistrate is satisfied. His revenue suffers, Ministers suffer for want of money to carry on their development programme and the Government suffer for want of revenue. Now, here comes the Magistrate and says "use 107." Would any Magistrate in England dream of taking such a step? Here we have had Magistrates who have done it. It is on the mere colour of information of this sort that action has been taken under section 107 in various matters when, if public opinion were really strong, if the Honourable Sir Montagu Webb and others would join hands with us in such matters, Magistrates would be taught a better sense of their duty. And what action has been taken when this matter was brought to the notice time and again of the Government authorities? This matter of the arrest at Waltair by abuse of this section was brought to the notice of the Home Member in this House by me twice or thrice. Well, what action has been taken against the Magistrate? Did the Legislature ever contemplate the use of this section in such a way that a man travelling between Howrah and Madras, not being a resident of Waltair, should be detained at Waltair and bound over? Was this section ever contemplated to be used in that manner? What do the Government authorities do to deal with the Magistrate? If at least those who control the action of the magistracy take steps to punish such cases, then we can have full confidence in them. But on the other hand, they get M. B. E.'s and O. B. E.'s and promotion. Sir, it is because of this—not that we want to distrust Magistrates, not that we want the public peace broken, but, Sir, we have had bitter, sad experience of the way in which this section has been used, abused, misused. That is why we want to put in some safeguards so that the magistracy cannot take action like this. A Magistrate is informed by telegram. What is the responsibility he takes? Is he satisfied? Should he not be satisfied on the information? Therefore, I ask that the Legislature should throw some responsibility on the Magistrate by the language of the section itself. Therefore, he should be satisfied "on information or evidence." That would make him pause and hesitate and that action would be open to revision by the higher authorities; but mere information—he will simply take shelter under this section and say "I was informed. I did not care to investigate whether it was credible information or not." He is not even told that it must be credible information, as we have in the case of the police when they have to arrest. If he is informed merely, he can take action under section 107. I think, Sir, that it ought not be left like that. At the same time, I cannot agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, that you should make it compulsory on the Magistrate to take evidence in all cases. That is why I make it "or." I should very much like to make it "and" but I think it would be putting fetters on the Magistrate, because he may take action on police reports. Then you have some inquiry afterwards. As my Honourable friend knows, the first thing is that a notice is issued under section 112, then evidence is taken, in the presence of both parties. It is far better too that evidence is not taken before because you will be tying down witnesses beforehand. If you compel a Magistrate to take evidence beforehand, namely, in the absence of the parties, you run the risk of getting the witnesses committed beforehand, even before the accused has had an opportunity of cross-examining those witnesses. Therefore, there is that risk if you compel evidence to be taken beforehand. So that you will be reduplicating work by insisting on evidence being taken beforehand and you will be throwing additional risk in the way of the accused. But at the same time I ask that the Magistrate should be held responsible for action taken under 107, and I therefore hope that my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, will accept it and I hope the House will also accept my amendment. If Honourable Members will turn to section 96 of the Code. Section 96 or 87, where action somewhat similar has to be taken by Magistrates, section 87, which deals with a "proclamation for the appearance of a person against whom a warrant has been issued," also says "if the Court has reason to believe (whether after taking evidence or not)." So also in section 96 "Where any Court has reason to believe, etc."

It will be more satisfactory than the present state of things, and therefore I commend my amendment to the House.

Mr. Deputy President: Further amendment moved:

"That the words 'or evidence' be substituted for the words 'and on taking such evidence, if any, as is adduced.'"

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary: Legislative Department): Sir, my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has in his concluding remarks verily disposed of the substance of that portion of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment by which he would require evidence to be taken in every case. Mr. Agnihotri indeed based his argument for the amendment on the ground that High Courts had found great difficulties with regard to section 107 which necessitated an immediate amendment of this word "informed." I have looked at the rulings. I know there are numerous rulings on the subject of section 107. But as far as I can see, the difficulties have not arisen from the use of the word "informed" merely. At all events numerous difficulties have not arisen with regard to that word. Mr. Rangachariar has moved an amendment to Mr. Agnihotri's amendment which would have the effect of substituting for the word "informed" the words "satisfied on information or evidence". He has given us his own experience in Madras. (An Honourable Member: "Not his own.") Mr. Rangachariar deceived me, because I understood him to say that the Magistrate fearing that Mr. Rangachariar was going to deliver a speech at Madras had him arrested at Waltair. (An Honourable Member: "Not he, but his friend.") Mr. Rangachariar's friend had an unfortunate experience, and I am sure every Member of this House sympathises with him. But the amendment which Mr. Rangachariar proposes would make no difference whatever in the case of his friend. Mr. Rangachariar has overlooked the fact that the Magistrate who took his friend out of the train at Waltair and arrested him was not acting under section 107, sub-section (1) which we are now considering, but was acting under section 107, sub-section (3). Now, under sub-section (3), on this particular point at all events, we have no amendment before us. The wording of section 107 (3) is different. It is "When any Magistrate not empowered to proceed under sub-section (1) has reason to believe that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace, etc." Here we have "has reason to believe". It is not merely information, but "has reason to believe." It is perhaps a little less strong than "satisfied", but nevertheless it was not merely information that the Magistrate in Madras could have acted on. He must have had reason to believe. Otherwise his order was not justified. Therefore, this pitiable picture which Mr. Rangachariar has drawn should, I think, be dismissed by Members of this House from their minds at once.

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.]

because it is entirely irrelevant to the matter which is now before us. Let us confine ourselves to section 107 (1), that is, a Magistrate on the spot who is taking action against the man on the spot, not a Magistrate sending a telegram to some one in another District to take action. All the arguments that have been used in favour of this amendment have for some unknown reason—I do not know what it is—assumed that action under section 107 is always taken by a Magistrate at the request of the police—on a police report. Well, my experience is—I have been a Magistrate for a considerable number of years myself and there are many others in this House who have been Magistrates too for long periods—that action under section 107 generally follows an application made to the Magistrate, and in that case, there is nothing whatever to prevent the Magistrate calling for additional evidence. Therefore, from that point of view, the addition of the words “or evidence” does not carry us any further. Mr. Rangachariar leaves it still to the discretion of the Magistrate as to whether he will call for additional evidence or not. The Magistrate always has that discretion. We do not want to provide for the taking of evidence in this case because there is always the power to call for evidence if the Magistrate wishes to get further information.

Now, we are left with the difference between “is informed” as we have it in the Bill and “is satisfied on information” as the movers of these two amendments would have it. I think perhaps that Mr. Rangachariar has been a little inclined to overlook what section 107, sub-section (1), is and to what it is leading. The Magistrate is informed that a person is likely to commit a breach of the peace. He just issues a summons for the man to appear and show cause why an order should not be made against him to keep the peace. Under 107 (1) the Magistrate does not issue an order to the man at once to give security. It is merely a summons to come before him and show cause why an order should not be made. That is a very different thing indeed. They are two very different propositions. If the Magistrate was going to issue an order under the first sub-section to any person at once to find security to keep the peace, well then I quite agree that the words “is informed” are nothing like strong enough. But what happens? Let us take the case of an ordinary complaint to a Magistrate that an offence is actually being committed. In 95 cases out of 100 what does the Magistrate do when such a complaint is made before him? He examines the complainant. He has got to do that. But he does no more. He makes no further inquiry. Out goes the summons and the accused has got to appear before him. That being the case, is there any reason why, in this which is the preliminary corresponding step to the presentation of a complaint of an offence before a Magistrate, the Magistrate should require anything more than information where he has indeed the power to call for evidence if he wants to? I do not think, Sir, there is really very much more to be said on this matter. The case has been misrepresented by Mr. Rangachariar. The difficult case which he placed before us arose, not under sub-section (1) which we are now dealing with, but under sub-section (3). The Magistrate has power to issue a summons on a mere complaint in writing. Why should he not have equal power when information is given to him to issue a summons requiring a man to appear and show cause? That is what happens in every criminal case based on complaint of information.

Rai Dohi Charan Barua Bahadur (Assam Valley: Non-Muhammadan):
In my humble opinion, the Honourable Mover of this amendment has rightly hit upon the flaw in the law as it stands at present. We are chiefly concerned with the source from which the information has emanated. Now, as the law stands at present, the Magistrate is simply concerned with the information and is not concerned with the source from which it has emanated. The source may be a man of immature understanding, or even a lunatic. The present law does not make any difference whatsoever whether the information comes from a person who is a deliberate liar or a person who is of immature understanding or a lunatic. So, it is quite necessary that, before action is taken, before the machinery of criminal law is moved, the Magistrate should be satisfied. Without his satisfaction no steps should be taken in the matter. A man should not be disturbed, he may have many callings to attend to, and in the midst of those callings he should not be disturbed. The man moved against may have many enemies. Those enemies very often find it convenient to move the Courts from time to time against him. So, to make a safeguard against all these things it is very proper that the Magistrate should not only be informed but he should be satisfied by some sort of inquiry, whether private or public, or by taking any evidence whether in camera or in the open Court. It makes no difference, but he ought to be satisfied. There ought to be some person who should be responsible for the issuing of the summons or warrant, and he should also be responsible for the inconvenience suffered by the man to be brought before the Court. So, considering these circumstances, it is quite proper that the amendment should be made. With these words I beg to support the amendment.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Gunjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhamadan Rural): I expected that Government would accept the reasonable amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, and I am sorry to say that Mr. Rangachariar had to condemn a Magistrate of Vizagapatam, from which district I come. But I can assure Mr. Rangachariar that the Magistrate, though he was obliged to utilise this section, was not at all responsible for it, when we know the true circumstances which necessitated the arrest of Mr. Muhamamad Ali at Vizagapatam. The warrant issued against him in order to prosecute him at Karachi by the Bombay Government had not been received in time, but the Magistrate was ordered to detain him. He did not know under what section he could detain him, and therefore he thought that section 107 was the only possible section that he could apply before he received the warrant. Therefore he detained him there and showed him every respect and every consideration. He treated him very well awaiting the receipt of warrant. As soon as the warrant was received from the Bombay Government he was released and was arrested on the warrant. Therefore I say that the Magistrate was compelled to do that under the system under which he was working and was not at all responsible for the thing he did. Now, in these days we must protect ourselves against a very possible abuse of power, whether intentional or unintentional. In this case what my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has suggested was actually in the old Code. It was somehow or other removed and the word "informed" was put later on. Under the old Code of 1872, in the corresponding section of 491 the words used here in place of the word "informed", the words "any report or other information which appears credible and which the Magistrate believes". Why on earth this clear phraseology was removed and that ambiguous word "informed" was substituted I cannot say, but we find a certain difficulty in interpreting that word because in order to take a Magistrate to task we must say that he is acting on his own discretion, when he is satisfied on information or evidence. It may be the Magistrate may say even on the information of the police, "I am satisfied". But the point is that he must be satisfied and not merely be informed. But as the section stands at present, if you say "informed", you cannot blame him because he has acted on the information received, because he is not doing anything illegal, though he is not satisfied, if he proceeds under it. Therefore the old language and the present suggestion of Mr. Rangachariar are quite in consonance with each other and will achieve the object which the Government has at heart. I therefore appeal to Government that they will agree to a clear and unambiguous language being used in the Act in order to avoid misconception and abuse of power.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): Sir, in order to form a correct opinion upon the merits of the amendment now before the House, it is, I venture to submit, necessary to refer to certain other sections of the Criminal Procedure Code. As it has been pointed out by the Honourable Sir Henry Monierieff Smith, all that section 107 warrants a Magistrate to do is to issue a notice to the person informed against to show cause why security should not be taken from him to keep the peace. After the notice has been issued, or rather when the Magistrate has made up his mind to issue such notice what is he by law required to do? If Honourable Members will turn to section 112 of the Criminal Procedure Code, they will find that according to that section:

"When a Magistrate acting under section 107 (that is, the section with which we are at present concerned) deems it necessary to require any person to show cause under such section, he shall make an order in writing setting forth the substance of the information received, the amount of the bond to be executed, the term for which it is to be in force and the number, character and class of sureties (if any) required."

Now, even a cursory perusal of this section will make it quite clear to Honourable Members that the Magistrate is required by the provisions of this section, in addition to certain matters, to inform the person against whom the order to show cause is issued, of the substance of the information which the Magistrate has received. (Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: "Why".) Then, section 113 proceeds to say:

"If the person in respect of whom such order is made is present in Court, it shall be read over to him, or if he so desires, the substance thereof shall be explained to him."

Then, according to section 115:

"every summons or warrant issued under section 114 shall be accompanied by a copy of the order made under section 112, and such copy shall be delivered by the officer serving or executing such summons or warrant to the person served with, or arrested under, the same."

So it will be seen by Honourable Members that before the date of his appearance before the Magistrate to show cause the person against whom the proceedings are being taken is furnished fully with all the information that is necessary, even with a copy of the order which the Magistrate has recorded before the issue of the process, in order to enable him to meet the case on his appearance in Court. But this is not enough. You will see what certain other sections require in addition. Section 116 says:

"The Magistrate may, if he sees sufficient cause, dispense with the personal attendance of any person called upon to show cause why he should not be ordered and so on."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: The question now is about the first stage. There are subsequent stages. We are now concerned with the earlier stage.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shah: But is there any ground whatever either, in equity or in law for requiring anything further than what is mentioned in section 107? I am trying to substantiate the position that there is none. I am trying to show that the Code of Criminal Procedure provides for every possible safeguard in so far as the interests of the person against whom the order to show cause is issued are concerned. And now if you will turn to section 117 it enacts:

"When an order under section 112 has been read or explained under section 113 to a person present in Court or when any person appears or is brought before a Magistrate in compliance with, or in execution of, a summons or warrant issued under section 114, the Magistrate shall proceed to inquire into the truth of the information upon which action has been taken and to take such further evidence as may appear necessary."

It will be clear therefore from a perusal of these sections that under section 107 a Magistrate acts upon the information which has been received by him that a certain person is likely to commit a breach of the peace, he sends the substance of that information to the person concerned and on the appearance of the person concerned before him, he proceeds to inquire into the truth of the information which has been given to him and upon which information process has been issued against the accused. The word 'accused' is really a misnomer in cases of this kind. The person proceeded against has the fullest opportunity of showing cause and testing the veracity of the information received. He, as a matter of fact, can, under the law, require the police or whoever is really acting in the matter to produce evidence to prove and it will be on the prosecution to prove that there is any intention on the part of such person to commit a breach of the peace. In the absence of such evidence of course no Court will be warranted to require him to furnish security.

The Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith pointed out to the House that even in more serious cases of commission of offence all that is needed is either complaint or information and in that connection I would invite the attention of the House to section 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This is what the section says:

"Except as hereinafter provided, any Presidency Magistrate, District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate and any other Magistrate specially empowered in this behalf may take cognizance of any offence (and here I refer to (c) as we are not concerned with (a) and (b) in connection with the point which is now before the House) upon information received from any person other than certain persons named that such offence has been committed."

So you will see that the Legislature in section 107 has practically adopted the same phraseology with reference to action upon information as they have adopted in section 190 in ordinary prosecutions for an offence. Where is there any reason therefore to justify any change of phraseology in section 107 when even as regards the commission of offences exactly the same phraseology has been adopted by the Legislature in section 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code. I submit that the nervousness which is displayed in certain quarters in connection with the language used in section 107 is really not justified. There is another section in the Code of Criminal Procedure to which in this connection I ask leave to refer and that is section 204. It says:

"If in the opinion of a Magistrate taking cognizance of an offence there is sufficient ground for proceeding and the case appears to be one in which according to the fourth column of the Second Schedule a summons should issue in the first instance he shall issue his summons for the attendance of the accused."

[Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi.]

Now Honourable Members will see that the procedure laid down in this section 204 is practically identical with the procedure laid down in section 107. So far as Government is concerned they would not mind changing the phraseology so that the words in section 107 should be the same as the words in section 204. That really does not touch the substance, but the substance so far as the question is concerned is this: These three sections really stand on identical footing and there is no reason whatever to introduce in section 107 anything further in substance than what is contained either in section 204 or section 109.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: If the Honourable the Law Member will accept the words "If in the opinion of the Magistrate there is sufficient ground for proceeding", etc., we have no objection to that.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The exact words will be "The Magistrate may, if in his opinion there is sufficient ground for proceeding," etc. The procedure is exactly the same as in 204.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Will you kindly move it in that way?

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"Renumber clause 17 as 17 (ii) and before sub-clause (ii) as renumbered insert the following sub-clause:

'(i). That in sub-section (i) of section 107 of the said Code after the words 'The Magistrate may' the words 'if in his opinion there are sufficient grounds for proceeding' shall be inserted."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the second amendment to this clause which I have notified to move is that the words 'by his wrongful act' shall be inserted after the word 'person.' The relevant portion of the present section as it stands is that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace, or disturb the public tranquillity, or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace, or disturb the public tranquillity. As the words 'to do any wrongful act' does not govern the former portion of the clause, I fear that any person is likely to be summoned under section 107 and be bound over for keeping the peace even though the likelihood of a disturbance of the public tranquillity be by his rightful act. The clause is ambiguous, it is not clear and may make a man liable to be bound over, even for his rightful act. I, therefore, wish to substitute that only such person be bound over to keep the peace for a disturbance of the public tranquillity whose action be wrongful, and should not be liable if his action be rightful. Sir, sometimes it may happen that a person may be engaged in doing an act or saying something which he may have a right to do and say and it is likely that his speeches and actions might indirectly result in or provoke a disturbance of the public tranquillity and the Magistrate will under the clause as it stands be justified in binding over such persons. I submit that this should not be the case. "The person who is not justified and has not got the right to say what he says or to do what he does, should then certainly be bound over but not otherwise. Therefore, Sir, I put my amendment before the House for its consideration.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That the words 'by his wrongful act' shall be inserted after the word 'person' in sub-section (1) of section 107."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I am afraid I have not entirely followed the argument of the Honourable Mover of this amendment. He seems to have a fear that a person, by a rightful act, an act which he is entitled to commit, is likely to cause a breach of the peace or a public disturbance. I cannot follow that at all, because a breach of the peace or a disturbance of the public peace is a wrongful act in itself, and therefore all that Mr. Agnihotri's amendment would lead to would be, information to a Magistrate that a person by his wrongful act is likely to commit a wrongful act. It does not carry us any further at all. The wrongful act is provided for in the next few words of the section—a wrongful act which will probably occasion a breach of the peace. Therefore I would suggest that Mr. Agnihotri's amendment is not an improvement on the Code.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That the words 'by his wrongful act' shall be inserted after the word 'person' in sub-section (1) of section 107."

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): Sir, the amendment that stands against my name runs as follows:

"In clause 17 insert the following sub-clause (1) and renumber the existing sub-clause accordingly:

"(1) In section 107, sub-section (3), after the words 'that may occasion a breach of the peace or disturbs the public tranquillity' the words 'and there is an immediate danger of such breach of the public peace or disturbance of the public tranquillity' be inserted."

Sub-section (3) of section 107 relates to a Magistrate who is not empowered to take action under sub-section (1) and runs thus:

"When a Magistrate not empowered to proceed under sub-section (1) has reason to believe that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturbance cannot be prevented otherwise than by detaining such person in custody, such Magistrate may, after recording his reasons, issue a warrant for his arrest (if he is not already in custody or before the Court), and may send him before a Magistrate empowered to deal with the case, together with a copy of his reasons."

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: On a point of order, Sir, I think my amendment No. 2 will precede Bhai Man Singh's amendment. This amendment concerns sub-section (3), while my amendment precedes sub-section (3).

Mr. Deputy President: I think, as has just been pointed out to me, it would be to the convenience of the House if Mr. Agnihotri were allowed to move his amendment first.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, my amendment is to the effect that after sub-section (2) of the same section, that is section 107, the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

"(2-A) Proceedings under this section shall not be taken against a person for delivering political speeches or doing political propaganda work which he be lawfully entitled to do."

Sir, when I moved my first amendment for the insertion of the words 'by his wrongful act' the Honourable the Secretary of the Legislative Department was pleased to say that he could not follow me or my argument for the insertion of those words. He said how would it be possible that a man by committing a rightful act could be bound over under section 107 for disturbing the public tranquillity. I may submit, Sir, that it often happens that persons engaged in political propaganda work or in delivering political speeches create excitement among the people; there is thus a likelihood of disturbance of the public tranquillity in the place; it may be said that it is doubtful also as to who will be liable for such a disturbance. Sometimes a Magistrate has held that the person guilty of delivering speeches or creating such an agitation is liable for it; sometimes, Courts held, that the persons who made such speeches or delivered such lectures simply provoked the disturbance but is not an actual wrong-doer as could be bound over under this section. In such cases the person delivering the speeches may have a right to deliver such speeches and still he may sometimes be bound over. In order to clear away that wrong impression I proposed my previous amendment. That point would be still clearer by the insertion of the sub-clause which I now propose. It must be in the experience of Honourable Members that during the latter part of the year 1921 and the early part of 1922, when there was much political excitement in the country, many speakers were hauled up under this section and bound over to keep the peace. The authorities may probably have thought it likely that further speeches and unwarranted agitation might excite people in the districts and thereby cause disturbance of public tranquillity. I wish by this amendment to put a stop to such actions on the part of District Magistrates and others. It has been pointed out only a short time ago by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar that a case of the same type occurred when the arrest of Mr. Muhammad Ali took place at Waltair. Apart from that, Sir, there have been many cases in almost all the provinces in which persons engaged in enlisting volunteers, or in realising subscriptions for the Congress funds, or in delivering speeches, or exhorting or calling upon the people to observe the principles of temperance and to boycott liquor shops, or doing other temperance or political propaganda work were bound over. This amendment will put a stop to such practices on the part of the authorities. I submit, therefore, Sir, that my amendment deserves the consideration of the House, and I move that the amendment be made.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, I rise to support the amendment put forward by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri. Coming from the Punjab I am all the more in a position to say that this section 107 has been much more rather the most abused in the Punjab in connection with the Akalis than perhaps in any other province. Hundreds of them were put into jail for refusing to give bail when action under section 107 was taken against them. But in point of fact, not a single breach of the peace was caused by them in the sense in which the section means. All of them were arrested with a view to crush or stop a certain movement and for quite ulterior motives. I fail

1 P.M. to see why a section which was meant to punish offenders who really broke the public peace should be used for the ulterior object of putting down a political or religious movement simply because a certain Local Government has taken it into its head to put it down. With these remarks, Sir, I support the amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That the following sub-section shall be inserted after sub-section (2) of section 107 of the said Code, namely:

"(2-A) Proceedings under this section shall not be taken against a person for delivering political speeches or doing political propaganda which he is lawfully entitled to do."

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, the amendment that stands in my name runs as follows:

"In clause 17 insert the following sub-clause (1) and renumber the existing sub-clause accordingly:

"(1) In section 107, sub-section (1), after the words 'that may occasion a breach of the peace or disturbs the public tranquillity' the words 'and there is an immediate danger of such breach of the public peace or disturbance of the public tranquillity' shall be inserted."

Sub-section (3) of section 107 runs thus:

"When any Magistrate not empowered to proceed under sub-section (1) has reason to believe that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, and that such breach of the peace or disturbance cannot be prevented otherwise than by detaining such person in custody, such Magistrate may, after recording his reasons, issue a warrant for his arrest (if he is not already in custody or before the Court), and may send him before a Magistrate empowered to deal with the case, together with a copy of his reasons."

This sub-section, as Honourable Members may have seen, refers to the case of a Magistrate who is not empowered to take action under sub-section (1). He is not empowered to call upon a man to furnish security; he is not empowered to proceed against him. But this sub-section is, in a sense, more stiff than the first sub-section. Under sub-section (1) only a notice has to be issued to the person concerned and he is called upon to show cause, but under sub-section (3) a Magistrate who has not got the power to proceed with the case has got the power only to arrest the person and send him on to the other Magistrate having power to proceed under sub-section (1). Of course, the framers of the law, as it stands, saw that they had to provide some safeguards in this sub-section. Therefore, they have used the words "has reason to believe that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, and that such breach of the peace or disturbance cannot be prevented otherwise than by detaining such person in custody, etc." These two safeguards are there. A junior Magistrate may see that he cannot stop a breach of the peace without arresting the person, but the breach of the peace is to come say ten days afterwards. What I want is that a special provision should be made in such a case that such Magistrate should not have the authority to arrest that person if the breach of the peace is to come later on and he has got time simply to refer the matter to the District Magistrate or to some other Magistrate empowered to deal with the case. I want that the junior Magistrate should not have the authority to arrest a man at once and send him on to the other Magistrate concerned if there is time to do so. Really speaking, no action can be taken under sub-section (1) also if the breach of the peace is not imminent. That being the case, Sir, my position becomes stronger that such a provision should be definitely laid down in this sub-section (3).

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, with your permission I shall move the amendment which stands in my name which is No. 39 on the Agenda. It runs as follows:

"In clause 17 after the word 'substituted' where it first occurs insert the following:

'after the word 'may' the words 'after recording his reasons' shall be inserted'."

This amendment relates to sub-section 4 of section 107.

In the first place, Sir, there is a mistake in that sub-clause which I have overlooked and also the Government have overlooked and which we may be permitted now to correct:

"A Magistrate before whom a person is sent under this section may in his discretion etc. etc."

That relates only to sub-clause (3). He is not sent under this section but under sub-clause (3).

Some Honourable Members: That has been corrected by the Government.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I beg your pardon then, it was a slip of mine.

Now take the case of a person—one Magistrate thinks he is likely to disturb the public tranquillity, and that his detention is necessary. He sends him on to the Magistrate having jurisdiction. The latter will initiate the proceedings. He will do so, as has been pointed out by the Honourable the Law Member this morning by issuing the summons containing the substance of the information, etc. Here this Magistrate before whom a person is sent under this section may at his discretion detain such person in custody. I only wish to make it obligatory on him to record his reasons for detaining the person in custody, so that he (the Magistrate) may pause and think and come to the conclusion that really the detention of this person is necessary in the interests of public peace. As the clause runs now he may detain him "at his discretion." That discretion really contemplates that he should bring his mind to bear upon the question whether the man's detention is necessary or not. If he is to bring his judicial mind to bear upon the question, why should he not record the reasons which impel him to take the extraordinary course of detaining a man when only an inquiry is contemplated. He has to initiate the inquiry by issuing a summons; then to record evidence and then bind him over if he finds that security is needed. Therefore this being an extraordinary step, that of restraining a person and detaining him in custody, it ought to be taken with care and caution, and that is why I want to provide that he should record his reasons therefor. I move the amendment which stands in my name, namely:

"In clause 17 after the word 'substituted' where it first occurs, insert the following: 'after the word 'may' the words 'after recording his reasons' shall be inserted.'"

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I venture to suggest to my Honourable friend that the amendment which he has moved is quite unnecessary. Let us take the cases which are governed by sub-section (4) of section 107. There are the cases in which a Magistrate not empowered to take action under sub-section (1) has proceeded under sub-section (3). Before that Magistrate can take the action that he is allowed to take under sub-section (3) of detaining the person in custody, he must record his reasons in writing—that is to say, it has already been decided by a Magistrate that it is necessary and that no other action will probably prevent a breach of the peace; and this Magistrate has already recorded his reasons in writing.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: If that is so, why the discretion?

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Why should the Magistrate before whom this man has to appear record his reasons again? Let us go a little further into the provisions of the Code. Under section 112 when a Magistrate acting under section 107 deems it necessary to require any person to show cause he must make an order in writing setting forth the substance of the information received. Then Sir, the action under section 117 immediately follows, and if Honourable Members will refer to sub-section (3) of section 117 as it will stand after the Code has been amended as is proposed in this Bill, it will be seen that this Magistrate himself must also record his reasons in writing. It means, Sir, that one Magistrate after another must continually be recording reasons; and I suggest, Sir, that it is quite unnecessary to record reasons in this intermediate stage.

The motion was negatived.

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Non-official): Sir, Mr. Agarwala has authorised me in writing to move his amendment if you kindly permit me to do so. Sir, the amendment that I am going to move runs as follows:

"In clause 17, before the words 'pending further action' insert the words 'or enlarge him on bail'."

Sir, clause (4) of section 107 supports this amendment to a great extent. It says that a Magistrate before whom a person is sent under sub-section (8) may at his discretion detain such person in custody pending further action. The wording of this clause clearly gives discretion to the Magistrate to detain the person in custody, and therefore it is discretionary with the Magistrate to enlarge him on bail. No doubt as I read the wordings of clause (8) of section 107 I find some difficulty inasmuch as clause (8) says that a Magistrate not empowered to act under sub-section (1) shall issue a warrant for the arrest and detain the person arrested in custody when he has reason to believe that a breach of the peace or disturbance cannot be prevented otherwise than by detaining such person in custody. But as the wording of clause (4) makes it clear, that the matter is at the discretion of the Magistrate to whom the man has been sent, I think it is better to have this amendment, so that it may be made perfectly clear that the Magistrate may either enlarge him on bail or detain him in custody as he thinks proper. With these remarks I move the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Sir, the amendment that I am going to move runs as follows:

"To clause 17, add the following 'and after the said sub-section (4) the following proviso shall be inserted, namely:

'Provided that a proceeding under this section shall not be taken when there is a bona fide dispute which can be properly dealt with under Chapter XII of the Code.'"

Sir, it is a settled principle of law established by judicial authorities that there shall be no proceeding under section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code when there is a bona fide dispute which could be properly dealt with under Chapter XII of the Code. But the addition of sub-section (9) to section 145, makes the matter a little ambiguous and the object of my amendment is to remove that ambiguity. Sub-section (9) to section 145 says: "Nothing in this section shall be deemed to be in derogation of the powers of the Magistrate to proceed under section 107." Now, if it is necessary to have this provision in section 145, it is also necessary to have the proviso suggested by my amendment, because law and medical books should be always entirely free from any possible ambiguity. With these remarks I move this amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, the amendment which I am moving is No. 42, and runs as follows:

"After clause 17 insert the following clause:

'17A. After sub-section (4) of section 107 of the said Code the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

'(5) In all cases where action is taken under this section to prevent a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings, a report shall forthwith be made to the Sessions Judge who may call for and examine the record of any proceeding for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the same and pass such orders as he thinks fit.'"

Sir, I did not speak on amendment No. 38 (ii), where my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, tried to prevent the application of section 107 for delivering political speeches. I did not do so because there may be occasions when action under section 107 may be necessary to be taken in the interests of public peace; because the wording of the section is "do any wrongful act which may probably occasion a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity"; that wrongful act may include an inflammatory speech—it may be a political speech—where people are asked actually 'o rise in arms. It is a political speech all the same and therefore to prevent the application of section 107 altogether to such cases was not considered by me right. But at the same time, Sir, you would have noticed strong feeling in the country against the abuse of section 107 during the last two years with reference to the holding of meetings and the addressing of meetings by individuals. There are cases where even committee meetings have been prohibited; there are cases where persons who preached against drink have been proceeded against under section 107 merely because some man, some toddy shop contractor complained that by a speech against drink a breach of the peace was likely to be committed; most likely the contractor and his men are those who break the peace. A man comes and preaches to the people "Do not drink." There are of course some who go beyond mere preaching and resort to acts of violence and restrain people from going to the toddy shop—I can understand that. Still even in cases of mere preaching many meetings have been prohibited under this section. How? It is always difficult to apply section 107. We have to trust to the good sense of the Magistrates in applying this section when they prohibit meetings or prohibit people from addressing meetings. How are you to know beforehand that a speech which is going to be delivered is such that action should be taken under this section? The speech is still unuttered and is not a written or printed speech which is available to the Magistrate which he can read beforehand; these are words unuttered which he tries to prevent by taking action under that section. That action contemplates cases of persons perhaps who by their previous speeches or by their previous conduct have indicated what they are going to say, and if so, there may be cases where they would have been convicted for such speeches if they had really made inflammatory speeches, and other sections are also available for preventing such people from speaking like that. Those are hardly cases where section 107 can be safely used—I would only put it at that—can be safely or soundly used. But it has been largely used, it has been used like this in all the provinces, not in one province, but in every province; after the abolition of the repressive laws they have found repressive laws in these two sections, 107 and 144. An ingenious legal element in the Government of India and in the Local Governments has found a remedy for the repeal of the repressive laws; repressive laws went with one hand and up came these two sections ready in their other hand, sections 107 and 144, handy, very efficient. I wonder why they took all the trouble of passing the Rowlatt Act and the Criminal Law Amendment Act and incurred all this unrest and odium and created this non-co-operation movement and the Satyagraha movement and the passive resistance movement by enacting these laws when 107 and 144 were so handy all these years. They forgot all about it until some ingenious lawyer advised them saying "Here are two handy sections, two hand-maidens; take hold of them and resort to repression in this way," and curiously enough circumstances lent themselves to their very free use of these sections. If really the matter had gone to Court, I am sure in many cases the High Courts would have set right the use of these sections. But these non-co-operators do not believe in anything; they do not believe in Courts; they do not believe even in the High Court, in which I have strong faith, and they would not go to the High Courts and therefore Magistrates were encouraged to use these sections in all sorts of ways. Therefore, Sir, I provide an automatic corrective. There are Magistrates and Magistrates. I know of a case where a Magistrate who was going on horse-back saw a boy spitting on the floor and thought that he spat at him when he was on horse back. The Magistrate then and there on the spot tried him for insult and whipped him. Well, Sir, he was the person aggrieved; he was the complainant; he was the Magistrate, and he tried him on the spot, and most effectively he did it. There are Magistrates of course who conceive that it is within their power to do all these things in certain tracts where still these legal or judicial ideas have not permeated and lawyers have not invaded. Of course, these things no doubt do occur, and therefore, Sir, there must be a corrective, there must be an automatic corrective, to the misapplication of this section. After all, the remedy that I have provided is one which already exists in the law in certain cases. I have chosen a revising authority, an authority which is recognised by the Code. Honourable Members will see in the same Chapter that when security is demanded for more than a year and if the person does not comply with the demand, such proceedings have to go to the Sessions Judge for confirmation. The order is liable to be revised and set aside by the Sessions Judge. Will some lawyer here remind me of that section? (A Voice: 'Section 123.') Thank you. Well, as Honourable Members will see, this section reads thus: "If any person ordered to give security under section 106 or section 118 does not give such security on or before the date on which the period for which such security is to be given, commences, he shall, except in the case next hereinafter mentioned, be committed to prison, or, if he is already in prison, be detained in prison until such period expires or until within such period he gives the security to the Court or Magistrate who made the order requiring it. When such person has been ordered by a Magistrate to give security for a period exceeding one year, such Magistrate shall, if such person does not give such security as aforesaid, issue a warrant directing him to be detained in prison pending the orders of the Sessions Judge or, if such Magistrate is a Presidency Magistrate, pending the orders of the High Court; and the proceedings shall be laid, as soon as conveniently may be, before such Court." "Such Court," that is the Sessions Court, "after examining such proceedings and requiring from the Magistrate any further information or evidence which it thinks necessary, may pass such order on the case as it thinks fit." So that the Sessions Judge whom I have chosen as the revising authority is the authority recognised already as a proper authority to revise such proceedings. I only say that where action is taken under this section to prevent the holding of meetings or of addressing meetings, then it should be forthwith reported to the Sessions Judge. He on examining the records will have to satisfy himself as to the legality, propriety or correctness of such report and he can pass such order as he thinks fit. Therefore the remedy I have chosen is purely a corrective one. Sessions Judges are trusted both by the Government and the people in most cases, and therefore they can be safely relied upon to do the corrective in cases where they are grossly abused. Therefore, Sir, I have suggested my amendment which, I hope, will commend itself to the Government for their good name, because they must also see that their Magistrates do not misbehave. After all, who suffers? No doubt, the individual suffers for the time being, but by such action really the reputation of the Government suffers. I mean the people think, when Magistrates take such hasty action, that the Government do not set them right with the result that the Government becomes unpopular and it adds to the irritation among the people. After all, where is the harm in entrusting this remedy in the hands of the Sessions Judge? Is the Sessions Judge going to the rescue of the sedition monger? Certainly not. Therefore, there will be really no danger whatever in providing this remedy. On the other hand, abuse and misuse and misapplication will be stopped. The very fact that there is a corrective in the Sessions Judge will make the Magistrates pause and hesitate and they will only take action which they should legitimately take. That fact itself will act as a deterrent against hasty action on the part of Magistrates. Therefore, looked at from any point of view, it is a necessary amendment; it is a wholesome amendment and I hope the Government will see their way to accept it.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, it will be convenient if I draw the Honourable Members' attention to the Greaves' Committee's Report in this connection. My idea is that, instead of amending the sections piecemeal, we should adopt the recommendations of that Committee. They took evidence, they consulted all the magistrates, the sessions judges, the divisional commissioners, public bodies and lawyers. Of course, the magistrates were reluctant to part with their power but the sessions judges approved of it and the divisional commissioners also were in favour of it. I am not going to read the summary of evidence but I am only going to read the recommendations of the Greaves' Committee in this behalf. They say:

"After considering the evidence, we recommend that the powers of the district officer and those under him under the preventive sections shall be modified in the following manner:

Firstly, in ordinary cases under sections 107, 108, 109, and 110, when the district officer requires a person to show cause, the proceedings shall be sent for trial before a judicial officer, but in cases of emergency which arise under these sections and when immediate action is necessary, it shall be open to the district officer and those empowered to act under these sections, but, where they make such orders, they shall state their reasons in writing and an appeal against the order shall lie to the District and Sessions Judge. The Committee agree that all cases under section 110 should be tried locally as at present and opportunity for obtaining legal assistance should be freely given."

I would leave the drafting to the Legislative Department, and I think we might accept the Greaves' Committee's recommendations as a preliminary to the separation of judicial and executive functions. It need not wait till the scheme is given effect to. As a preliminary, it may be convenient if we introduce a clause, after section 110, in which provision is made that ordinarily in all such cases where a person has been called upon to show cause under either section 107, 108, or 109, 110, he may apply to the District and Sessions Judge that the matter should be heard by him. In such cases, the District Magistrate is to send the records to him and the matter may be judicially inquired into by the District and Sessions Judge. There is no reason why we should not entrust the District and Sessions Judges with powers to inquire in these matters. That would not increase his work very much because these cases are not very common. They come once in a way. Now, that would not create any mischief either because the Committee recommends that in emergency cases the district Magistrate may pass orders. But when he has passed an order, we may give the party the right of appeal or the record and the proceedings may be sent, as Mr. Rangachariar recommends, to the District and Sessions

[Mr. J. Chaudhuri.]

Judge, and he may look into the records and pass such orders as he thinks fit. Now, that is with regard to mofussil towns. We know that in the presidency towns the presidency magistrates may act in the same manner. There also, when he has called upon any person to show cause, the person may apply to the High Court that the matter may be heard by that court and the court may pass such orders as it may think fit. So, my suggestion is that, instead of amending these sections piecemeal, as suggested by Mr. Rangachariar, we should insert a clause after 110 or in some appropriate place in this chapter to provide that, where a person has been called upon to show cause, he may apply to the District and Sessions Judge that the matter may be judicially inquired into by him and then it will be for the Magistrate to send up the records and the Judge may look into the matter. Of course, I am not putting this forward as a final amendment but I suggest that Mr. Rangachariar's amendment may then be altered as follows:

"(5) In all cases where a person has been required to show cause under section 107, 108, 109 or 110, he may, outside any Presidency town, apply to the District and Sessions Judge, and, in a Presidency town, to the High Court that the matter may be heard by the Sessions Judge or the High Court, as the case may be, and such Court may then send for the records and, after giving him a hearing, pass such orders as the Court thinks fit."

Mr. Deputy President: Are you moving this as an amendment to clause 17?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I suggest it as a general provision to go after 110. Of course, I leave it to the Honourable the Home Member and the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith to make any verbal alterations they like and to prepare a proper draft. This is not my own suggestion but it has been recommended by the Greaves' Committee and I think that the whole House will accept it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I recognise that the proposal put forward by Mr. Rangachariar is in much less extreme a form than that tabled by Mr. Agnihotri, and which the House decided not to discuss. There are unfortunately certain topics which seem to give Mr. Agnihotri a crisis of nerves; when he realizes that the law gives a certain amount of power to a police officer he has a shock; when he is told that it is necessary to give preventive powers to a Magistrate the shock is renewed and his continual efforts in this Assembly have been to reduce entirely, if not to remove, the powers given to police officers and to Magistrates. He would nullify, if he could, the power to protect society which is vested in these authorities, yet such a power is an essential adjunct to good and peaceable administration. But to confine myself to Mr. Rangachariar's amendment; we have here a proposal to reduce in a somewhat milder form the operation of section 107, and I would ask the House to consider the grounds on which it has been put forward by the Mover. He commenced with a general attack (repeating to some extent what he had already said in speaking on an earlier amendment), on the way in which we have during the last two years utilised the preventive sections. 107 and 144 alike have been, he says, widely used and widely misapplied. Nay, he permitted himself to suggest that we, being at one stage unwilling to use strictly repressive laws, and at a later stage being obliged to cancel them, we, at the suggestion of some ingenious legal mind, decided to substitute the use of these preventive sections. This is the first occasion on which I have had to complain that Mr. Rangachariar has betrayed a lack of that due modesty which is one of the requirements of a great mind. For what do I find on looking up the debates on the Repressive Laws discussion? Who was it that urged us to use the ordinary law? Who told us that the ordinary law, if it were applied consistently, was sufficient for all our purposes? Who told us specifically that 144 had always been on the Statute Book and that we ought to use it? Why, Mr. Rangachariar and no one else. If we have used those laws, we need now no excuse; for we have consistently been advised since the year 1911 onwards (when the amendment of the Seditious Meetings Act came under discussion) and the process terminated with the renewed advice given us by Mr. Rangachariar when we discussed the case of our Repressive Laws generally last year. But have we misapplied them? Well, those against whom they were applied had their own ordinary remedy in the courts and in how many cases did they seek that remedy? Mr. Rangachariar says the class of men against whom we have applied these laws would not seek their remedy in the courts; they have no belief in a High Court. Equally, if we apply these laws again, that class of men would again refuse to utilise the agency of our appellate courts, and would fail to receive the benefits of the amendment which Mr. Rangachariar has put forward. But that is by the way; and is not really the substance of my argument against Mr. Rangachariar.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Mine is automatic.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: He proposes under this section that in all cases where action is taken to prevent persons from holding or addressing meetings (whatever that means; I do not deal now with drafting), a report shall go forthwith to the Sessions Judge who shall thereupon, after examining the records, pass orders as he thinks fit in regard to the correctness, the legality or propriety of the decision. He tells us that the Sessions Judge is already recognised in the law as a proper revisionary authority in regard to these sections, and quotes the provisions of section 123, sub-section (2). Well, that does not certainly apply to section 107, for under section 107, the period of an order is limited to twelve months; while under section 123 only orders referring to a period in excess of one year go to the Sessions Judge. Therefore the Sessions Judge is not recognised as a revisionary authority under section 107. What Mr. Rangachariar seeks to do in effect is to make a revisionary authority of a new type. Hitherto revisional orders have been passed by a High Court. He would have now revisional orders proper passed by a Sessions Judge. What is the necessity for this?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Under sections 436 and 437 the Sessions Judge passes revisional orders.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: He recommends to the High Court. He does not pass final orders himself; he reports to the High Court for this purpose.

Dr. Nand Lal: Section 435 (which says) "The Sessions Judge may, etc."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Section 435 is comprehensive.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: That is an alternative.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If the Honourable Member will read sections 435 and 436 he will see that they do not bear out what he says.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I said he has revisional authority in certain cases. He can order retrial, he can order further inquiry, and he can call for the records under section 435. Therefore he exercises powers of revision.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: But what Mr. Rangachariar proposes now is that the Sessions Judge should have power to pass such orders as he thinks fit regarding the propriety of the sentence. That is a different matter. As I say, he proposes in effect, at all events with regard to the preventive sections, and in them only in regard to a certain restricted class of case, to create a new revisionary authority. I maintain that no such orders are required. The persons affected by these orders, if they have cause of complaint, have the ordinary procedure of the law open to them. He gives no special reasons why the special interference of the Sessions Judge is required in this behalf in this particular class of case. He says,

I do not wish the Sessions Judge called in everywhere to pass revisional orders in regard to the preventive sections. I only wish him to be called in in regard to meetings." Where do meetings differ from other classes of action to such an extent that it is necessary to create this special form of revision? What again does he mean by "meetings"? Mr. Agnihotri tried to get the Assembly to agree to exclude altogether from the preventive sections, action taken against persons "delivering political speeches or doing political propaganda work." If we had argued the case (which we found it unnecessary to do) he would have found an insuperable difficulty in defining political speeches or political propaganda work. Mr. Rangachariar, doubtless recognizing this difficulty has contented himself with the expression "holding or addressing meetings." But, as I say, what are meetings? We know the term assembly, and we have a definition of lawful assembly. But meetings are not as he would seem to suggest confined to political meetings; they may be of any other kind. They may be for the purpose of organising riot or for the purpose of promoting violence of any class. If they fall into this category, would it be necessary on that account to adopt a special revisionary procedure? The scope of his amendment goes infinitely further than he himself, I think, recognises. I maintain, that in regard to these preventive sections, and particularly in regard to section 107 it is quite unnecessary to invent or adopt a new form of procedure, especially when, in doing so, you are obliged, owing to the difficulty of definition or drafting, whatever it may be, to give to your new modification of the law an infinitely wider scope than any prudent or reasonable man would care to contemplate.

Dr. Nand Lal: I may point out to this Honourable House that the character of amendment No. 42 is not universal. It is of a very limited nature. It simply says, "In all cases where action is taken under this section (that is, section 107), to prevent a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings." The recommendation embodied in this amendment is that only in all cases of this nature a report forthwith shall be submitted to the Sessions Judge, and then when we come to the latter part of this amendment it says he may call for and examine. It rests on the discretion of the Sessions Judge that on the receipt of that report he may go into it and if he finds that some sort of illegality has crept in or some irregularity has been committed, then he may take action. Not in all cases, but only when he finds that the order is wrong, the proceedings are illegal, irregular and improper and then he may take action and set that order aside or may refuse to set that order aside. This is the recommendation which has been made through the medium of this amendment.

The grounds, on which this amendment has been moved, to my mind, seem to be acceptable:—that there is in some parts of this country a great complaint that law is twisted, that some Magistrates are pliable, that they are not independent, and that they use this section 107 in place of repressive laws and rules which are not obtaining in that part of the country. That is the complaint. In order to meet that complaint it will be very wise to allow this amendment. Now, the grounds which have been set forth in answer to this recommendation are, that if we allow this amendment to be passed, then it amounts to this that the law of revision which is already embodied in the Criminal Procedure Code under sections 435, 436, 437, 438 and 439 will, to all intents and purposes, be nugatory, that it will be a new departure and, therefore, it is not proper that this amendment should be accepted. This is one of the grounds which has been set forth by the Honourable the Home Member. The other is, in how many cases this has been done. The third ground which has been advanced is this, that this law will practically deprive the magistracy of that very wise preventive power with which they have been equipped.

These grounds can be met. So far as the first ground goes, I may submit that the law of revision will not be interfered with at all, because this amendment deals with a special sort of cases. We have got special acts, special laws. Therefore, this amendment refers to a peculiar kind of orders which will be passed. It will not cover all the orders passed by the District Magistrate or any first class Magistrate, but special cases relating to meetings and relating to the speeches made in those meetings, and not in ordinary cases. So, the fear of the Honourable the Home Member seems to be very exaggerated; I may submit, with due deference to his way of thinking, I may point out to the Honourable the Home Member that any order passed under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, is not appealable, I think he will accede to that contention. It is revisable, and who revises? The District Magistrate. An application for revision is lodged in the Court of the District Magistrate and he revises. If a District Magistrate himself passed the order, then the application for revision will be instituted in the High Court. There is no other provision which may confront me with the view that I am wrong. If the Sessions Judge finds that the order, under debate now, is altogether illegal—suppose section 107 is not applicable. Suppose a speech is made and that speech is innocent, and a constitutional one. Every man may be of this opinion that there is nothing wrong in it, but, by an oversight or by a mistake, the speaker has been hauled up and he has been called upon to show cause.—a very respectable man, one of the orators of this country. That order is illegal. Does the Honourable the Home Member seriously mean that there should be no remedy for it, that he should undergo the whole ordeal, he should try to engage a counsel, or he may not engage a counsel, he may see what will be done or what orders will be passed under section 112 or under section 114 or under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code? Should he wait? Should he wait for three months, for two months, or even for one month? Why should he? If the order is illegal prima facie, on the face of it, why should an innocent man be asked to appear before a Magistrate? The Honourable Mr. Rangachariar's amendment meets all these emergent and urgent cases and I compliment him on putting forward this amendment.

I quite see that there is a little flaw in the motion, but, the Honourable the Home Member could not see it on account of the pressure of work. Perhaps another Member of the Government may think of it. If this amendment would have been placed under that class of amendments which relates to section 108, then there would have been greater propriety in it. This criticism could be launched. However, that criticism could be answered in a simple way. That is this. Since 1922, either in the former or the latter part of that year, this section 107 was wrongly applied, therefore, the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, the author of this amendment, has thought it proper to put this amendment under that very section. That is the answer which will be given to that criticism. With these submissions, I appeal to the Government Benches that they will be advised if they will accept this amendment. There is a great grievance in the country. That grievance will be set at naught. They shall have to admit, saying "Look at the fairness of the Government. They have incorporated a special provision for cases where there is any non-co-operator who is not willing to come to the Court to make an application under section 435 or under section 439. Look at the kindness of the Government. They have incorporated a special provision to see that no injustice may be done to anybody because the object of the law is that justice should be done." If any injured man or if any man against whom a written order is made does not volunteer himself to come to the Court, whether rightly or wrongly, according to his way of thinking, here is the Government quite prepared to see that justice may be meted out to him, and with that view alone this special provision has been incorporated to help those men who do not come to the Court to defend themselves. The Government suo motu, and on its own accord, is always very anxious to see that none of the subjects of His Majesty may be subjected to an order which is illegal. With that view this special provision may be incorporated and the Government will be thanked for it and therefore I repeat my submission that this amendment, which commends itself, may be accepted unanimously.

3 P.M.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I do not propose to discuss the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar's observations about non-co-operators; except one remark which he made, and which, I am rather surprised to find, was repeated by my Honourable friend, Dr. Nand Lal. The statement was that, if the non-co-operators had applied to the High Court, the High Court would have set the matter right. That is to say, the law is all right, but, simply because the non-co-operators will not apply to the High Court, it is necessary for us to make a special provision, in order that they may be saved from acting under the ordinary provisions of the law. That is a rather peculiar proposition to adopt, that we should change our law because certain people are not willing to abide by that law.

Dr. Nand Lal: Because our object is to see that justice is done.

Mr. P. E. Percival: That is a very strange proposition that the law should be altered for the benefit of people who are not willing to apply to the High Court. Then there is the other question, and that is whether the appeal or revision should be to the Sessions Judge or to the District Magistrate. It has always been the case up to now that the revision lies to the District Magistrate, not to the Sessions Judge. By referring these particular cases to the Sessions Judge we shall have two co-ordinate authorities dealing with the same subject. Section 125 runs:

"The Chief Presidency Magistrate or District Magistrate may at any time for sufficient reasons to be recorded in writing cancel any bond for keeping the peace or

and so on;

and it has been ruled by the High Courts, and especially the Madras High Court, that the District Magistrate can cancel any order for keeping the peace. So that it is the District Magistrate who deals with the matter, not the Sessions Judge. As under section 125, so also . . .

Dr. Nand Lal: Supposing the District Magistrate has passed an order under section 107, then what is the remedy?

Mr. P. E. Percival: Then the man can go to the High Court. I think the Honourable Member himself said that. An application for revision can be made to the High Court. If anybody is dissatisfied with the order of the District Magistrate, why not apply to the High Court. So that the position is that there is a regular procedure laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code, by which the case goes to the District Magistrate first, and from the District Magistrate to the High Court. The Sessions Judge is not brought in in these matters of taking security for breach of the peace. The suggestion is that one particular set of cases, namely, preventing persons from holding or addressing meetings, the case should go to the Sessions Judge, and that in other cases it should go to the District Magistrate. I submit that this is not a satisfactory way of legislating in connection with this subject. There is one other remark that I wish to make, namely, that I suggest with due deference that the drafting is not very satisfactory. It says "in all cases where action is taken under this section to prevent a person from holding a meeting". Now the action is taken to prevent a breach of the peace; it is not taken to prevent a person from attending the meeting. So I suggest in any case that the drafting is not entirely satisfactory. I thank the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar for making friendly remarks about Sessions Judges. I hope he will also adopt the same attitude when he is considering the question of the powers of Sessions Judges in other parts of the Code. In this particular case, the matter is one which goes to the District Magistrate and not to the Sessions Judge; and I suggest that there is no reason why the general law on the subject should be changed, and why any one who is not satisfied should not go to the District Magistrate under section 125, or, if the order is passed by the District Magistrate, why he should not go to the High Court for revision. The Honourable Member said that the Sessions Judge is already a revisional authority. Under section 435 he is a revisional authority to the extent that he can call for the papers and refer the matter to the High Court. But the Honourable Member wishes to make him a revisional authority to deal with the matter himself. So that, from this point of view also, I suggest that no change should be made, but that the ordinary procedure should be followed, namely, application to the District Magistrate and revision to the High Court.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Not being very familiar with the Criminal Procedure Code, either as a criminal or as a criminal lawyer, it is with some diffidence that I venture to speak on this subject, and if I venture at all to do so I speak purely as "a man in the street", a man who has to respect the law and who is likely on certain occasions to suffer from the vagaries of the law or of some Magistrates. The whole point whether the amendment moved by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is a healthy amendment or not depends on this: whether if it is carried it will solve a problem of constant friction both for Government and for society at large. Yesterday the Honourable Sir Malcolm

[Mr. B. S. Kamat.]

Hailey enunciated a very sound doctrine when he told the House that even from the point of view of Government the smaller the occasions for causing irritation by the action of the police, the better for Government. If that healthy doctrine were to be adopted to-day, I believe Government should offer no opposition to the amendment which has been moved by Mr. Rangachariar. To my mind, it is a very modest and a very salutary amendment. It is modest for one or two reasons. In the first place it shows confidence in Sessions Judges. In the second place, all that it wants to do is to give them the option and a discretionary power not to call for each and every proceeding of the magistrate but only in certain cases to call for records and proceedings of Magistrates, if they choose to do so. So that it means a certain amount of latitude to the Sessions Judges without throwing an extra amount of burden upon their work. Now what are the objections of Government to the acceptance of such a modest amendment as that? Sir Malcolm Hailey started by saying that if the non-co-operators are not prepared to go to the High Court, how is it possible that they will go to the Sessions Judges? Now that assumes as if Mr. Rangachariar had brought forward this amendment purely in the interests of the non-co-operators and nobody else. (An Honourable Member: "Primarily in their interests.") My reply to that argument of Sir Malcolm Hailey is this: as I said in the beginning, I take up my attitude purely as 'a man in the street'. I look to my own safety. I am not so much concerned about the safety or the protection of the non-co-operators, but Sir, I have no doubt to any citizen, howsoever humble he might be, I believe Mr. Rangachariar's amendment would be a safeguard and a protection in respect of his elementary rights. Sir Malcolm Hailey said that this is likely to reduce the power of the Magistracy. Certainly it is intended to do that on the healthy principle that while, on the one hand, the Magistracy is intended to prevent any breach of the peace, it is also, on the other hand, intended to safeguard the interests of honest citizens, and if there is a pitfall into which Magistrates are likely to fall by an excessive zeal or by their political bias or by the atmosphere of the country for the time being, well, there should be a safeguard provided by the law. I believe the amendment of my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, provides a very convenient and a very workable safeguard, both in the interests of Government and in the interests of the Magistracy and in the interests of citizens like myself, the man in the street. I expected, Sir, that Sir Malcolm Hailey would accept this amendment instead of shielding himself behind certain technicalities. If this is a healthy and a salutary amendment both in the interests of the citizen and of Government, as I contend it is, there should have been an alacrity on the part of Government to accept it, but the tendency on the part of Sir Malcolm Hailey was to shield himself behind definitions and behind technicalities. The first technicality which he trotted out was the revisionary powers of the Sessions Judges. Now if this is an acceptable amendment, purely on its merits, in the interests of community and in the interests of Government, a way could be found out so far as the revisionary powers of the Sessions Judges are concerned. Under sections 435 and 436 it is pointed out they have such powers; now the question of giving these additional powers or throwing this burden on them is purely a matter of administrative convenience and public interests. If it is necessary in the interests of society to throw additional burdens on the Sessions Judges, by all means let Government come forward and say that such a burden should be thrown on them, instead of simply saying technically that such and such a power already vests in them and it is not desirable to throw additional burdens on them. It is purely a matter of technicality to raise this objection. I believe the attitude taken up by the Government as displayed by Sir Malcolm Hailey was purely what one would call an offspring of political expediency. Sir Malcolm Hailey further went on to say, or to pretend to think that it was not possible to define even the word "meeting". It caused a great deal of astonishment to me that those who are able to frame so complicated and so comprehensive a Code as the Criminal Procedure Code are unable to find out a definition of the word "meeting", and, then, that their Magistrates who can understand what an unlawful assembly is and who can differentiate between a lawful and an unlawful assembly would not understand what a meeting was, an ordinary meeting held for any ordinary purpose in the country. Sir, I do think that this is a tendency to shirk responsibility, to accept the principle of the amendment. I for one think, both in the interests of Government and in the interests of community, it is desirable to provide in the Code a safeguard for honest citizens who want to take part in meetings either political or otherwise, and I think Government would do well to accept this amendment either in this form or, if the drafting is considered defective, to accept it in some other form, and not give a go-by to this amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, while fully sympathising with the underlying principle of my friend, Mr. Rangachariar's amendment, I have certain difficulties which I propose to place before this Honourable Assembly.

I quite see that in cases where a person is prohibited from holding a meeting or taking part in a meeting some corrective may be necessary in respect of the action of the Magistrate prohibiting the meeting, especially in these days of political conflict. But at the same time I also see that it is extremely difficult to put this amendment forward as an amendment of section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code. My reasons are these. My friend, Mr. Rangachariar, says: "In all cases where action is taken under this section to prevent a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings, a report shall, etc., etc." Now, in such cases the action taken must be by an order, and the order contemplated is not an order binding down any particular person against any contemplated breach of the peace, but an order prohibiting him from holding a meeting. That is an order, it seems to me, which comes under section 144 of the Code and can be appropriately considered only within the four corners of that section, vis., section 144. At the same time we have this further difficulty that section 435 which is the section about revision, lays down in so many words that "orders made under sections 143, 144, etc., are not proceedings within the meaning of this section." Therefore if the amendment is put to the House in the shape in which it has been put forward, to my mind considerable legal difficulties arise, and being in sympathy with my Honourable friend, my present desire is to seek some means whereby the difficulty may be solved. But if the matter be put to the Assembly as an amendment to section 107, I feel, Sir, that I shall have great difficulty in voting in favour of the amendment, as I do not wish to introduce confusion into the Criminal Procedure Code.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It really means, 'when action is taken under this section for the purpose of preventing a person, etc.'

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Of course, all orders under section 144 are orders directing a person to abstain from doing a certain thing or to take certain orders in connection with property in his possession or management; they are not orders directed against the land itself, an inanimate thing, but against a person and they cannot mean police action. And therefore I submit that the scope of section 107 is something totally different from what is contemplated by the proposed amendment. That is my view. My Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, seems also to think that if there are drafting difficulties those difficulties could be smoothed over and the underlying principle considered in its appropriate place. That is also my difficulty, and if the House accepts the principle of the amendment, I hope it will also consider that point, and I put it to my Honourable friend, the Mover of the amendment, that he will also consider it before putting it to the vote of the Assembly.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I shall gladly do so if I can understand what my Honourable friend's difficulty is. I am sorry I have not been able to trace it.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I say that the amendment cannot come under section 107 because section 107 contemplates the binding down of a person; that is, a Magistrate may, under that section, only call upon a person to show cause why he should not be bound down for a certain time. That is quite distinct from an order directing that a certain thing should be done: that is to say, by such an order, personal liberty is not interfered with but a person is merely ordered not to do a certain thing. There is my difficulty. Of course, if such an order really comes under section 107, it is open to revision but unfortunately it does not. I may, however, point out that the proposal itself is a very harmless one indeed, and is not likely to interfere with executive action. I would like the Honourable the Home Member and the Members on the Government Benches to consider this point.

The House will see that the order in question is passed forbidding a meeting. The meeting does not take place. The event cannot be re-enacted afterwards. The danger, whatever it is, is tided over, and thereafter, according to the amendment proposed a report is sent to the Sessions Judge. The Sessions Judge cannot pass a contrary order, but will only consider the propriety of that order; that is all, and the thing will end there. My submission is that my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is quite right when he says that, it will be well if there is some superior legal authority to check any error in the proceedings of the Magistrate; that will ensure, to my mind, a salutary provision of the law. Therefore, I put it to Honourable Members that the substance of the amendment itself is very harmless in its way, and therefore its principle, taken by itself, ought not to present any difficulties to the Government Benches. But, if it be put to the vote of the House, as it is, I regret, I shall not be able to vote for it.

Mr. J. Ochaudhuri: May I inquire, Sir, what would be the attitude of the Government with regard to my suggestion? If they are disposed to consider it, it may not be necessary to go into these piece-meal amendments.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member asks me what is our attitude towards his suggestion. We treated it, not as an amendment, but as a suggestion only; and, obviously, we could not discuss it in any way in this place, for it is not cognate to this particular section, any more than, I was going to say, is Mr. Rangachariar's motion truly cognate to it, since all that a Magistrate does under section 107 itself is to order somebody to show cause. We have treated Mr. Chaudhuri's suggestion as a suggestion and nothing else, which we shall have to consider. While we are discussing changes in the existing law, it is really impossible for us to enter into a discussion of the wide change involved in carrying out a separation between executive and judicial functions.

Mr. R. Faridoonji (Central Provinces : Nominated Official) : The proposals made by Honourable Members have already been anticipated in the Central Provinces. All cases disposed of by First Class Magistrates are reported to the Sessions Judge in the form of daily calendars and he calls for the records of cases when he thinks inspection or revision of cases is necessary. It seems to me that a tremendous amount of solicitude and tenderness is shown for the criminal or the person from whom a breach of the peace is apprehended, while I have not heard one word of consideration for the public who apprehend a breach of the peace, or who apprehend broken bones or broken heads.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon : Sir, after hearing some of the speeches on the question now before us, I am more than ever anxious to endeavour to approach the consideration of it with the complacency of a cold-blooded legislator. I will examine the proposed amendment. If I feel it to be a reform, I shall unhesitatingly support it whatever may be the view of Government. The lunch interval has given me an opportunity of considering it. As it stands, it seems to me, in a special class of cases, to alter the existing law in two respects only. Firstly, it requires that a report of the proceedings should be made apparently—though there is nothing in the amendment to show who or what is the person or authority responsible to make the report,—by the Magistrate who takes action under section 107. That is the first point. As the law now stands, a report to the Sessions Judge of proceedings under section 107 would be made ordinarily by the person against whom those proceedings were taken.

The other point upon which this amendment would alter the law is that the Sessions Judge, instead of reporting to the High Court a case in which he thought some interference by higher authority was desirable, will himself be empowered to pass the final order. Now how far will that be any advantage to the general public? My own humble opinion is that, while it will delay and retard preventive action by the Magistrate on the spot, it will invite the Sessions Judge to take upon himself a responsibility which, from what I know of Sessions Judges, he will very seldom be inclined to accept. However, that is only a matter of procedure. But it seems to me that the amendment as it stands—we must take it as it stands—is open to the objection urged against it by the last speaker, namely, that of producing a certain amount of confusion. It reads :

"In all cases where action is taken under this section to prevent a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings."

That is hardly language in which one can properly describe action under section 107. It suggests that the section is likely to be used in an indirect way, not to prevent breaches of the peace but to prevent meetings which some person or some body of people consider undesirable. If the section is used to prevent a person from taking action which is likely to cause a breach of the peace, then why should one particular form of that action be made the subject of special legislative treatment? (Res

[Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon.]

Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "The elementary right of citizenship.") Then we are not told that these meetings are to be political meetings or even public meetings. For all that appears in the amendment to the contrary this special treatment would have to be applied to meetings held by intending dacoits, to meetings held by intending rioters, to meetings held by religious fanatics, to meetings held by factions concerned in a dispute over land. The Honourable the Home Member has rightly said that it is an extremely difficult thing to say what is a meeting having regard to the ordinary significance of that word. Two persons can have a meeting. But I think there are two other rather serious objections to this proposed amendment. A general legislation of provisions for revision by the higher Courts cannot be taken objection to by anybody; but the moment you introduce a special clause of this kind for special cases, you make your motive clear. It has been made clear in this case. Underlying the proposal is the distrust of our Magistrates. Sir, we have heard that there are Magistrates of all kinds. Certainly there are. I have met them of all kinds, from A to Z. But, because a tool is fragile or bad, you do not cut off the hand that works it; you improve the tool. If our Magistrates are given to weaknesses, to illegalities, to too much police and too little judge, public opinion is the remedy for improving that state of things. We cannot possibly expect our Magistracy, as a body, to be encouraged to act with impartiality and in a trustworthy way if by our laws we point out to them that the public whom we represent have no trust in them. We must give them that trust and let them feel it a burden upon them to act up to it and to deserve it. That is the only way; that is how trustworthiness has been secured in England for centuries, and that is the only way in which it will be secured in India. Then I submit that it is indeed a strong objection to this amendment that it would create an exception in procedure, an invidious distinction, in respect of one particular class of action which a Magistrate believes is likely to create a disturbance or cause a breach of the peace. We have to-day caused to be accepted or carried an extremely sound principle insisted upon by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, that action under section 107 shall depend upon an exercise of Magisterial discretion—a proper exercise of Magisterial discretion. That is undoubtedly a correct principle and a wise safeguard; but having got that and put it on the Statute Book, are we nevertheless to suggest to the Magistrate as we should do by this amendment: "We do not believe in your exercise of judicial discretion in this particular class of case, and therefore, in this particular class of case only, we commend that every time you exercise that discretion, you shall at once make a report to your superior authority in order that there may be a check upon you." I think the proposition made upon the basis of the Greaves' Commission Report for a general amendment of the law of revision is a proposition that will require very careful consideration by this House when it comes up; but it is impossible to introduce a general clause of that kind as a tail to section 107. Therefore, I think, and I think so after careful consideration of everything said upon both sides of the question—it is my honest opinion, though possibly a wrong one—that by introducing this amendment into the Code we shall not do any practical good to the public at large, and we may do a good deal of harm.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I have very little to add to the very clear exposition of the difficulties of this amendment which the House has just heard from Sir Henry Stanyon. But I do want to be clear in my own mind, and I think the Members of the House should be clear in their minds, as to what the effect will be of making this amendment in our criminal law. Mr. Rangachariar proposes that when an order has been made under this section for a certain purpose—I am not concerned with the purpose, the question of the principle of the amendment has been otherwise dealt with—but when an order has been made under section 107, the Magistrate—he does not say the Magistrate but we presume it is the Magistrate—shall make a report forthwith to the Sessions Judge. Now, we have to remember what it is he is going to report. As a matter of fact, there is no order under 107. It is a requisition. You require a person to appear.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I did not say “order”—the wording is “when action is taken.”

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: When action is taken. My point is just the same: action is taken. What has the Magistrate done? He has required a person to appear and show cause. The moment he has done that, he reports to the Sessions Judge. Well, what is the Magistrate then going to do? Does he go on until perhaps the Sessions Judge sends for the record or does he stay his proceedings and wait for the Sessions Judge to take action in the matter? I do not know what the poor Magistrate will do.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not think there will be any difficulty. Till he gets a stay order he goes on.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Unless he gets a stay order he goes on. Very well. I should have thought it might have been better to make it clear. But let us come to the Sessions Judge. He has got the report from the Magistrate. Now, what is the report going to be? The Magistrate has reported to the Sessions Judge, “I have information that Mr. Rangachariar is likely to commit a breach of the peace. . . .”

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: By attending a meeting.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: “I think there is sufficient ground for proceeding against him. I have therefore issued a notice upon him to appear and show cause.” That is what the Sessions Judge gets. Now, what is he going to do. He sends for the record. When he has seen the record, he has got no further information to go upon.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Then if that is all the material he will cancel it.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Mr. Rangachariar is reluctant to admit that there is anything wrong with his amendment. But I think in his heart of hearts he will himself realise that it is in the wrong place. That is not an amendment to section 107. He wants it to be much further on in the proceedings. At all events, I shall be very glad indeed if any Honourable supporter of this amendment will get up and remove my doubts in the matter. I cannot see how any Sessions Judge is going to pass any effective order of any sort. I think a sensible Sessions Judge, receiving the report of the Magistrate, will say “what is the good of this to me?” and drop it into the waste-paper basket. This will be the effect of the new procedure which Mr. Rangachariar’s ingenuity is devising for us.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

“After clause 17 the following clause be added, namely:

‘17-A. After sub-section (4) of section 107 of the said Code the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

‘(5) In all cases where action is taken under this section to prevent a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings, a report shall forthwith be made to the

[Mr. Deputy President.]

Sessions Judge who may call for and examine the record of any proceeding for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the same and pass such orders as he thinks fit."

The question is that that amendment be made.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The next amendment which I move, Sir, is this:

"After clause 17 insert the following clause:

'17A. After sub-section (4) of section 107 of the said Code the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

'If any person who is detained in custody under sub-section (4) or is brought under arrest as provided in section 114, is prepared at any time or at any stage of the proceedings before such Court to execute a bond required of him by the order passed under section 112 to be in force until the completion of the enquiry herein-after prescribed, he shall be released.'

The whole object of the initiation of these proceedings is to require a person to execute a bond to keep the peace for a certain period, but pending the enquiry the Magistrate considers that his detention is necessary and therefore orders him to be brought up—detention in order to compel him to give the security after the proceedings are fully completed. But if he is prepared to give that security during the pendency of the inquiry there is no reason why he should be kept in custody when he is prepared to do it in order to go on with the inquiry, it being always remembered that this is a purely preventive chapter and not a punishing chapter. If the man is prepared to do that which he is called upon finally to do, when he is prepared to do it in the first instance pending the inquiry, there is no object in keeping him in custody. Therefore, I provide that instead of his being enlarged on bail which may not be enough—bail is merely for appearance—if he executes the bond which he is required in the preliminary order under section 112 which was read to us this morning by the Honourable the Law Member, namely, giving the period and the amount which he would eventually be required to give—if he is prepared to do that pending the inquiry, then he should no longer be detained in custody. That is the object of this amendment and I hope it will be acceptable to the House.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

" In clause 17 add the following sub-section, namely :

" After sub-section (4) of the same section the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely :

" (5) If any person who is detained in custody under sub-section (4) or is brought under arrest as provided in section 114, is prepared at any time or at any stage of the proceedings before such Court to execute a bond required of him by the order passed under section 112 to be in force until the completion of the inquiry hereinafter prescribed, he shall be released."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I have two objections to the amendment which has been moved by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar. In the first place the proposed sub-section to section 107 is in an entirely wrong place. In the second place it is quite unnecessary. As regards the suggestion that it is in the wrong place, I would merely remark that section 107 deals with persons who have been required to show cause why they should not execute a bond to keep the peace. Now in this sub-section the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar refers to persons brought under arrest under section 114. This section applies to all people who come under the provisions of section 112. That is, it covers the cases of persons who are called upon to show cause why they should not give a bond for good behaviour as well as of persons who are called upon to show cause why they should not give a bond to keep the peace. That objection, Sir, might be met by placing the amendment in another place, but in view of the fact that we are providing in clause 20 for the addition of a sub-section (3) to existing section 117, I suggest that this amendment is quite unnecessary. Under the proposal of the Honourable Member the bond which would be executed would be a bond required of him by the order passed under section 112. Under section 117, on the other hand, it has been definitely provided that the bond shall not be either in degree or in nature more stringent than the bond which the man is required to execute by the order passed under section 112. What then, Sir, is the use of this additional provision. It might be suggested, perhaps, that this will apply to an earlier stage of the proceedings than the stage of section 117. But, Sir, that is entirely incorrect because a man under the proposed sub-section (6) must have been brought before the Court. The order under section 112 must have been read and then, Sir, immediately the provisions of section 117 apply and I submit that the amendment is therefore quite unnecessary. In the interests of the subject, much more has been provided for in the Bill already than in the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 17, add the following sub-section, namely:

'After sub-section (4) of the same section the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

'5. If any person who is detained in custody under sub-section (4) or is brought under arrest as provided in section 114, is prepared at any time or at any stage of the proceedings before such Court to execute a bond required of him by the order passed under section 112 to be in force until the completion of the inquiry hereinafter prescribed, he shall be released.'

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is, that clause 17, as amended,
4 P.M. stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the amendment of which I gave notice has already been discussed in connection with clause No. 17. I may be permitted to move an amendment adopting the same wordings as have been adopted in clause 17, that is 'in his opinion if there is sufficient ground for proceeding, or believing, or whatever word may be suitable,—I would leave that to the Legislative Department.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, we are quite prepared on our part to accept the same amendment that we had in section 107. It will simplify matters if I move it myself, having it now in proper form. I move, Sir,

"That in clause 18 after the word 'substituted' the following be inserted:

'After the words 'such Magistrate' the words 'if in his opinion there is sufficient ground for proceeding' shall be inserted'."

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the amendment be made.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I move, Sir, on behalf of Dr. Gour, his amendment.* I must say at once that, speaking for myself, I should like not to move it, but unfortunately I have power and am authorised to move and not to withdraw. But I can conceive cases, in moving the amendment, cases, probably Government knows, of an effigy being carried which would have the effect of disseminating sedition; or, a caricature, a photograph: there are other ways of disseminating sedition, that is other than orally or in writing. However, Sir, I have got to move it, and I move it.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"In clause 18 omit the following:

'After the words 'in writing' the words 'or in any other manner' shall be inserted'."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has already anticipated the objection we should have brought forward against his amendment. The added words would, of course, apply to effigies, photographs, cinema shows, dumb shows and the like.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that that amendment be made
The motion was negatived.

* In clause 18 omit the following:

"After the words 'in writing' the words 'or in any other manner' shall be inserted'."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I move the following amendment:

"In clause 18 after the word 'manner' insert the word 'knowingly'."

My amendment relates to the same clause but is not to the same effect. The language of the clause is:

"has information that there is within the limits of his jurisdiction any person who, within or without such limits, either orally or in writing, seminate or in any manner disseminates or attempts to disseminate . . ."

I introduce the word "knowingly" before the word "disseminates," so that innocent agents may not be proceeded against; for instance, boys who handle newspapers without knowing the contents and such other persons who are merely ignorant tools in the hands of other persons, should not be proceeded against. "Knowingly disseminates"—that is the object of this amendment. I hope it will commend itself to the House, and I do not think many words are needed, unless Government opposes, in which case, of course, there are other Honourable Members who will take care of it.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I would suggest that this amendment is really not necessary. Mr. Rangachariar cited the case of the newspaper boy. Well, a newspaper boy does certainly hand on newspapers which contain possibly objectionable matter to purchasers. But I do not think it can be said that the newspaper boy is disseminating the matter.

The word used here is 'disseminating,' 'spreading broadcast,' and Mr. Rangachariar no doubt knows the Latin derivation of the word: it means the same thing as 'scattering seed.' Now, the person who scatters seed orally or in writing is not the newspaper boy. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Nor do I think there is any risk whatever of a newspaper boy being prosecuted under this section. The word "knowingly" is not a word we are accustomed to in our law; we have the words 'voluntarily' 'intentionally,' and so forth. "Knowingly" is somewhat new to us and I do not think we shall be improving the Code by introducing it.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has said that no person who sells newspapers can be bound over under this section. I should like to give him some instances which have been brought to my notice. Honourable Members may be aware that in Partabgarh during 1921, about a dozen young men were prosecuted under this section and bound over for distributing certain leaflets about the Kisan movement and put in prison for their refusal to give security. In another place also, very recently, a boy was punished with imprisonment for seven years under section for distributing Fatra leaflets. It is just possible that the Magistrates may bind over even boys who sell newspapers in the streets. There will therefore be no harm if the word "knowingly," or any similar word such as "intentionally," is inserted in this sub-clause. It is on the other hand extremely desirable to insert such a word and provide a necessary safeguard.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, the Honourable Member has by implication at all events brought so grave a charge against our Magistracy, namely, of sending to prison for seven years boys who unknowingly disseminated information, that I am impelled to ask him whether he can assure the House that persons so convicted did not know the nature of the leaflets they were distributing. Perhaps he cannot give that assurance?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Not under this section. No one can be punished for seven years under this section.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Then his objection does not apply to this section.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muham-madan Urban): Sir, with your permission and the permission of the House, I move that the word "intentionally" be substituted for the word "knowingly".

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I accept that.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are prepared to accept that.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 18, after the word 'manner' insert the word 'intentionally'."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Agnihotri's Amendment No. 46, namely:

"That in clause 18:

Between the word 'matter' and the word 'contained', insert the words 'not true to the knowledge of such person and'."

was withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy President. The question is:

"That clause 18, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, before Mr. Agarwala is called upon to move his amendment, there is an amendment standing in my name on the supplementary list which has been placed on the table to-day. I propose that in section 110 after the words 'receives information', the words 'on oath or solemn affirmation' be inserted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am afraid, Sir, I must ask for your ruling whether you admit this amendment. You will perceive, that it was received on the 15th January shortly after one o'clock.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I handed it in to the Notice Office at 11 o'clock.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Nevertheless, Sir, it was on the 15th of January, and, as I read the rule, it says that notice of amendments must be given in two clear days before the Bill is to be considered. The rule does not provide two days before any portion or section of the Bill is taken into consideration.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: "Considered" is the word.

Mr. Deputy President: My ruling on the application of Standing Order 46 to the case of amendments received two clear days before the clause of the Bill to which they relate comes up for consideration is as follows:

Sub-order (1) of Standing Order 46 clearly requires notice to be given two clear days before the first day on which the Bill is considered. Therefore, all amendments of which notice was given on or after the 18th of January may be objected to under the Standing Order. As regards the power of the Chair to overrule the objection, I propose, ordinarily, not to suspend the Standing Order in favour of such amendments, firstly, because Honourable Members have had ample time in which to consider the Bill and to formulate their amendments, and, secondly, because in a long and complicated Bill of this kind there is a distinct danger that the passing of an amendment, of which the notice prescribed by the Standing Order has not been received, may result in the overlooking of necessary consequential alterations in the Bill or of the effect of the amendment on other provisions of the Code.

I therefore rule Mr. Hussanally's amendment out of order.

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Sir, with your permission, I will move the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Agarwala.

Mr. Deputy President: Has the Honourable Member received his permission in writing?

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Yes, Sir.

The amendment that I am going to move is:

"That in clause 19 omit sub-clause (1)."

Sub-clause (1) of clause 19 is as follows:

"In class (a), the word 'or,' where it first occurs, shall be omitted and after the word 'thief' the words 'or forger' shall be inserted."

The effect of this amendment will be that a "forger" will not be included under the purview of section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code. I would have liked to include a "habitual forger" under the purview of this section of the Code, but there is a difficulty which stands in my way, but for which I would not have moved this amendment, and it is this. Section 110 says that whenever a Presidency Magistrate, District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class specially empowered in this behalf by the Local Government receives information that any person within the local limits of his jurisdiction is by habit a robber, housebreaker, or thief, etc., such Magistrate may, in manner hereinafter provided, require such person to show cause why he should not be ordered to execute a bond with sureties for his good behaviour for such period not exceeding 3 years as the Magistrate thinks fit. Honourable Members will find that the Code requires that the bond shall be executed with sureties, and a reference to clause 21 (c) of the Bill will show that such sureties can be rejected on the ground that they are not capable of controlling the movements of the person. I ask the Honourable Members to consider whether it is possible for the sureties of a "forger" to control his movements. The sureties of a habitual robber or thief or housebreaker can control his movements, because to commit his offence he has to move from place to place, he will be going from one place to another. But "forger" can forge while sitting in his house: how can a surety control his movements? It will be simply impossible for a "forger" to find a surety. A forger cannot get a surety, and when he cannot get a surety he will have to rot in jail. No surety can possibly control the movements of a "forger" unless he remains with him day and night, and therefore I say "forger" should not be included in his section.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, my amendment is that:

"In clause 19, sub-clause (ii), omit the words 'or abets the commission of'."

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, there is an amendment to omit clause 19 standing in my name.

Mr. Deputy President: We have just disposed of that.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I wish to move amendment No. 48*

Mr. Deputy President: That has been disposed of.

Mr. K. Ahmed: No, Sir. There has probably been a clerical mistake and I am the sufferer for it. Sir, before I had sent the manuscript written by myself possibly there has been some mistake. The word 'forgery' Sir, you will see in section 110 . . .

Mr. Deputy President: Before the Honourable Member proceeds further I would like to know what amendment on the agenda paper it is that he is moving.

Mr. K. Ahmed: The word 'forgery,' Sir,—I have got the word here . . .

Mr. Deputy President: That has been disposed of.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I propose, Sir, that in clause 19, sub-clause (ii), the words "or abets the commission of" be omitted.

This amendment relates to clause (d) of section 110. The present clause runs thus:

"Whoever habitually commits mischief, extortion or cheating or counterfeiting coin, currency notes or stamps, or attempts so to do . . ."

The amendment proposed by Government is this:

"Habitually commits, or attempts to commit, or abets the commission of, etc."

Abetment is now added newly to the section. According to the section as it stands now it is only the commission of an offence or an attempt to commit the offence that renders a man liable to be bound over. But now for the first time it is proposed also to bind over a man for habitually abetting the commission of an offence. My objection is this, that abetment may be by doing an overt act or simply by an illegal omission; and it seems to me that a man might be bound over for abetting by means of an overt act but not for abetting by an illegal omission. I am prepared to amend my amendment like this: "habitually commits or attempts to commit or abets by an overt act the commission of an offence . . ." So I will put it like that and I hope that it will commend itself to Government. My point is this, when you bind over a man . . .

Mr. Deputy President: May I ask the Honourable Member to repeat what he has said? The House would like to know what the alteration is.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I would add after the word "abets" the words "by an overt act." My point is that we should not bind over a man simply because he has been omitting to do a certain thing which he ought to have done. We can do it with regard to a man who has done an overt act. That is my point, Sir.

Dr. Nand Lal: With your permission, Sir, may I inform the author of the present amendment . . .

* 'In clause 19, omit sub-clause (i),'

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. The amendment is "In clause 19, sub-clause (ii) after the word 'abets' insert the words 'by an overt act'."

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur (Bhagalpur, Purnea and the Sonthal Pargannas: Non-Muhammadan): May I inquire if this new amendment has been accepted by this House?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: No, Sir, by no means.

Mr. Deputy President: If an objection is taken, I would rule it out of order.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I merely said that the amendment has not been accepted by the House.

Mr. Deputy President: But the question is before the House.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The amendment has not yet been accepted by the House.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment is before the House.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, Mr. Pantulu desires to put in the words 'by an overt act,' because he is afraid that somebody might be prosecuted under section 110 for habitually abetting serious offences by illegal omissions. It is a little difficult to conceive how this might arise. But in any case there is no abetment without intention. If my friend will look at the Penal Code for the definition of abetment, he will find that there is no abetment in regard to an omission unless the omission is an illegal omission and unless also the person intentionally aids, by that illegal omission, the doing of a thing. I think, Sir, the House will agree that if a person habitually and intentionally aids by illegal omissions the commission of all these offences to which reference has been made, he should come within the purview of the law.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I move that in clause 19, in sub-clause (ii), omit the word 'kidnapping.'

As a general principle, Sir, when there is an offence and it is sufficiently provided for as punishable in the Indian Penal Code, I do not think it is at all necessary that this word should be included in section 110 for bad livelihood. The scope of this section is after all a preventive one and not a punitive one. Kidnapping as a profession, Sir, is very rare in many parts of India; while on the other hand, we have got some experience in our criminal court practice that young minor wives and minor members of families who are without help are kidnapped. Sometimes the relations of the minors go to the police and try by giving illegal gratification to kidnap, with the result that the engine of oppression is being put in against the interest of these persons who are infants after all. That being so, Sir, and since we see the word 'kidnapping' has been put in for the first time after so many years and is probably a good attempt, but certainly, Sir, when we come across so many difficulties, so much oppression being exercised, I submit that this word "kidnapping" should be omitted.

I therefore move, Sir:

"In clause 19, in sub-clause (ii), omit the word 'kidnapping'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 19 (ii), insert the word 'abduction' between the words 'kidnapping' and 'extortion'."

I think, Sir, while moving this amendment I am on safer ground. Here I do not wish to curtail the powers and the authority that have been vested in the Magistrates or the police and I have no fear of getting any rebuke from the Leader of the House on this amendment. I take it as my ill-luck to have received these rebukes from the Leader of the House, for the fault of having the misfortune to differ from him on certain points. My reason for moving this amendment is that, of late there has been a regular profession with certain people to take women and girls from different provinces of India to the Punjab—so much so that hundreds of females are taken from some of the provinces to the Punjab every year and sold there. So far as the Central Provinces is concerned, the Central Provinces Government deputed special officers to find out and make inquiries in that connection and certain persons are on trial and the cases are pending in the Courts of law. It generally happens that the agents or the female-catchers as they may be called, have their agencies at various places where they employ women of that district or of places in the neighbourhood in their service and after a course of time by deceitful inducements and persuasion take them to the Punjab and sell them. If any of my Honourable friends have any doubt on that matter I would refer them to the various law reports and the law journals: wherein they will find many cases of kidnapping and abduction of this nature reported. Therefore, I submit that there is no reason why when we include kidnapping we should not include abduction also in this section. Therefore, I commend my amendment for the consideration of the House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I am very sorry Mr. Agnihotri should think that I have directed rebukes against him. It was far from my mind; I have indeed attempted to convince him by argument every now and then and I am glad to say have frequently received the aid of the House in doing so. On this occasion he may be quite free from any such apprehension. So far from contesting his proposal, for my part I think it is an excellent one. It was originally in the Bill as put forward in 1913, and it was perhaps in an excess of caution that it was omitted by the Lowndes Committee. I quite agree, from my knowledge of the infamous trade that is carried on in certain parts of India, that this addition should be made to Bill; it is an added pleasure to me on this occasion to find a new Saul among the prophets.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: But the Law Member ought to repudiate the charge against the Punjab.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, while supporting the amendment, I must strongly repudiate the charge that is brought against my province. I am sure the Honourable the Law Member will bear me out on this point.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 19 (ii), insert the word 'abduction' between the words 'kidnapping' and 'extortion'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Sir, I beg to move the amendment which stands in my name, and which runs as follows:

"To clause 19 add the following clause:

'(iii) clause (f) shall be omitted'."

I am afraid I shall be considered to be a very nervous person like so many other Honourable colleagues of mine in the House who object to the enlargement of the power of the Magistracy and the police. I know that in moving this amendment I am courting very severe attacks from various quarters. Some friends of mine, mostly Executive Officers of Government, have come to me and, though not in so many words, but by their gestures and by the way in which they have spoken have implied "Either you are a dangerous lunatic or you are a dangerous character yourself. How dare you move this amendment?" When I am opposed by so many distinguished gentlemen, I feel that I must be wrong and they must be right. But, unfortunately, Sir, I have not been convinced that I am wrong and I need hardly assure either the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey or the other Members of this House that I am in no sympathy with the dangerous people who are mentioned in section 110, and I am not at all keen on gaining the distinction which a prosecution under this section confers upon you.

But, Sir, the whole point is this. Is it really necessary to have this clause (f) in section 110? The House will notice that its scope has been very much extended by the amendments that have been carried to-day. Almost every kind of imaginable offence to which the provisions of this section could be made applicable has been included in sub-clauses (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). I have been trying to think—I must confess without success—of a case to which clause (f) would apply but which would not be covered by the previous clauses. (An Honourable Member: 'Goondas'.) Yes. My Honourable friend says "Goondas." I was going to refer to Goondas. Perhaps my words will not carry the same weight with the House as the words of a very distinguished Judge of the Allahabad High Court, whom every lawyer not only in the United Provinces but all over India considers an authority on criminal law. I mean the late Sir Douglas Straight. Listen to what he says. There was a case exactly of a Goonda before him and this is what he said. I will give the facts from the report itself.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: May we have the reference, please.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Indian Law Reports, Allahabad Series, Volume VI, page 132. I must at once inform Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith that I tried to find out whether this case was over-ruled but I could not get hold of the index of cases in this library. If it is over-ruled, I shall be very glad if he will tell me so. This is what the report says:

"On reading over the record and hearing Babua's pleader, Babu Lal Moha, I consider there is sufficient evidence on the record to establish that Babua is a notorious badmash, an extortioner, a concoctor of false cases as a means of extorting money, and altogether a terror to the town of Mirzapur. I have heard of the badmashes of Mirzapur (who, indeed, are notorious), and I have taken the opportunity of consulting a few of the residents of Mirzapur about this Babua, and the account they give of him is very black indeed."

That was the sort of man who went up in revision before his Lordship, Mr. Justice Straight. This is what his Lordship says:

"I am well aware that in Mirzapur, particularly, the task of the Magistrate in preserving order is an extremely difficult and anxious one; but neither he nor the

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

Judge nor this Court is empowered by law to put a man in prison simply because he has an evil reputation. If respectable persons, who can prove facts which would constitute the credible information legally necessary to justify issue of process and requirement of security, have not the courage to come forward and assist the Magistrate in the prevention of breaches of peace or of crimes by giving evidence in Court, it is unfortunate to say the least of it, but the Magistrate is not therefore entitled to act upon inadequate proof obtained aliunde, which he himself describes 'as not so strong as it ought to be'. If in the interest of public order or security to property the attendance in Court of such persons was necessary, the Magistrate had the power, if he chose to exercise it, of compelling their appearance."

I have invited the attention of the House to this particular passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Straight to show that it was a very bad case where the District Magistrate and the Sessions Judge were clearly of opinion that the man was a regular badmash, goonda or hooligan, call him what you will. The District Magistrate and the Sessions Judge thought that he should be bound over under section 110. But his Lordship Mr. Justice Straight sitting in revision held that the provisions of this section did not apply, and he refers,—I may tell Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith—to an earlier case reported in I. L. R., 2, All., 835, where he has laid down the principle which should guide Courts in applying section 110. Now, I submit that if the House is satisfied that there are cases which are not covered by the previous clauses together with the amendments made—apart from the question of any authority in my favour—then surely, this clause should be retained and I shall be happy to withdraw my amendment. But I fail to see why you should introduce a clause so general, and I might say, so vague that it is difficult to define it. Moreover I submit that in times of panic or of excitement it is possible that this clause may be misapplied, as indeed some clauses are being misapplied. Take the case of a goonda who either goes about beating people, trying, say, to extort money. If he is a man who goes about beating people, you can certainly have him under clause (c) which lays down that a person who "habitually commits, or attempts to commit, or abets the commission of, offences involving a breach of the peace", should be bound over under this section. Or to take another instance, if you have a man who goes about threatening people, then you can again have him under this very clause. I submit that these clauses are wide enough to cover all these cases and it is not wise to have a clause which can on account of its vagueness and indefiniteness be misapplied. I therefore move the following amendment:

"To clause 19 add the following sub-clause:

'(iii) clause (f) shall be omitted'."

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 20th January, 1923.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD CLASS CARRIAGES ON RAILWAYS.

205. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to columns 66 and 67 of Appendix 13 to the Railway Administration Report for 1919-20, is it a fact that the stock of 1st and 2nd class carriages is unduly in excess of the requirements of the traffic carried or offering, whether relatively to the 3rd class carriages or absolutely, and if so, do Government propose to transfer the provision in the quinquennial programme for 1st and 2nd class carriages to that for 3rd class carriages.

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The items in the Administration Report for 1919-20 referred to have been omitted from subsequent reports because it was found that they were valueless as a practical guide to the facts of the position. As an illustration the Honourable Member will notice that the average load of 3rd class stock is considerably below the full capacity from which it might be argued that no overcrowding exists. Such figures cannot, therefore, be taken as a reliable guide in respect to provision necessary. Requirements in respect to stock on each railway are in fact governed by the actual necessities of the train services which are arranged to suit public convenience as far as possible. The requirements cannot be gauged from a study of general averages. Reports received from railway administrations do not support the idea that the supply of 1st and 2nd class carriages is in excess of requirements. The relative necessity for provision of stock of the various classes in the programme is being given very careful consideration and Government do not consider that the provision made for the first two classes is in excess of what the circumstances of traffic require.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to put in somewhere in the report what are the actual requirements of the first and second class carriages and what are the third. If the figures given in the Report do not show the actual requirements I think it is due to the public that they should show what the actual requirements are.

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The figures referred to in this question are averages and not, as the Honourable Member seems to indicate, requirements at all. They are average figures and they are statistics. In regard to the request made that the requirements should be shown I think it is extremely difficult to make any promise with regard to that because the matter is a very complicated one depending on the time tables of all the different railways all over India and it is very difficult to lump the whole thing together and say that so many carriages are required. However the suggestion will be considered.

CAPITAL GRANT SPENT IN ENGLAND.

206. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to the answer given on 6th September 1922 to starred question No. 20, will Government kindly state why loss by exchange cannot properly be taken as expenditure in England?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The so-called losses by exchange represent the additional rupees required to meet the sterling expenditure of the Government of India as compared with the number of rupees which would be required at the standard rate of 2 shillings adopted in the accounts. They involve not an additional amount of sterling expenditure but the finding of a larger number of rupees to meet a given outgoing in sterling.

and are therefore correctly classed as rupee expenditure. Indeed they could not be brought to account in sterling at all.

PRINTING PRESSES ON RAILWAYS.

207. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly state whether the Eastern Bengal, the East Indian the Bengal Nagpur, the Great Indian Peninsula and the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railways have each a separate printing press where they get their printing done, or there are two combined presses, one at Calcutta for the Calcutta railways, and one at Bombay for the Bombay railways?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Eastern Bengal Railway, the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway each have their own Press. The Bengal Nagpur Railway and the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway get their printing done by private firms.

DEPRECIATION FUND ON THE GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY.

208. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly state whether the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, during the period of its existence as a guaranteed railway Company was under its contract or otherwise, required to, and did, maintain out of revenue a depreciation fund and if so, how were the monies in that fund utilised when the line was purchased by the State?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company was not under the terms of its contract required to maintain out of revenue a depreciation fund but did as a matter of fact establish a reserve fund from 1868 to 1875 when that fund was closed.

The fund had disappeared long before the line was purchased by Government.

Mr. K. Ahmed: How were those monies in the depreciation fund utilized?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I am not in a position to give a detailed answer to a question like that relating to a period between 1868 and 1875.

INTEREST ON UNPRODUCTIVE CAPITAL COST OF RAILWAYS.

209. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly state whether any credit is received on account of interest on that portion of the capital cost of the railways which was left unproductive by dismantlement?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Interest on that portion of the capital cost of a railway which is left unproductive by dismantlement and which is allowed to remain in the capital account is treated in the same manner as interest on the rest of the capital outlay, i.e., in the case of company-worked railways, for instance, the interest on such capital also is generally treated as a first charge on the net earnings of the railway prior to the calculation of surplus profits.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask whether this burden was not borne by the Indian revenues whereas it ought to have fallen on the English revenues?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: If the Honourable Member will specify any particular case we will have the matter looked into, but I am not able to reply to a general proposition.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: There is no particular case. I am asking whether the interest on the capital lying idle on account of railways materials sent to Mesopotamia and other war areas was borne by the Indian or English revenues. The particulars of railways from which materials were taken are best known to Government.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I should like to have notice of that question.

RAILWAY COMPANIES' RESPONSIBILITIES AND OBLIGATIONS.

210. Mr. N. M. Joshi: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the following observation which, according to a telegram appearing in the Pioneer of the 7th December 1922, occurs in the judgment delivered on the 5th idem by Mr Justice Countts Trotter in the suit brought by Mr. E. Mack against the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway Company claiming damages for personal injury sustained by him on the Nellore Railway platform on the night of the 29th August 1921 owing to his falling into an unprotected and unlighted pit:

"I think the history of the whole case discloses lamentable failure on the part of the Company to realise their responsibilities and obligations."

(b) If so, will any portion of expenditure in connection with the suit fall on Government either directly or indirectly, and if so, why?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Yes.

(b) The expenditure incurred in connection with the case referred to will in accordance with the terms of the contract with the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway Company, be charged against the working expenses of the railway in which Government are directly interested.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Has Government taken any steps with regard to what has been pronounced in the judgment mentioned in the question with a view to bringing the obligations and responsibilities of the Company and their officers home to them?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Government of India have asked for a report from the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway, in regard to this matter.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: And when the report is received will the Government lay it on the table here?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I am not prepared to make any promise with regard to that.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

FURLOUGH AND LEAVE REGULATIONS ON RAILWAYS.

88. Mr. S. O. Shahani: (1) Are the Government aware of the differences in the furlough and leave regulations between the European and Indian officers, still in force on some of the Company Railways in India?

(2) Is it not a fact that Government owns the largest share (nearly nine-tenths) of the capital invested in the Indian Railways?

(3) Will Government be pleased to state whether these Railways in question have been addressed in the matter.

(4) If not, do the Government propose to address these Companies re the elimination of all the differences between Europeans and Indians?

(5) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the leave regulations in force on the different Company Railways in India?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: 1 and 2. The answer is in the affirmative:

3 and 4. Certain fundamental leave rules were drawn up many years ago, within the provisions of which companies may prescribe their own leave rules. A modification of the fundamental leave rules for company-worked railways is now under consideration in connection with the Government Fundamental rules recently sanctioned. As the Honourable Member is no doubt aware these Government rules do not provide for absolute equality in leave rules for European-appointed and Indian-appointed staff.

5. Each railway has its own leave rules and copies are not available.

POSTAL AND TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENTS.

89. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: (a) What was the object of amalgamation of the postal and telegraph departments? Was there any surplus over expenditure in these departments at the time of this amalgamation? If so, what was the surplus of receipts over expenditure in each case?

(b) Will Government kindly furnish a statement showing the strength of the Directorate with salaries in each department, (1) in the pre-amalgamation days, (2) its strength three years after the amalgamation, (3) its strength six years after it, and its strength now?

(c) Is it not a fact that the postal department used to leave a large surplus year after year, and that its surpluses have vanished since the amalgamation?

(d) Will Government kindly furnish a comparative statement showing the travelling allowance paid to the telegraphic offices of the Directorate two years before the amalgamation, and the travelling allowance paid to the same offices during the past two years?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The necessary information is being collected and will be supplied as soon as it is available.

PAY OF POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

90. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: When was increase of pay, if any, granted in recent years to the officers and subordinates of the postal department on account of economic distress? Was any increase granted then to the Deputy and Assistant Post Master Generals? If not, why not?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: With very few exceptions, the revisions of the scales of pay of officers and subordinates of the Postal Branch of the Post and Telegraph Department which have recently been sanctioned in recognition of the increase in the cost of living have been given effect to from the 1st December, 1919. No actual increase of pay has been sanctioned in the case of Deputy Postmasters-General, but they have now been placed on a time-scale. There is no such class of officials as Assistant Postmasters-General. If the Honourable Member is referring to Assistant Directors General of the Post Office the preceding remarks with regard to Deputy Postmasters-General apply also in their case.

JUVENILE COURTS.

91. Mr. J. N. Basu: Has the Government of India asked the local Governments in India and Burma to expedite the establishment of Juvenile Courts and if so, what steps have been taken by such Governments in the matter?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Government of India are about to communicate their views on Chapter XV of the report of the Jail's Committee which deals inter alia with the subject-matter of the Honourable Member's question. I will show the Honourable Member a copy of the letter when it has issued and if he or any other Honourable Member so desires, will place a copy on the table of the House.

RATES AND FARES ON E. I. RAILWAY.

92. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly state whether it was ever suggested during the pre-war period either by Government or by the Company, that in view of the very low ratio of working expenses to gross earnings which obtained on the East Indian Railway during that period, the rates and fares on that Railway should be reduced, and if so, what were the reasons for the suggestion not being adopted?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Yes. The question was raised in 1912, by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, but the Government of India decided that they would not depart from the policy which had obtained in the past, viz., that uniform minimum mileage rates should be applicable to all important Indian Railways.

WORK AND COST OF COMMITTEES.

93. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to page 39 of the Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume III, will Government lay on the table a copy of the final report of the Staff Selection Board Committee?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The report in question has not yet been submitted to Government.

AHMADPUR-KATWA RAILWAY.

94. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly state the circumstances which led to a reduction in the working expenses of the Ahmadpur-Katwa Railway from Rs. 1,17,799 in 1918-1919 to Rs. 75,726 in 1919-1920?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The reduction was due chiefly to the transfer of interest charges on temporary loans from "working expenses" to "Net Revenue Account," and to a small extent to less expenditure on maintenance and on working expenses.

PRICES OF COAL.

95. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to appendix 15 of the Railway Administration Report for 1920-21, will Government kindly state on what principle a differentiation is made in pricing coal as between the East Indian Railway on the one hand and the Great Indian Peninsula and the North Western Railways on the other and in what part of the railway budget the transactions of State Collieries are shown?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The output of collieries on the North-Western Railway is priced at rate based on the calorific value of Bengal coal delivered in Quetta District, and the net results of working the collieries, whether profit or loss, are adjusted annually against the working expenses of the railway. Similarly the Great Indian Peninsula Railway charge actual working expenses and credit the output at estimated rate based on the value of the coal. The differences are charged against the working expenses of the railway. There is therefore no difference in principle as between the method employed on these lines and the East Indian Railway.

The transactions of State collieries are included in the figures for stores transactions given in the budget of individual railways.

DEPARTURES FROM RAILWAY RATES AND FARES.

96. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly lay on the table a statement showing sanctioned departures from the railway rates and fares shown in public tariffs?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: A statement showing the information so far as Government are aware, is being sent to the Honourable Member.

RETIREMENTS ON RAILWAYS.

97. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly lay on the table a statement showing by railways the number of officers in the superior grades of the different departments due to retire under the age rule or otherwise on or before 31st December 1923?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: A statement is placed on the table giving the information desired by the Honourable Member so far as State Railways are concerned.

Railway Companies do not adopt uniform age rules for the retirement of their officers and Government have no information regarding impending retirements of Companies' staff.

Statement showing the number of officers in the superior grades of the different departments on State Railways due to retire under the age rule or otherwise on or before 31st December 1923.

CARRIAGE OF COAL.

98. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to the answer given on 6th September 1922 to starred question No. 25, will Government kindly lay on the table a comparative statement showing the rates charged for the carriage of public coal and railway coal; and state:

- (a) Whether any actual calculations have been made to show that the net effect of adopting tariff rates for railway coal will not bring in an increased share of surplus profit to the State?
- (b) Whether the favourable rate applies only to State-owned railways, or also to railways owned by Indian States, Private Companies, District Boards, etc.?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The Honourable Member is referred to the East Indian Railway Coal Tariff in which the schedule of rates for public and railway coal on that railway will be found and also full information about the rates charged on other principal railways.

- (a) Such calculations would be extremely complicated owing to the varying proportions in which the surplus profits are divided between Government and the Companies under their contracts and Government do not consider that the results of such calculations would be a conclusive guide to policy in this matter in view of the reasons given in the answer to the Honourable Member's question on 6th September.
- (b) The Honourable Member is referred to the first portion of the reply.

MEANS OF COMMUNICATION ON RAILWAYS.

99. Mr. N. M. Joshi: (a) With reference to appendix 19 of the Railway Administration Report for 1920-21, will Government kindly state whether they have relaxed the limit of two years fixed in paragraph 5 of appendix 42 to the Railway Administration Report, 1906, for the provision of all carriages with means of communication between passengers and railway servants, and if so, lay a copy of the orders on the table?

(b) Is the cost of this provision paid out of revenue or out of capital funds and in the former case what steps, if any, are proposed to be taken with reference to the adjustment of arrears on the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways whose contracts expire during the next few years?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: (a) Yes. The procedure suggested by the Honourable Member involves printing the orders in the Council proceedings and with a view to avoid extra printing charges I am arranging to furnish him with a copy of the orders.

(b) The provision of intercommunication apparatus is a charge to Capital funds.

ANNUITIES IN PURCHASE.

100. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to page 146 of the Government of India Finance and Revenue Accounts for 1919-20, will Government kindly state what the item "contribution towards management, etc.", under Annuities in Purchase exactly represents?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Government having purchased a portion of the annuities of some railways, is liable to contribute rateably with other annuitants towards the management, etc., of the annuity fund. The item referred to by the Honourable Member represents the expenditure relating to this liability.

HAULAGE OF POSTAL VANS.

101. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to page 20 of the Railway Administration Report for 1913-14, will Government kindly state what increase, if any, has since been made in the haulage charge of postal vans?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: No increase has since been made but a proposal for an increase is under consideration.

COMPENSATION FOR INCOME-TAX ON E. I. RAILWAY.

102. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government state the circumstances which led to compensation for income-tax being paid to deferred annuitants in the East Indian Railway and the basis of the division of surplus profits being altered with effect from 1st January 1920?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Provision was made for payment of compensation to the Deferred Annuitants on account of income-tax in certain eventualities with a view to protecting them from loss which they might sustain during the currency of the revised contract owing to non-receipt of the abatement of income-tax which is allowed to Ordinary Annuitants on portion of their annuity representing instalment in repayment of capital.

The alteration in the basis of the division of surplus profits was made in order to secure more favourable terms to the Secretary of State than under the old contract, in view of the renewal of the contract for a further period of 5 years with effect from 1st January 1920.

SUPERIOR POSTS ON RAILWAYS.

103. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly lay on the table a statement showing the names of the non-Indians appointed on railways to vacancies or to new posts in the superior service since 1st April 1922, and which of the appointments were made by public advertisement?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: A statement is laid on the table. The information regarding Companies' Lines is not available.

Names.	Appointment.	REMARKS.
R. J. Earle	Assistant Executive Engineer.	Appointed by Secretary of State.
J. D. Michael	Ditto	Ditto.
T. G. Creighton	Assistant Locomotive Superintendent.	Ditto.
G. W. Browne	Ditto	Ditto.
O. R. Tucker	Ditto	Ditto.
T. H. B. Jones	Ditto	Ditto.
W. Leach	Works Manager, Carriage and Wagon Shop.	Ditto.
C. E. Dickens	Assistant Signal Engineer	Ditto.
C. H. Griffiths	Ditto	Ditto.
H. B. Adams	Assistant Electrical Engineer.	Appointed by Railway Board in India
A. F. Hewlett	Assistant Locomotive Superintendent.	Promoted from the Subordinate to Establishment.
H. A. Tuck	Assistant Signal Engineer	Ditto.

Note.—Appointments by the Secretary of State are made on the advice of a Selection Committee or of the Consulting Engineers to the Secretary of State, who consider applications called for by advertisement ordinarily.

SURPLUS PROFITS ON RAILWAYS.

104. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to column 2 of the statement of surplus profits paid to railway companies accompanying the Budget for 1922-23, will Government kindly state why the "actuals for 1920-21" do not appear against that year in the "History of Indian Railways"?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The matter can best be explained by an illustration. In 1919-20 the Bengal Nagpur Railway Company's share of the surplus profits of that year was Rs. 14,63,387 and the Company showed that amount in its accounts. This amount therefore was quite correctly shown as the Company's share of surplus profits in the year 1919-20. But the Company's share was actually paid in 1920-21 and the payment therefore was shown in the budget against that year.

PURCHASE OF G. I. P. RAILWAY BY STATE.

105. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to the answer given on 8th September 1922 to unstarred question No. 150:

- (a) Is it a fact that the purchase of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway was fixed exclusively on the basis of the market value of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company's capital stock and that the cost of land was not a factor which had any influence in determining the price;
- (b) What were the names of the old guaranteed Companies who were provided with lands free of cost;
- (c) Was not a separate account of the cost of lands maintained such as is now done in connection with lands provided for Branch line Companies?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The answer is in the affirmative. The cost of land was not therefore a factor affecting the price.

(b) The old Guaranteed Railway Companies provided with land free of cost were as follows:

- (1) East Indian Railway.
- (2) Eastern Bengal Railway.
- (3) Scindhe Punjab and Delhi Railway.
- (4) Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway.
- (5) South Indian Railway.
- (6) Great Indian Peninsula Railway.
- (7) Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway.
- (8) Madras Railway.

(c) Separate subsidiary accounts of the cost of lands made over to each Guaranteed Railway Company free of cost were maintained during the existence of these railways as such. With the purchase of each Guarantee Railway, however, the maintenance of the subsidiary accounts was discontinued.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. Deputy President: The House will now proceed with the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act of 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

The amendment moved is:

"To clause 19, add the following clause:

"(ii) Clause (f) shall be omitted."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Munshi Iswar Saran proposes to exclude from our Code the provision which lays down that if a man is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security a hazard to the community, then he may be placed upon security. The House will remember that in arguing his case he placed considerable reliance upon the judgment of Mr. Justice Straight. Now, I may tell the House at once that that judgment was not applicable at all to the Code as it now stands. This particular provision of law, namely, section 110 (f) was originally in our Code in 1872. It did not appear in our Code of 1882, but its absence was felt to be so disastrous that it was re-included in 1898. Mr. Justice Straight's judgment refers to the Code of 1882, in which this particular section did not then find a place. The only provision of the Code at that time was as follows.

"Whenever a Presidency Magistrate, a District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class specially empowered in this behalf by the Local Government receives information that any person within the local limits of his jurisdiction is an habitual robber, house-breaker or thief, or an habitual receiver of stolen property knowing the same to be stolen, or habitually commits extortion or, in order to commit extortion, puts or attempts to put anybody in fear of injury," then security could be taken from him.

The Honourable Member quoted the remarks of the District Magistrate and the facts do not seem to have been seriously in dispute, that Babua was a notorious badmash, an extortionist, a concocter of false cases as a means of extorting money and altogether a terror to the town of Mirzapur. Well, if those remarks prove anything at all, they prove, as I have said, that it was very unfortunate that a provision corresponding to 110 (f) did not find a place in the Code of 1882. If it had stood in the Code at the time then Babua could have been held to security; and everyone will admit that the whole tenour of the judgment which Mr. Iswar Saran read out to us proves that it was highly desirable that Babua should have been held to security. If therefore the judgment that Mr. Iswar Saran read out to us proves anything, it proves that the case he put before the Assembly for the exclusion of this section is an exceedingly bad one. I do not go into the further technical grounds argued in that judgment, because, as I have said before, it is quite inapplicable to our present Code.

Now, as to the question of substance Mr. Iswar Saran says that we have extended the scope of section 110. How far have we done so? We have included the forger; we have included the abettor, though there were certain Members of the Assembly who thought that the abettor should be protected; we have included the abductor, whose presence in the Code now we owe to the kindly offices of Mr. Agnihotri; and we have included the kidnapper, in spite of the tender solicitude of Mr. Kabir-ud-Din Ahmed. That is the extent to which we have extended the section, and I defy Mr. Iswar Saran to argue with any show of truth that by this restricted extension of the section we have made it possible for a Magistrate to place on security a man who is dangerous and hazardous to the community, without some specific provision and law to this effect. In any case I claim that the limited extension that we have now given to the section is not a matter so important that it should be used to our prejudice and quoted as an argument for the exclusion of this particular kind of character from the provisions of section 110. For what is the kind of man of which the Code is thinking? He is known to consort with robbers and dacoits. And yet you cannot prove under sub-section (a) that he is himself by habit a house-breaker. He is well known to have desperate associates, men engaged in crimes against life and property, and yet you cannot prove under sub-section (b) that he is himself a habitual receiver of stolen property or that he habitually harbours thieves. But every respectable person in the village is in perpetual terror lest he should bring his associates down upon them. He is a man who seduces women or corrupts the morality of children, yet that does not make him either a kidnapper or abettor within the terms of our law, and you cannot bring him within the provisions of clause (d). A violent character of this type, well known as such in the neighbourhood, and a standing terror to his neighbours, he can trespass on their lands, he can raise forced loans, damage their crops, and yet nobody can complain against him, for they are afraid to do so, and you cannot therefore prove under clause (e) that he habitually commits or abets the commission of offences involving a breach of the peace. That is not a fancy picture. Everybody knows the man who is the terror of the village or his quarter, the man whom you would prosecute if you could under a particular charge, whom the whole community would be glad to see away from the place, and yet whom you cannot hold under any particular provision of the law because people are afraid to bring cases against him. They will not do so themselves, but are only too glad when we step in to aid them with the preventive sections; but if we are to do so, it is difficult to put the information against him under any clause other than clause (f) of section 110. When Mr. Iswar Saran was arguing his case, I heard somebody behind him whisper the word "Goonda". A happy thought for the legislation that has recently been put forward in Bengal and accepted gladly by public opinion in Calcutta proves conclusively that you have to provide by special means for people of this class. He animadverted on the fact that the definition of 110 (f) was a wide one; I maintain that it gets as near as any definition can to the real and essential facts. What has Bengal had to do in the way of definition? Bengal had to deal with cases of this kind, and provide for men who are a terror to the community. The class of persons they were thinking of was the type of character that is referred to in numerous examples that were quoted to us by the Bengal Government. Here are some. I will give the House only bare details, and will suppress the illustrious names of those who are mentioned in this catalogue of notabilities:

"He is a terror to the locality and has great influence over low class people. His men have committed assaults on police officers but the cases failed for want of evidence. He associates with persons who commit serious crimes such as robbery, dacoity and murder, and it is believed that he bears the cost of defence in cases in which they are concerned."

Take another:

"He has a cocaine den. Three prosecutions have, however, failed against him. He adopted the same ingenious device of electrifying his staircase, thereby preventing access to it on the part of the police."

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

Here is another:

"He formerly belonged to a wellknown gang of thieves. He has five mistresses with whom he lives in . . . street. He is a notorious gambler and has numbers of bad characters under his control."

Now, those are the classes of persons for whom Bengal had to make provision. They put forward a special Act, and I ask the House to note how they propose to define these persons. I commend the definition particularly to Mr. Iswar Saran. They call it Goondas Bill, and the definition they use is: "Goonda includes hooligan or other ruffian." Is that more restricted or more precise than our 110 (f)? Could all their legal ingenuity devise any more suitable terms than we have hitherto used for providing against the class of men whom Mr. Iswar Saran would now exclude from the purview of section 110? But enough; I am sure that the House really realizes the necessity of providing against this class of persons, that it will have every sympathy for the villagers who are terrified and with townspeople who are continually held in apprehension of their lives and property by hired bravos and miscellaneous ruffians; and that it will not agree with Mr. Iswar Saran.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammedan Urban): Sir, I quite understand, though I do not fully appreciate Munshi Iswar Saran's desire to exclude this sturdy and amiable body of citizens from the purview of section 110. If we had not 158 clauses of the Bill still to dispose of, and if great economy of time was not imperative, mild excitements like what my friend from time to time provides might have been acceptable. As it is, it is hardly possible to take him seriously with regard to his contention that a desperate and dangerous character should not be even called upon to show cause as to why he should not execute security and promise to be of good behaviour. As has been pointed out by Sir Malcolm Hailey, the judgment that Munshi Iswar Saran referred to has reference to a state of things with which we have nothing to do at the present moment. Furthermore, Sir, that judgment laid considerable and very correct stress upon the fact that the Magistrate in dealing with the case had imported into it considerations within his own knowledge and what he had found out by private inquiry—an extremely improper thing for any Magistrate to have done—and the judgment was rightly set aside. However, that state of things does not exist. As has been pointed out, the omission from an earlier Code was found to be intolerable and had to be re-introduced. Mr. Mukherjee, I believe a fellow-sufferer in Calcutta, reminded the House about the Calcutta Goonda, and Sir Malcolm Hailey has given us some illustrations of the sort of things that Calcutta is suffering from, and Calcutta suffers although section 110 is there. Calcutta Magistrates and the Calcutta Police found that all the supposed arbitrary power provided in section 110 (f) is powerless against the Goonda. I am glad to see from the papers, the Select Committee's report, that those who are opposing the Goonda Bill have been able to evolve a modus operandi by which all objections will be met and Calcutta will have a Goonda Act of its own. The result will be that some of the Mirzapore animals will have to come back home and give occupation to Munshi Iswar Saran in his province. Whether he will want this to be relaxed or more tightened will be a matter for him and the United Provinces Government to decide. (A Voice: "They will suffer".) It does not appear that the United Provinces with its sturdy optimism and muscle powers is in the same trouble as the Bengalee who wants a special Goonda Act. Even section 110 (f) and the Goonda Act will by themselves not solve the problem and public co-operation is needed there. The ingenuity, the resources, and the masterful activity of this class of people is beyond imagination, and great care is needed to stamp out Hooliganism. I do not think the position of the Government and the Police and of society should be weakened by taking away what has been found imperatively necessary to be brought back.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): Sir, I think this amendment should not be accepted. It serves a distinct purpose and applies to cases of persons who have lost all regard for the safety, well-being and decency of their fellow creatures living in their neighbourhood. A person of desperate and dangerous character means a person who has a reckless disregard of the safety of the person or property of his neighbours. It cannot be maintained that such persons do not exist in our society. There are men in some localities whose business it is to create trouble for some of their neighbours by habitually provoking false or frivolous investigations, or who are desperate in their efforts to poison cattle by various devices such as by mixing something poisonous with their food, or who habitually or out of sheer mischief try to render injurious the water of wells here and there, or who habitually try to render unconscious for a little while persons with a view to take some mean advantage of them such as robbing them, or who habitually try to intimidate or terrorise people by threats or indecent speeches or songs, or by invoking the aid of religious, superstitious or social customs, or by simply preying on the ignorance of the people in various ways, or who even try to spoil the morals of some young men and women in some places. Well, Sir, it goes without saying that there should be some legal provision for bringing such persons to book. It is to meet such cases, Sir, that clause (f) exists and should exist. There seems to be nothing in the preceding clauses to meet such cases.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That to clause 19 add the following sub-clause:

(iii) The word 'or' at the end of clause (e) and the whole of clause (f) shall be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: Mr. K. Ahmed.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Might I rise to a point of order before this amendment* is moved? I merely wish to bring to your notice that it refers to section 112. Section 112 does not form part of the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Rural): May I be permitted to address you on that point because I have also got a similar amendment? The objection taken, Sir, is that this clause does

* "After clause 19 insert the following clause:

'19-A. In section 112 of the said Code for the words 'setting forth the substance of the information received' the words 'expressly specifying the particulars of the information received under section 107, section 108, section 109 or section 110' shall be substituted'."

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

not relate to any of the clauses in the Bill. That is quite true, but, Sir, the rule by which we are to be guided is a rule relating to amendments which says, they must be relevant to the scope of the Bill. I will find out the exact rule I have in mind; in the meantime I will refer to May's "Parliamentary Practice."

On page 364 it says:

"To explain the principles that govern the proposal of instructions to committees of the whole house, it must be borne in mind that, under the parliamentary usage in force in former times, an amendment might be wholly irrelevant to the motion or bill to which it was proposed, and that consequently clauses might be added to a bill during its progress through the house relating to any matters however various and unconnected, whether with one another or with the bill originally drawn. A reaction from such laxity of procedure led to the establishment of rules and practice which imposed on the House of Commons an inconvenient rigidity in dealing with a bill. No amendment could be moved which was not strictly within the scope of the prefatory paragraph, known as the title, which is prefixed to every bill and describes its object and scope. To obviate the difficulty thus created, the house, in 1854, by standing order No. 34, gave a general instruction to all committees of the whole house to which bills were committed, which empowered them to make such amendments therein as they should think fit, provided that the amendments were relevant to the subject matter of the bill; and, if such amendments were not within the title of the bill, the title was to be amended and reported specially to the house."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Will you kindly read the Standing Order No. 34, on page 815, of the book?

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Will the Honourable Member read further on the few lines at the bottom of the next paragraph?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I will come to that; it says:

"An instruction is necessary to enable a committee to divide a bill into two or more bills, to consolidate two bills into one bill, or to give priority to the consideration of a portion of a bill, with power to report the same separately to the house."

"Instructions have been given to committees of the whole house, on the presentation of a petition, empowering the committee to hear counsel and examine witnesses."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Standing Order is on page 815; it will make the matter quite clear. Standing Order No. 34.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: And the last paragraph on page 365.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Reading Standing Order):

"It shall be an instruction to all committees of the whole house to which bills may be committed, that they have power to make such amendments therein as they shall think fit, provided they be relevant to the subject-matter of the bill."

And what is meant by the subject-matter of the Bill? We have to come back to page 364, where it is stated:

"No amendment could be moved which was not strictly within the scope of the prefatory paragraph, known as the title, which is prefixed to every bill and describes its object and scope."

That is what I rely upon. Now the object and scope of this Bill has to be gathered from its history. This is a Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, not certain sections thereof. This is a Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it will be seen, Sir, that almost every Chapter in the Code, including the Schedules, have come under revision in this Bill. If you will also look into the history of it, you will see that a very influential Committee was appointed to go through the whole Code, and I may refer to the Statement of Objects and Reasons to which is annexed the report of this Committee, which is known as the Lowndes Committee. The Government of India, by a Resolution dated 18th September 1916, had under consideration for some time past the question of the general revision of the Code. The amending Bill was introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council on the 21st March, 1914, and was thereafter referred to Local Governments and Administrations. Meanwhile, the Governor General in Council decided to remit the Bill and the various opinions received in connection with it to a small Committee on which the legal profession was strongly represented.

I say they appointed that Committee to go through the whole Code and to go through all the suggestions received from the various Local Governments as regards the amendments noted in that Chapter. They took up Chapter after Chapter and suggestion after suggestion. They considered what would be necessary to be introduced and what would not be necessary to be introduced. Therefore, they paid attention to all the sections of the Code and came to the conclusion that these amendments were needed. Therefore, this Bill comes before us as a result of the labours of that Committee, and its object and scope is certainly to revise the Code, to see what portions may remain as they are and what portions should be amended. The Committee left certain sections as they are because they thought that no amendments were needed, but this House is certainly competent, when the object is to revise the Code, to consider whether their decision, namely, that certain sections should remain as they are, is correct or not. Therefore, Sir, I think that, having regard to the title of the Bill and having regard to the scope of this revision which we have now undertaken, it should be competent for this House to deal with other sections of the Code, because they are part of the Code. It may be mentioned, perhaps, that, on a former occasion, when an attempt was made to introduce a new clause in connection with the Land Acquisition Bill, the Honourable the President suggested—he did not exactly rule—that it was outside the scope of the Bill and advised me not to press my motion. That is quite true.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): May I correct the Honourable Member, Sir. The President distinctly ruled the amendment out of order on the ground of practice.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The Honourable Member will remember that I raised the point against myself, because I knew that the scope of that Bill was not as its preamble indicated. I was quite convinced that the preamble was incorrectly worded in connection with that Bill and I raised the point myself. Now, this is quite a different case from the Land Acquisition Bill. That Bill was merely to amend a particular provision in the Land Acquisition Act and there was no such revision undertaken as in this case. The Bill was not the result of the deliberations of a Committee which sat to revise the whole Code. Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith will remember also that the President gave a warning to the Government that in cases where they wanted to restrict the scope of a Bill they should take care to see that the title was properly worded. He gave that warning, Sir, because he said the title is the guiding principle. He added "if you put your title so generally, I will be obliged to admit amendments." That is what the President said, at least that is my recollection of it. Therefore, the Government have not taken that warning in this case. The Bill, here, is to amend the Code. The Code consists of all its sections and Schedules, and, therefore, I ask you, Sir, to rule the amendment in order.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I should have been content to avoid a discussion on this point and to leave it with the brief remark which I addressed to the Chair, in the full confidence that you, Sir, would have been in a position from your own study of the Home procedure to give a decision without further argument. But, further argument has been indulged in, and I must meet one aspect of it in particular, for I think that, unwittingly no doubt, Mr. Rangachariar has misled the House. At my request he read Standing Order 34 of the House of Commons. I will repeat it:

"It shall be an instruction to all Committees of the whole House to which Bills may be committed that they have power to make such amendments there as they shall think fit, provided they be relevant to the subject matter of the Bill."

Mr. Rangachariar proceeded to interpret for us the words "subject matter of the Bill." He said that the subject matter of a Bill was—and I will use his actual words—"decided by the title," and he quoted to us these words from May:

"No amendment could be moved which was not strictly within the scope of the prefatory paragraph, known as the title, prefixed to every Bill, to describe its object and scope."

But I ask the House to realize that the words which he quoted from May refer specifically to the previous state of things which existed before Standing Order 34 was passed? It was precisely that state of things which Standing Order 34 was passed to rectify. I say that, unwittingly, he has misled the House in that respect. In other words the House of Commons decided itself that the title was not decisive and that no amendments should be introduced which did not come strictly within the prescription that they were relevant to the subject matter of the Bill. Mr. Rangachariar has argued from the title of our Bill, and has quoted to us, the manner in which the whole of this legislation came to be initiated. He points to the fact that various Committees sat in order to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure at large. That might be, Sir, but the legislation that has been placed before the House refers to particular chapters and sections of the Code. We have not set out here actually to amend the whole of the Code. He himself referred, at the beginning of our discussion, to the fact that there are many points, such as the Racial Distinctions sections and the like, which have still to be amended. Mr. Chaudhuri again referred to the fact that, when the separation of executive and judicial functions takes place, other amendments of the Code will be necessary. Obviously and clearly the case as placed before the Legislature refers to the particular sections of the Code which find a place in the Bill, and we have not placed before the House the whole Code for the purposes of amendment or modification.

I must once more refer to the discussions in regard to the Land Acquisition Bill. Mr. Rangachariar, doing himself full justice, as I admit, says that he himself pointed out to the President the difficulty arising from the title of the Bill, and expressed doubts whether an amendment then proposed was actually in order, in spite of the wide title of the Land Acquisition Amendment Bill. It is as well that I should read to the House the ruling of the President in order that it may be under no misapprehension. The President said :

"The amendment moved by the Honourable Member on my left is undoubtedly within the title of the Bill as drawn, and yet it is equally undoubtedly outside the scope of the substance of the Bill, which provides for an appeal to the Privy Council. Therefore, on the ground of practice, I think I am bound to rule it out of order. At the same time I suggest to the Government that it will be wise to protect themselves by seeing that the title of a Bill is not wider than its substance."

That is the suggestion made to us, and it was obviously made only in order so to regulate our titles as to prevent amendments such as those now put forward by Mr. Ahmed and supported by Mr. Rangachariar from being put before the House. It is a suggestion and no more.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Suggestion for what purpose?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: A suggestion, in order that Honourable Members should not be misled by the title into thinking that this necessarily was conclusion as to the subject matter of the Bill. I would remind the Honourable Member that that suggestion was put before us by the President in March 1921, and at that time the title of our Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill had already been settled and published. If that suggestion had been before us at the time, we should then no doubt have been warned and amended the title of the Bill. But the title, Sir, is not the decisive factor, as the Standing Order of the House of Commons shows.

Mr. Deputy President: With regard to this question as to whether the whole Code of Criminal Amendment is open to amendment during the consideration of this Bill, my ruling is that it is not. No amendment is permissible in the course of the consideration of the present Bill which is irrelevant or foreign to or outside the scope of the subject-matter of this Bill. In the case of the present amendment, although it proposes to amend a section of the Code which is not touched by the Bill, I think it might be held not to be inadmissible under the ruling which I have just given, as it is intimately connected with other sections which are being amended. In this particular case, therefore, I allow the amendment to be moved.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move:

"That after clause 19, insert the following clause:

'19-A. In section 112 of the said Code for the words 'setting forth the substance of the information received' the words 'expressly specifying the particulars of the information received under section 107, section 108, section 109 or section 110' shall be substituted'."

Sir, Magistrates very frequently violate the provisions of these sections by merely stating the words of the section instead of specifying the substance of it. The information received is one thing, and specifying something is different. But if it is specifically set out what is the substance of the information, then the Magistrate is not entitled or not in a position to receive any additional information with regard to any number of particulars which the Sub-Inspector of Police, specially in the mofussil, often seeks to do.

As to the majority of big cases, if statistics are being taken over the whole of India, I am positive that in prosecutions under section 110, from 500 to 700 witnesses are examined and still the poor man against whom the prosecution is launched suffers. The police ask anybody and everybody to say that this man is bad or that man is bad, and the Government very often repents because the Sub-Inspector of Police, who is supposed to be second to God, is not able to make out a good case. So he says 'In the first charge sheet that I submitted, I left out these particulars, and I want to try this man in any way I like. I will call him desperate, I will call him a liar, and at the same time I will call him a black-guard.' Witness after witness is brought in, no end of them,—you get any number of witnesses—with the result that the poor man cannot get out of the trap that has been placed for him.

We therefore want this part of the law should be specifically dealt with; once you file a plaint in the Civil Court, before a Munsiff, Sub-Judge, or the Original Side of the High Court, you cannot go back upon it; you cannot change the substance of the written statement you have made, or put in any additional points. I am sorry to say that at present the Police is Almighty and many Honorary Magistrates present in this Assembly are very fond of giving indulgence to the Sub-Inspector of Police to the extent of allowing any number of witnesses and any amount of searches to be made. That being so, I think it necessary to move this amendment in order to remedy this defect so that the Sub-Inspector must expressly specify the charge, expressly particularise the charge he wishes to submit.

In this respect I cannot do better than quote the authority of my friend who is sitting in front of me—a learned Judge of the Madras High Court. My Honourable friend is here and I will take his learned ruling from I L. R. 48, at-page 450. My learned friend when he was on the Bench in 1919, only 3½ years ago, said,—the Honourable Mr. Justice Seshagiri Ayyar said:

"I am not sure that I understand this judgment. Section 110, clauses (a) to (e), speak of a man being a habitual robber, a habitual receiver of stolen property and a habitual harbourer of thieves, a habitual extortioner, or a habitual committer of breach of the peace. In my opinion, the evidence on which the Magistrate has to base his conclusion must relate to particular instances which have come to the knowledge of the deponent and so must be specific. Evidence relating to mere beliefs and opinions, without reference to acts or instances which have induced the witnesses to form the opinion, can hardly be regarded as established by the repetition of beliefs and opinions. At any rate, Courts ought to discard such evidence as much as possible."

That, Sir, comes from the mouth of a learned Judge of the Madras High Court Bench who had the opportunity of criticising the judgment of the Magistrate and criticising the manner in which the prosecution was conducted and in that the Almighty Sub-Inspector or the Court Inspector introduced evidence against this particular accused by bringing in additional points.

Now my Honourable friend, the Home Member, has been putting me out of order, at least he tried to do so—though he did not succeed—by a reference to the practice of the House of Commons. But fortunately the Deputy President has allowed me to move this amendment. As I have shown, learned Judges found out long ago that this sort of scope or latitude ought not to be given to the Sub-Inspector or the Court Inspector. Here, Sir, I want to quote the authority of a member of the Indian Civil Service who sat along with my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, in the case to which I have already referred. I mean Mr. Justice Moore. This is what his Lordship said:

"I am unable to agree with the District Magistrate that there is a large body of evidence regarding the petitioner's bad life, his habit of engineering crimes and his general desperate character.' The evidence on record does not warrant any such conclusion. The District Magistrate also says that there is evidence of witnesses who speak to 'definite acts of criminality on the part of the petitioner'. But I cannot find any definite evidence of any specific acts of violence committed by the petitioner. In my opinion the order requiring the petitioner to furnish security to be of good behaviour cannot be supported and should be set aside."

In the light of what I have said, and the opinions I have quoted from Mr. Justice Seshagiri Ayyar and Mr. Justice Moore, I hope that this Honourable House, consisting as it does of Members who represent the people of this country, will accept my amendment; and my Honourable friend who is piloting the Bill on behalf of Government will also accept it without any hesitation. I move the amendment which stands in my name.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I

12 Noon. am very grateful to the Honourable Member for reading to us the instructive judgment of my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, in the case in question, but I venture, Sir, to suggest that there is no reason whatsoever in the judgment which he read out to justify the change which he proposes in section 112 of the Code. The judgment, in fact, does not indicate that it is necessary that section 112 should be amended so as to require that in the preliminary order which is made under section 112 full particulars of the information which is received should be specified. It is clear, Sir, that the judgment in the case must be based upon evidence which is on the lines of the order framed under section 112. But how can we expect the Magistrate in framing this order to specify full particulars of the information in it? Sir, that is quite impossible. The object of section 112 is to give the accused notice of the accusation which has been made against him. It may be compared perhaps with other provisions in the Code such as sections 221, 222 dealing with warrant cases, and section 242 dealing with summons cases. Section 242 reads thus: "When the accused appears or is brought before the Magistrate, the particulars of the offence of which he is accused shall be stated to him and he shall be asked if he has any cause to show why he should not be convicted." Section 222 says that "the charge shall state the offence with which the accused is charged and it must contain such particulars as to the time and place of the alleged offence and the person (if any) against whom or the thing (if any) in respect of which it was committed, as are reasonably sufficient to give the accused notice of the matter with which he is charged". Now, Sir, how does section 112 read at present? It reads thus: "When a Magistrate acting under section 107, section 108, section 109 or section 110 deems it necessary to require any person to show cause under such section, he shall make an order in writing, setting forth the substance of the information received, the amount of the bond to be executed, the term for which it is to be in force and the number, character and class of sureties (if any) required". I suggest, Sir, that this is amply sufficient to give the person proceeded against notice of the information which has been received and which he has to produce evidence against.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan). Sir, I rise to support the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Kabir-ud-Din Ahmed. The object of section 112 is to call upon a person against whom the information has been received to show cause as to why he should not be bound over, and to give him the information of the materials of the report on which he is required to show cause. That is the object of section 112. Now as provided in section 112, it is that the substance of the information should be given to the person concerned, i.e., the person who is required to show cause. The "substance" of the information is by itself not quite sufficient and gives a wide scope to the Magistrates. He may give only a précis of the information that has been received by him or he may give the full details of the information that he has received or he may give only a summary of the information,—which he has received. Sometimes it happens in the mufassail courts that the Magistrates generally put down that 'you are required to show cause as to why you should not be bound over for keeping the peace or for good behaviour'. This by itself is not sufficient to enlighten the person concerned as to the particulars of the complaints in which he is required to show cause and the matters on which he is required to adduce evidence to rebut the prosecution or the police allegations. Therefore, in the interests of justice it is material and extremely important that the full particulars of the information before the Magistrate be given to the accused or the person who is required to show cause, so that on the date when he appears for showing cause he may be in a position to defend himself against the allegations made by the other side. Therefore, Sir, I submit that the amendment moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Kabir-ud-Din Ahmed, is of a wholesome nature and should be allowed.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muham-madan Rural): Sir, while we are on section 112 I wish to mention that I gave notice of an amendment for carrying out the suggestions of the Greaves' Committee, but I had a talk with Sir Malcolm Hailey with regard to the matter and he has promised to give me hearing in private and to discuss the matter with me and I quite appreciate the difficulty that the Home Member is in now. He has got 393 amendments to consider, so I do not wish to rush him and I accept his suggestion that I should have a talk with him in private and that, if he can accommodate me, I shall be at liberty to bring up this amendment later on. So you will kindly leave that open for the present.

Clause 19, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I beg leave to move the following amendment:

"Omit sub-clause (ii) of clause 20."

If the man has been brought up under arrest under section 110, it is very difficult for him especially in this cold winter, to be detained in the lock-up without having any surety of getting out of the jail and living comfortably outside. Sir, this question of furnishing sureties is a very difficult one, because if a person wants to get enlarged on surety, he will find, there will be a charge sheet against him submitted by the police. At the same time, he will have the opportunity, he will have time enough, Sir, to find sufficient funds to engage vakils, pleaders, mukhtars and barristers. That being so, Sir, it is in the interest of justice that these persons should be given a free hand in the matter of granting bail. Section 110 is a section which is called a preventive section. It is not a section that deals with the commission of an offence: it is preventive. It is aimed at ensuring that the man who has committed an offence under 110 may not in future commit any offence. A man must be very careful and if he is in the habit of committing certain offences, he must be careful at the same time to the amount of money for which he will be bound over or bound down to give surety to keep the peace and to be reasonable with regard to his behaviour and habits. Sir, if this man is taken straight to the jail or to the lock-up without having an opportunity or hope that he will be enlarged on bail, if this man is not in a position to give surety—the man has not committed any offence in the eye of the law—the object of section 110 is that he should be a reasonable neighbour, living in the locality so that he might not commit any offence to others living in the same village. If that question is before the Magistrate, to test the character of this man without getting evidence, he may be discharged later on, but why should his defence be hampered? Why should not sufficient opportunity be given to that poor unlucky man that he should be properly defended and that certain lawyers should be instructed on his behalf? Is not this an engine of oppression against this man before he takes his trial that he should be asked to give surety? This man has not committed any offence and if he did, he should have been punished a long time ago and that being the test, I do not see any reason why this man should be hampered in his defence by being asked to give surety for a certain amount, interfering with his liberty of engaging lawyers, interfering with his freedom and liberty to ask his villagers to stand by him and give testimony in his defence, that he is a good man and not as black as he is painted by the police. The police can do anything and everything. I do not like to show any wording of the judges showing that the police have acted not successfully in many cases particularly of this kind. Speaking from experience, I can say that there has been failure on the part of the police, very often. That being so, Sir, and for considerations of a common sense point of view, I do not think you should bind down a man without giving him proper latitude in substantiating his defence; it is interfering with the liberty of the subject. You want to take him straight to the lock-up. Thereby you interfere with his defence. Supposing he has got landed property and his money is not kept in cash and he wants to sell his property and realise money out of which he wishes to engage a lawyer and that lawyer should be properly instructed. The lawyer should be given an opportunity to equip himself with all the facts considering that the police are doing so much against him (the accused). The Sub-Inspector, Head Constable and the Superintendent of Police probably do not want the lawyer to defend the accused. They want him to take his trial and go to jail straight. There are hundreds of elephants upon which the prosecution witnesses generally come. I have seen two or three miles of area being covered by the police and this poor man is completely helpless. The men in the street can shout, but this man cannot utter a single word. For the ends of justice I think that the retention of this custody will hamper his trial and I hope that this sub-clause (ii) of clause 20 will be omitted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, so far as I understand the argument of the Honourable Member it is as follows. These provisions in the Code are preventive provisions. They are not punitive provisions. It is improper that a man should be sent straight to jail. It is improper that he should not be let out on bail. He ought to be able to consult his legal advisers and he should not be hampered in drawing up his defence. Well, Sir, that being the argument of the Honourable Member, I am exceedingly surprised that he has suggested the omission of this sub-clause. The object of this sub-clause is to do exactly what the Honourable Member wishes should be done. At the present time, Sir, under the proviso to section 114 of the Code, if there is any reason to fear the commission of a breach of the peace, and if such a breach of the peace cannot be prevented otherwise than by the immediate arrest of such person, the Magistrate may at any time issue a warrant for his arrest. Now, Sir, the Bill proposes, in this sub-clause to enable the Magistrate to let the accused out on bail. That being the object of this sub-clause and it being absolutely in conformity with the intentions of the Honourable Member who has moved this amendment, I do not think it is necessary to argue further against the suggestion to omit this sub-clause.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Where is the provision for bail? Is this the bail provision?

Mr. H. Tonkinson: It is this sub-clause.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"Omit sub-clause (ii) of clause 20."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I think, Sir, that this is the stage at which I should move my supplementary amendment* provided the Government do not object to it under your ruling and under Standing Order 40. It is supplementary amendment No. 5. This is the stage that it should come in. I pause for an announcement from the Government Bench as whether they object to this amendment or not.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If I am obliged to object to it, it is really in the interests of the House that I do so and not from any motives peculiar or particular to Government. I put it to the House that it has not had time to consider these supplementary amendments and it is inadvisable if only on that account that we should ask the President to utilise his special powers to admit them.

Mr. Deputy President: Under the ruling given by me I must rule it out of order.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I move the amendment[†] standing in Dr. Gour's name.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: As the Honourable Member has moved it without argument, I oppose it without argument.

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): Sir, the amendment that stands in my name runs as follows:

"In clause 20, sub-clause (ii), for the proviso (a) to the proposed sub-section (3) substitute the following:

'(a) No person under this sub-section shall be required to execute a bond for maintaining good behaviour if the notice issued to him under section 112 was to keep the peace nor can he be so required to keep the peace if the said notice was to maintain good behaviour.'

* "In clause 20, add the following paragraph at the end of section 117, sub-section (2):

"Provided that all inquiries under section 108 shall be held with the aid of a jury, as nearly as may be practicable, in the manner hereinafter provided for trials in a Court of Sessions with the aid of Jury."

† "In clause 27 (ii), in proposed sub-section (3), insert the word 'forthwith' before the words 'execute a bond'."

The clause I want to amend, as proposed in the Bill, runs as follows :

"No person against whom proceedings are not being taken under section 108, section 109, or section 110, shall be directed to execute a bond for maintaining good behaviour."

The clause as it stands, really speaking, recognises the principle which I want to lay down more clearly and definitely. Leaving out clauses 108, 109 and 110, the only clause that remains is 107 under which a person is required to keep the public peace. The clause as it stands means that if a person has been issued a notice to show cause why he should not be bound over to keep the peace, he shall not under this sub-section be required to execute a bond for maintaining good behaviour. I see no reason, Sir, why we should take only one side of the question and not both the sides. If a notice has been issued to a man to show cause why he should not be bound over to maintain good behaviour, why should the Magistrate go beyond the scope of the notice and ask him under this sub-section to keep the peace? As a matter of fact, Sir, these proceedings are intermediate proceedings during the pendency of a case. There is no reason why any more power should be given to the Magistrate than there exists under the terms of the notice. I may also submit, Sir, that under section 118, while finally ordering a person to give a security, it is laid down :

"If, upon such inquiry, it is proved that it is necessary, for keeping the peace or maintaining good behaviour, as the case may be, that the person in respect of whom the inquiry is made should execute a bond, with or without sureties, the Magistrate shall make an order accordingly :

Provided :

First, that no person shall be ordered to give security of a nature different from, or of an amount larger than, or for a period longer than, that specified in the order made under section 112 . . ."

Now, if under section 118 the Magistrate cannot order the accused, while deciding the case finally, to furnish a security of a different nature than he was required to do under the notice issued to him under section 112, there is no reason why in these intermediate proceedings the Magistrate should have the right to ask him to furnish security of a different nature than mentioned in the notice under section 112. I think this oversight in the drafting is due to the words of I. L. R. 25, Cal. 798, wherein the case was that the person was required to be of good behaviour and it was held that he could not be bound over to give security for keeping the peace. The case before the High Court at that time was simply one-sided, it referred to only one side of the question. So High Court had to give their ruling only on that part of the question, the other part was not before them. But the principle laid down therein was that since that man was asked to keep the peace in the notice issued under section 112, therefore he ought not to have been required to be of good behaviour in the final order. The notice under section 112 and the final order under section 118 should not clash with each other,—that is the principle of the ruling in the Calcutta case, and there is no reason why that principle should not be applied in this clause also.

Mr. B. A. Spence (Bombay: European): May I ask for information from the Honourable the Mover of this amendment? Does he object to any one who is bound over to be of good behaviour, keeping the peace while he is bound over for good behaviour, or if he is bound over to keep the peace, does he not think that he ought also to be of good behaviour?

Bhai Man Singh: In reply I have only to say, do the framers of the Code object to a man who is asked to keep the peace to be of good behaviour? There is the plain thing, we should have some guiding principle and should be guided by that principle.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the Honourable Member proposes to substitute another proviso for proviso (a) in the Bill. His suggestion is that if the person proceeded against has been called upon to give security for keeping the peace, then the interim order to which this proviso refers should be an order for keeping the peace, and similarly, if the man is ultimately assuming that the Magistrate finds the facts to be true, to give security to be of good behaviour, then the interim bond should be one for good behaviour. That, Sir, appears to be an eminently reasonable proposition, but I would suggest that the proposition in the Bill itself is even more reasonable and more in the interests of the person proceeded against. I think that the Honourable Member has neglected to notice the provisions of section 121 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It says:

"The bond to be executed by any such person shall bind him to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour, as the case may be, and, in the latter case, (that is to say, in the case of a bond to be of good behaviour) the commission or attempt to commit, or the abetment of, any offence punishable with imprisonment, wherever it may be committed, is a breach of the bond."

That is to say, Sir, the commission of any offence whatsoever would mean a breach of a bond to be of good behaviour. As regards a bond to keep the peace, the only offences which will involve a breach of the bond are offences which involve a breach of the peace. It is true, Honourable Members may refer to the form (Form X in Schedule V), in which the bond to keep the peace is drawn up, that a bond to keep the peace may be broken where a bond to be of good behaviour would not be—I refer to the case of doing an act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace. On the whole, there is no doubt, however, that the bond to be of good behaviour is a wider bond, and embraces a considerably wider field than the bond to keep the peace, and therefore the Bill proposes that the Magistrate should be able to take an interim bond, the less stringent bond in all cases. In these circumstances, I trust that this House will not accept the amendment.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): My submission is that some misconception underlies the amendment which has been proposed. The clause, as it is at present worded, makes special provision for persons against whom proceedings are taken under section 107 of the Code for keeping the peace. The persons proceeded against under that section may be persons of the highest respectability, in no sense criminals, but driven by circumstances into a position which has made it necessary to take action against them under section 107. But proceedings under the more serious sections 108, 109, and 110 involve a stigma. They are proceedings against character, not against an act of impulse or a particular set of temporary circumstances which lead to a danger of a breach of the peace, but which involve a question of character; and the clause as now put up in the Bill very rightly makes a difference in favour of the non-criminal peace-breaker. If the House were to accept the proposed amendment, what would be the result? The result would be an inconsistency, because if a man is proceeded against under section 110 and is required to execute a bond to be of good behaviour, it would be a contradiction to say that he is not thereby required to execute a bond to keep the peace. Section 110 includes under clause (e) a person who habitually commits, or attempts to commit, or abets the commission of, offences involving a breach of the peace. The moment you bind a man to be of good behaviour, you necessarily bind him, inter alia, to keep the peace, and, therefore to legislate that a man who is bound to be of good behaviour shall not be bound to keep the peace is a contradiction and an inconsistency: I am quite sure that when this is perceived by the House, this amendment will be given the short shrift that it deserves.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the amendment which stands in my name asks that in clause 20.

(Voices: "What about Dr. Gour's amendment* No. 57?")

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I do not move it.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to move:

"That in clause 20, sub-clause (iii) the word 'omitted' be substituted for all words after the words 'shall be' where they first occur."

The present sub-clause (iii) is to this effect:

"Sub-section (3) shall be renumbered (4) and after the words 'habitual offender' in the said sub-section the words 'or is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community' shall be inserted."

My amendment asks that the sub-section (3) shall be omitted.

The present sub-section (3) says:

"For the purposes of this section the fact that a person is an habitual offender may be proved by evidence of general repute or otherwise."

I beg to put before the House that this clause which entitles the prosecution to prove the character of the habitual offender by the evidence of general repute or otherwise be deleted. Sir, under this section the Magistrate stamps a person with a bad character and of being a habitual offender for his whole life and this sub-clause provides that the man could be bound over on the evidence of general repute. The words "general repute" are of very wide interpretation and of confused application. The courts that have attempted to clear their meaning have introduced further confusion rather than succeeded in clearing in any way the meaning thereof. In the case of an habitual offender, the fact could be proved even by circumstances or personal knowledge. It is not necessary that the fact of the person being an habitual offender should be proved by the general reputation which a man bears in the community or among people in general in the town. It will be in the knowledge of the House that there are people in the mofussil who are not so well educated, who cannot think clearly for themselves and who are more or less guided by the opinions of others and it may happen as it generally happens that either they are carried away by their own prejudices or by the influence of the opinions of others with whom they come into contact. Therefore the fact that an habitual offender is a person who habitually offends against the laws could very well be proved by the evidence itself regarding offences which he may have committed. There may be a reply from the Government Bench that it often happens that though the courts are morally convinced that the man has committed an offence, still on some technical ground, the man may get off and may not get the punishment which he richly deserves for the offence which he committed. My reply would be that those very witnesses who came forward to prove that the man had committed the offence, would also come forward in this case to prove the offence and to prove that it is within their knowledge that the man has committed such and such offences; and probably that evidence will be a better evidence to prove about the habitual nature of that offender. Moreover, Sir, if we were to rely on the reputation which a man bears, it is pretty certain as has happened in the past that many cases may come before the courts in which a man may unnecessarily be bound over simply on account of the prejudices or the opinions wrongly based, of the persons who come to give evidence against him. Therefore, I submit that it is not necessary to change the law of evidence so far as the nature of proof necessary for binding over an habitual offender is concerned under this section, or to allow this clause to stand. I therefore submit that this clause should be deleted. The Government do not only want the retention of the clause in this Bill but on the other hand they also want to make it applicable to certain other classes of people within the purview of this clause, that is, to include desperate and dangerous characters. The question as to how far it was desirable to include such persons under section 110 was very well discussed in the amendment which was moved by my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, and I need not go into details. I may simply submit that all these particulars are very difficult to be proved by general repute which is of a very wide application and therefore it is better that the whole clause should be deleted.

* "And renumber clauses (e) and (f) of the proviso as clauses (d) and (e), respectively."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is perhaps difficult to appreciate the full meaning of the amendment in the form in which it appears on the paper, owing to the exigencies of drafting. The Honourable Member however has explained his intention very definitely to us; he wants to do away with the whole of section 117, sub-section (3). That is to say, he would make it impossible for the courts to accept evidence of general repute in dealing with habitual offenders.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: No.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Yes. You cannot place any other construction than that I have placed upon the proposal of the Honourable Member; and I see that I have the assent of the Honourable Member himself in my statement that I have correctly and clearly described his intention. Let me repeat; he would delete the whole of clause 117, sub-clause (3) and make it impossible for the courts to accept evidence of general repute in dealing with habitual offenders. Now it is an argument which we have had to use before, an argument which we have indeed heard used also on the other side, that if a particular provision has stood in the law for many years, we should not alter it unless very substantial reason exists for doing so. Has there been any general expression of opinion against the provision? None whatever. I would ask the House to refer to the opinions which we have placed in their hands and to tell me whether they can quote any substantial body of opinion against this provision, or indeed any expression of opinion at all. Now have the courts themselves deprecated its use. I am on strong ground when I say that they have not done so. It is true that the question as to what constitutes general repute has been discussed at length in the courts, and has formed the subject of judicial decisions, but the courts have now laid down definite standards for applying this particular provision. I draw the conclusion then that neither the public at large nor the judicial authorities have felt that this is an unreasonable provision of law. You will find a similar provision in the Italian law, where a man's character for the purposes of preventive sections is judged per voce publica. You will find a similar provision in the Egyptian law. (A Voice: "What about English law?") It does not, I admit, exist in the English law, but I have quoted two instances perhaps somewhat more analogous to Indian conditions. And I believe, and honestly believe, that people in India generally consider that this provision constitutes a real safeguard. We have been told to-day, that we should not rely on evidence of general repute, and should prove by concrete instances the character of a person who is to be made the subject of a preventive order. Of course the Honourable Member will not claim that we should prove this by concrete instances of conviction. The concrete instances are only concrete instances of alleged offences. But there is no very great difference, if you think of it, between the two sets of circumstances. In one a witness comes before a Court and says, 'I and every one who knows this man knows him to be a thief,' in the other a witness says, 'this man has stolen from A or stolen from B or from C,' but the Court is not able to call upon him for proof that the man has stolen from A, or from B or C. And every one is well aware of the class of cases in which this sub-section is really needed. It is no dialectical matter; I appeal to the practical experience of every one here. There are a large number of men who so terrify their neighbours that cases are not brought against them, though it is perfectly well known by the community what class of men they are; and if the verdict of the neighbourhood is unanimous, if there is no contradictory evidence against it, one may be pretty sure in the conditions of India that that verdict is correct. I may be pardoned perhaps for referring to a case within my own knowledge, but it is an interesting one and I will give it to the Assembly for what it is worth. We were colonising a new district in the Punjab; that is to say, there was a large and unpopulated waste into which we were bringing canal irrigation. Our colonists came from the congested districts of the Punjab—many of them military pensioners, many of them from the Sikh districts, all carefully selected and respectable men. They had, of course, to bring their cattle with them to plough their new holdings and any delay would have meant a heavy loss not only to the State, but to them. Now there happened to be living on the edges of this tract men whose sole profession in life was that of cattle stealing. They had practically little other means of subsistence. So far was this acknowledged in the neighbourhood that by the law of the tribe no man could even put a turban on his head until he could prove to his family that he had stolen five cows. Was it possible to get convictions against these people? Of course not. If they stole cattle from a village and the villagers complained, the rest of their cattle disappeared next night. Yet everybody knew what was their means of livelihood; they knew by long experience that they were habitual cattle thieves. And directly the colonists appeared, some from 200 and from 300 miles away, prepared to take up new land, after incurring all the burden of raising funds for building their houses and buying their oxen and implements, their cattle were swept off by these amiable gentlemen. What remedy had the colonists and ourselves? One only. We took action against the most notorious of these men, some ten or fifteen, and we applied section 110. We proved by general repute that they were cattle thieves, they were put on security and the matter ended at once. That is exactly the kind of case to which this sub-section of section 110 would apply, no other provision would be adequate, and I have ventured for that reason to quote the case.

We have been told by Mr. Agnihotri that if the section is allowed to stand, there is a risk that people will unnecessarily be bound over on account of prejudice. Now, the Courts have made it perfectly clear that reputation must be general reputation in the vicinity; not vague belief but reputation among people who know the person affected and reputation that is not capable of contradiction. Would it be possible, therefore, if the courts did their duty—and we have no reason to suppose that they do not do their duty in this respect—for a man to be bound over on account of unreasonable prejudice? Mr. Agnihotri has also supported his objection to the section by the statement that we have proposed to extend it. I am prepared to argue the supposed extension when we come to the amendment that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar will shortly put before us. I would merely ask the House not to be swayed in its consideration of this very wholesome, salutary and long-standing section by the fact that we have been obliged, purely in order to clear up legal difficulties and for no other purpose, to add a few extra words to it. The sole question now is, would India at large approve of this Assembly withdrawing this necessary provision by which in the case of an habitual offender we can rely on evidence of general repute?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I cannot help characterising this clause as a very dangerous instrument which has been misused in the past and is sure to be misused in the future. The Honourable the Home Member has referred to his own experience; I may be pardoned by the House if I refer to my experiences and say that in ninety cases out of one hundred this section has been misused; and there have been no more improper convictions than the running in of a man on the ground that he is an habitual offender, and one therefore whose movements should be checked. The Honourable the Home Member was obliged to refer to the Italian and Egyptian Codes for a parallel. Certainly he could find nothing like it in the English Code, in the French law and nothing in America. He could only refer to the example of Egypt for the purpose of supporting this drastic provision in the Criminal Procedure Code. Sir, those who have judicial experience will bear me out when I say that repute evidence is nothing but evidence which the Police Inspector or Sub-Inspector of the place considers good. He goes to a number of people and asks them to say that a certain man is a dangerous man and is an habitual offender, and immediately the cry is taken up by a large number of people, and evidence comes before the Court with the result that the man's liberty is sworn away by people who do not know anything specific about him, but think that his liberty ought to be curbed in some way or the other. Take the case of men who make themselves obnoxious to people in their locality by holding peculiar religious opinions and social views. They are generally hated in the locality with the result that if the Police Inspector sets his mind to procuring a conviction against him and getting such a man out of the place, all he has to do is to go to the other people in the locality and ask them to swear that the man is dangerous and an habitual offender. There is no difficulty about this at all; you can always get people to swear that a man is an habitual offender, and if they were cross-examined they would say they were not in a position to give specific instances; they would say, all they know is that he is a man who habitually commits offences. Sir, as the Honourable the Home Member has said he would reserve his comments as regards the amendment which I propose to make. I would not say anything about that matter. I will confine myself solely to the question of a person who is described to be a habitual offender being restrained. I submit, Sir, that Mr. Agnihotri has given very good reasons for convincing the House that if such a provision as that is allowed to stand, no man's liberty would be safe.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I would ask your special permission to make not a second speech to the House but for one remark only to the last speaker. I will hand to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar the opinions which he recorded about our Bill when he was a Judge of the Madras High Court, and I would ask him to point to a single remark which he then made in opposition to this section of the Bill. Obviously his opinion as a Judge was not then as strong as he expresses to us now. There is not a single word of his on the subject.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: It is a later development, Sir.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Sir, to the experiences which have been just now detailed by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, I might add my own. Now, I will begin by saying that in many cases the provisions of this chapter are salutary and are worked salutarily, but at the same time there are many instances in which they are misused; I will not go so far as to say that they are misused in 90 per cent. of the cases in my own province. Still I have personal experience of many cases in which they were misused. Not only is it the case that the Police go about and ask people that this is a dangerous man and therefore he should be restrained or some action of this kind should be taken, but, as a matter of fact, there are standing professional witnesses for these cases under section 110, and they are very glib witnesses too. I remember a case in which a baniya who was a mere shop keeper whom nobody could possibly conceive of being a habitual offender rendered himself obnoxious, for circumstances which need not be mentioned, to the police and the police brought up two or three witnesses who were in the habit of giving evidence against habitual offenders, and when the witnesses were asked as to instances of the accused person having harboured thieves, they glibly gave 10 or 15 cases, of which there was no possibility of verifying. On the one hand, I say that the provisions of this section do require to be administered, and on the other hand there are many cases in which they are misused and they are taken advantage of by the police as instruments to run in persons whom they consider obnoxious.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Was security taken from the baniya you mention?

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: It was. Sir Malcolm Hailey might say one bad case does not mean that the law is improper or improperly worked, and, as they say, hard cases make bad law. At the same time, I think, the absolute abolition of this chapter in this country would be undesirable, because, whilst there are cases in which these sections are being misused, in some cases the presence of this section is absolutely necessary in the interests of the people. In a place where dacoities are very rife, as it very often happens in my own province, when it is impossible to adduce evidence to identify dacoits when they commit dacoities, there is no other means of pinning down those dacoits than by having resort to the provisions of this section. Therefore in reply to Mr. Agnihotri and Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, I have to say, as Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out, it would be impossible to work this chapter if you were to remove these provisions altogether. It is impossible to bring evidence of persons who would speak to the fact that they saw this man commit a theft or some such thing. They can give evidence of a general character that they had heard that this man had harboured such and such offenders in his house and was usually a man in the habit of receiving stolen property. Still, I am of opinion that if this amendment of Mr. Agnihotri is allowed, the result would be that it would be impossible to work this chapter. The better course would have been to have moved for the abolition of the whole chapter and Mr. Agnihotri would have been better advised if he had moved for the abolition of the whole chapter, but not merely for inserting a provision which will make the provisions of the rest of the chapter entirely nugatory. As we should look to the greater good of the greater number, I think people who require some order to be preserved in their provinces will, in the interests of the peaceful man, agree that the provisions of this chapter are very necessary. It very often happens in my province that there are waves of lawlessness and waves of dacoity and then it becomes very essential to have the provisions of this chapter.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the discussion on this clause has given opportunities to indulge in moods of reminiscences. But the point taken by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, is, as I understood him, that this clause is liable to be harshly worked. That is the evidence in support of it would be vague, and, therefore very difficult for an accused person to meet it. That, I think, is the main objection to this clause. Another point which has been taken up by my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, is that out of 90 out of 100 cases which came up before the High Court the provisions had been misused. The two are distinct. There is the law. It may be sometimes that those who work the law go wrong, and therefore when the matter goes before the higher Court, naturally the errors are corrected. But, taking Mr. Agnihotri's objections, what is it he offers us in the place of this clause? Is it easy, is it workable, to offer an alternative to the clause that exists? Well, that alternative has not been placed before the House. Well, the question naturally turns to the point whether we should have a clause like this and whether it is necessary to control the men who are brought under this clause. The question is apart from the reference of the percentage which my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, gave, which, no doubt, requires to be verified, whether really such a large percentage of cases had been found to have been so egregiously dealt with. The interpretation of the phrase 'general repute' as the Honourable the Home Member very clearly pointed out has not led to any difficulties. No doubt, subordinate Magistrates sometimes have admitted what is called hearsay evidence, and they have sometimes admitted vague general aspersions against the man, but in every one of those cases, the High Court has corrected. Now, the phrase has got a regular well understood meaning. The words 'general repute' have practically been defined by judicial decisions and no practitioner of any standing or no judge of any legal knowledge can have any difficulty in interpreting the words 'general repute.' That has practically become a phrase of accredited interpretation. Now witnesses of general repute must speak from personal knowledge. That excludes mere vague hearsay. It must be the reputation in the locality and among the people where the person resides. I do not want to define the law at length because, as I have said, it has been done exceedingly well by the Honourable the Home Member, but as the discussion has taken a form which is not entirely germane to the interpretation of the term, I refer to it. Courts have not any difficulty in laying down the conditions and the elements of evidence necessary to come under this clause, and therefore there is no difficulty in understanding the phrase "general repute" in this clause. Now we are faced with this alternative. If you omit that, then there are absolutely no means of bringing in offenders who come under this clause. I will give an instance which recently occurred. There was the case of a man who was a real bully. That man used to terrorise the neighbourhood. The neighbourhood was in a slum locality. And it happened one night that a number of people joined together and beat him to death, and when I inquired, I heard he was a bully who had been bullying the neighbourhood for a great many years, and then the people could not stand it any longer, and they combined and beat him to death. Now if proceedings had been taken against that man and he had been bound over, that man would not have been killed. That is one case where it has gone to extreme lengths. As the section as to good behaviour stands, I may say that I am not convinced that it has been really abused. No doubt the evidence judged from the standpoint of evidence required to convict a man is less exact. All the same that section when used in regard to good behaviour, which I am discussing now, has produced salutary results, and therefore it cannot be said that it has been misused. It is no doubt liable to be misused by people, or Magistrates who have got the requisite training or balance of mind. That no amount of training or legislation can give. Therefore I say that the clause which my learned friend, Mr. Agnihotri, wants to be dropped ought to be retained.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: It would be perhaps more convenient if I put the question in the following terms:

The question is:

"That sub-section (3) of section 123 of the Code be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I rise to a point of order. You see, Sir, the next amendment covers amendment No. 60. A portion of No. 61 is amendment No. 60, and therefore 61 swallows up No. 60, or at least 60 is a part of 61. I think, Sir, if 61 is moved, that will be sufficient to cover 60.

Mr. Deputy President: Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I said a few words on the last occasion which to a considerable extent bear upon the amendment which I now move, namely:

"That in clause 20 (iii) omit the words from 'and after' to 'instead'."

There is this additional factor, so far as this amendment is concerned; it is not an old-standing provision, it is something which the Government wants to introduce for the first time. Under the original section the fact that a person is a habitual offender may be proved by general repute or otherwise. It is now sought to add to the clause relating to "habitual offender" the clause "or is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community." It is bad enough to have reputable evidence as regards old offenders; we are going to add a new terror to the lives of peaceable citizens by introducing a new clause and by permitting evidence to be given by the police for the purpose of showing that a man is of so dangerous and desperate a character that his liberty should be curtailed. Sir, as far as possible in all civilized Governments, there should be as little evidence of this vague character as possible; evidence which can be easily manufactured, evidence which would give a handle to persons who do not like a particular person to go before a Magistrate and swear that this is a very dangerous and desperate man and it is desirable that his liberties should be curtailed. My friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, seemed to a certain extent to doubt whether I was justified in saying that in 90 per cent. of cases the evidence is not good. I will not refer to anything which I know personally, but I say, Sir, that the appearance of this clause in the form in which it has been introduced is likely to be greatly abused, and is likely to put honest men into the clutches of the police, and I think it is desirable that no innovation should be made in regard to the letting in of evidence of this character in the Criminal Procedure Code. The Honourable the Home Member has already advocated the retention of the existing clause, but I do not think he would be justified in asking that there should be an addition to that clause; namely, you must allow the police to let in evidence for the purpose of showing that a man is a very dangerous and desperate character. And after all, what is the evidence which would be allowed? A few people would come in and say: "We know this man is very dangerous and should not be allowed to live in the village; he is a very desperate man, if he is allowed to live in the village, our lives would be in danger," and if they are asked to give instances, there would be great difficulty in getting anything specific in regard to the matter. It has been said by my friends that Courts have always required in such matters that specific evidence should be given. But that is only when the matter goes before the High Court, after the man is called upon to show cause why he should not execute a bond for good behaviour. Evidence of this nature would be let in and the man would be bound over for a long time and subjected to all manner of difficulties before the matter is taken up to the High Court. The High Court may later on point out that there was no evidence of a specific nature but the mischief would have been done. That has been the experience of a number of police, and I do not think it is desirable that this means should be left in the hands of the police to harass honest men; and I therefore move, Sir, that this new clause which it is intended to insert should be dropped.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That in clause 20, sub-clause (iii), omit the words from 'and after' to 'inserted'."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I find that we are again under the imputation of attempting to gain extensive and undesirable powers under the cover of a little addition of this nature. But if I give the House an explanation of the reason for the addition of these words in the drafting, they will see that, after all, our intentions were not so dreadful, nor on so vast a scale as suggested. The history of the case is as follows: It is sufficient to say that in 1872 you could get security against a man on the ground that he was of notoriously bad livelihood or a dangerous character, and you could prove this by evidence of general repute. When the Act came to be amended subsequently, in 1882, the Legislature omitted the condition that you might proceed against a man merely because he was a dangerous character. In other words, it was necessary then to prove that he was a habitual thief, receiver of stolen property and the like. Now, we have already had by the vote of the House this morning, a very general admission that it was unfortunate that the revision of 1882 left out the provision that you could proceed against a man on the ground that he was a desperate and dangerous character. That, I say with confidence, was a result which every one must admit was arrived at on the discussion of Munshi Iswar Saran's amendment. We actually discussed a particular case in which, acting under the law of 1882, a Judge, who found that a man was what in other and perhaps lighter terms we should describe as a holy terror, could not be proceeded against because of the omission of 1882. Our Legislature, wisely as I claim, re-introduced this provision in 1898, but, when it did so, it was unfortunately not noticed that it had not provided, as was provided in 1872, that you could prove that a man was a dangerous character by evidence of general repute. If Honourable Members will glance at section 110, they will see that from (a) to (e) the clauses are proceeded by the words "habitually" or "by habit". When you come to clause (f), namely, the case of a man who is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community, these preliminary words are omitted, and the Courts found, when they came to interpret section 117, sub-clause (3), that the omission of these words made it impossible to prove by evidence of general repute that a man was of so dangerous and desperate a character. All we seek to do, therefore, is to correct the inadvertent omission of 1898 and to bring back the law as it stood in 1872, so as to make it possible to prove by evidence of general repute that a man is a dangerous and desperate character. We seek to do that and nothing else; and I leave it to the House to judge whether what we propose is anything in substance so dangerous as to merit the terms which Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has used. I think I need confine my further argument to one point only. I need only put it to the House that, if a man is really so dangerous and desperate as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community, that is exactly the kind of case which you would ordinarily prove by evidence of general repute and for which it would be difficult to find proof of any other kind than general repute.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Sir, I beg to support this amendment. The judicial decisions on this subject are to the effect that it is wrong in principle to apply evidence of general repute to a person who is to be condemned as a desperate man.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Might we have those?

Mr. N. M. Samarth: The Honourable Member will find them in Sohoni's edition of the Criminal Procedure Code under section 123, note 52, clause (ii), namely, 34 M., page 255, 5 C. W. N., page 249, 13 Cr. L. J. (9 All.). Then, again, there are several cases given under note 45. The principle is this. In the case of habitual offenders one can understand evidence of general repute being given, but in the case of a man who is for the first time being pounced upon as a desperate man, that is to say, in regard to whom there is no habitual offence brought home, it is not right that you should resort to general repute. You must give specific instances in his case to show that he is a desperate man, and that is the raison d'être of the decision in 34 M., page 255, and other cases. I submit, therefore, that it is not right that we should now extend in the case of these men the principle that they should be condemned by general repute; the ordinary rules of evidence must apply. It is quite easy, if a man is really a desperate and dangerous man, to prove by actual evidence, by specific, concrete, acts on his part, that he is so, and it is not right that that man should now be brought under this clause of general repute.

I, therefore, support this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I think it is not right that the House should be misled by any remarks that have just fallen from my Honourable and learned friend.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: I should be delighted to know how I have misled the House.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I shall endeavour to explain. I understood Mr. Samarth to be attempting to persuade the House to believe that the High Courts had suggested that the principle of section 117 (3) was wrong.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: No, I never said that.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: That evidence should not be given of general repute and that we should not make any exception to our general law of evidence in these cases.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: May I rise to a point of explanation before the discussion proceeds further. What in effect I said was that the High Courts have laid down that a provision of law which is an exception to the general rule of evidence must be applied only to the cases to which it is confined by the Legislature, and that the Legislature should not now proceed beyond the limits that have been already laid down.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I must again remark that I understood Mr. Samarth to refer to the principle and he suggested that the High Courts had also referred to the principle of this section 117 (3). However, admitting the Honourable Member's explanation, we come to this. What did the Madras High Court say? Merely this, that section 117 (3), which enables evidence of general repute to be given, can only be used in cases where you are attempting to prove that a man is a habitual offender. They said: "You cannot prove that a man is of so desperate and dangerous a character by evidence of general repute." It was no more than this. The cases that followed took exactly the same point. Munshi Iswar Saran has quoted another case which took almost the same point. The Courts kept on holding that evidence of general repute was not admissible in cases of persons whom you wish to prove to be so desperate and dangerous that their being at large was hazardous to the community. They have not said anything further—I have been unable to find any ruling and I do not think Mr. Samarth has found a ruling, in which the Courts have condemned the principle of this section.

Mr. K. Ahmed: May I support the argument of Mr. Samarth by saying that the Calcutta High Court has also held that this sort of evidence of general repute is inadmissible. Their decision is reported in I. L. R. 29 Cal., page 779, in the judgment of Mr. Justice Ameer Ali and Mr. Justice Pratt:

"A charge under clause (f) of section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be proved by general reputation, but by definite evidence.

To prove a charge under section 110 that a person is by habit a thief and a dacoit or that he is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community, there should be proof of specific acts showing that he, to the knowledge of some particular individual, is a dangerous or desperate character.

It is not sufficient that persons, however respectable, should come forward and depose that they have heard that such person is a thief and a dangerous character, when they themselves have no personal knowledge of or acquaintance with him. Such evidence is not only such as could not be safely acted upon, but is also likely to work serious prejudice."

Now, Sir, the closing lines of the judgment that was delivered by the Honourable Judge of the High Court are these:

"They say that they have heard that these men are thieves and dangerous characters, but when they are asked, if they know them personally, they answer in the negative, nor can they mention the people from whom they derived their information. In our opinion the evidence is not only such as cannot be safely acted upon, but it is also likely to work serious prejudice. If the men from whom these witnesses purported to derive their information were examined, it would be possible for the accused to test their means of knowledge that they were men of bad character. General suspicion of this nature, however, is not safe to act upon."

Having regard to the nature of the evidence in this case, we are of opinion that the order against the two petitioners cannot be sustained. We accordingly set it aside, and direct that the petitioners be discharged."

This is the sort of thing that is sometimes brought up against a man—that he is by general repute a thief or the son of a thief and ipso facto the finding of the Magistrate is that he must be a thief. That is generally the conclusion of the Magistrate against these poor unfortunates, who are the victims of police oppression; and this sort of thing is happening every day. It will continue so long as the District Magistrate, who is under the present law supposed to be also the head of the police, acts, I am sorry to say, in collusion with the police. When the matter goes up to the High Court, the learned Judges find that there is not a single item from (a) to (f) which has been proved; that he is neither a thief nor the son of a thief, nor a desperate and dangerous character, nor in the habit of committing robberies. One of the witnesses, the best man of the locality, comes forward and says "He is a thief—chor ka lurka." But what do Mr. Justice Ameer Ali and Mr. Justice Pratt say about it? That not an iota of reliance should be placed on evidence like this. The police, Sir, is like a magic lantern in the village that tantalises the minds of honest people who have asked again and again when this sort of thing is going to stop. I am very much obliged to my Honourable friend the Home Member for saying that in about 1872 the words were there. . . .

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: No, Sir, I said 1882.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I beg your pardon, it is 1882. And now, Sir, we have this recent case from Calcutta to which I have made reference, i.e., I. L. R. XXIX Calcutta at page 779. What we want is not to strengthen the hands of the police or to help the police any longer, but to protect the victims of this oppression. We have had no other argument from the other side which will hold water, as my friend from Karachi said the other day; and therefore, Sir, it is advisable that those words that my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar moved—"or is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community"—should be deleted.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): Sir, it seems to me that it has become necessary to clear the position with reference to the remarks which fell from the lips of my Honourable friend Mr. Samarth in order that the House may be in a position to know what the law at present is, and whether it is desirable to incorporate into this sub-section the words which we seek to introduce. The principle laid down by the Madras High Court in the ruling to which my Honourable friend referred was not that the Legislature ought not to restore the position which, as was pointed out by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey, existed in 1872. All that the High Court did say was this, that the evidence relating to the general repute which a man may bear in his neighbourhood not being ordinarily evidence admissible under the Indian Evidence Act must be confined to the particular cases which fall within the purview of section 117. That is all that the High Court laid down. The Courts of law when judging whether certain evidence relating to general repute is admissible against the person who is on his trial before the Court should see that such evidence is strictly confined to the cases expressly laid down in section 117, and the Courts should not go outside the purview of those cases, for as a general principle the evidence relating to general repute is inadmissible under the Evidence Act.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: I quite agree.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: That being the position, the rulings referred to by my Honourable friend or that may be referred to by other Honourable gentlemen are really entirely beside the point. They do not help the issue which is now before the House. The question for decision by this House is whether the rule which obtains at present under the provisions of the Act of 1898 with regard to the eligibility of evidence of general repute against habitual offenders should or should not be extended to the class of persons who are described in the phrase which we want to introduce in clause 3; that is to say, "men who are so desperate and dangerous as to render their being at large without security hazardous to the community". If this House is of opinion that persons falling under this section should be called upon to furnish security—and I assume that the House has already arrived at that opinion—

Mr. N. M. Samarth: And I quite agree with that opinion.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Then it is clear, I submit, that the evidence of general repute ought to be considered admissible in the case of this class of persons also, because it seems to me that this is the one class of persons to whom on a priori grounds such evidence ought to be held applicable. No doubt it would strengthen the evidence of general repute if the prosecution or the police is able to prove specific cases against them. Surely it is men of this character, who are dangerous to society within the meaning of the words which we want to incorporate in this section, against whom evidence of general repute ought in the interests of society to be held as admissible. After all, remember what is the meaning of general repute. According to Chief Justice Petheram "a man's general reputation is the reputation which he bears in the place in which he lives amongst all the townsmen". Moreover it has been held by the High Courts that when security is demanded from a person on the evidence of general repute, that repute must be universal and there should be no doubt about it. Now that being so, surely in cases where it is proved by general repute, that is to say, general repute amongst the neighbours in the midst of whom such a person resides, where it is proved by evidence of an overwhelming majority of those neighbours that the man is dangerous, so dangerous and so desperate as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community, is there any reasonable person who would still maintain that although this proof, this evidence, is forthcoming against the particular individual, yet he should not be called upon to furnish security simply because the evidence that has been adduced against him is evidence of the character of general repute? Surely, such a position as that is hardly maintainable. I therefore submit that this is exactly the class of persons against whom this House should hold that evidence of general repute ought to be made admissible in order to bring them within the purview of section 117, clause 3.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, I am afraid I must plead guilty to being an unreasonable person in the sense in which the Honourable the Law Member has just used the words. Having contributed to a certain extent to the retention of sub-clause (f) in section 110, about dangerous and desperate characters being required to give security in certain circumstances, I owe it to myself to disclaim the further liability of making abnormal evidence applicable to such a person. I am not quite sure, Sir, that the draftsmen of olden times were so very careless as has been indicated to-day. When clause (f) came to be re-introduced in section 110, I am not sure that the further extension in section 117 was accidental. Let us examine what (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) in 110 are. Every one of these relates to a case where certain specific offences, concrete misdeeds, are indicated. Furthermore, we have the element of their having to be what is termed habitual offenders. With regard to clause (f), before this section could be applied to them or before evidence about repute could be admitted a man may be a veritable tyro, a young blood just taking to bad ways and means, there cannot be any confidence in him, and therefore he has to be checked. In his case what would determine the quality of evidence, and also the quantum would not then be the same as in (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) and ordinarily the rules of evidence would apply. Furthermore, habitual offenders are sneaks who work in the dark; while the dangerous and desperate characters are the contrary. (A Voice: "No.") I hear a voice 'No' behind me. I think people find that that is so. Apart from it being possible to pin him down to his overt misdeeds, there is this further danger and difficulty. In regard to (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) we know exactly what the witness is speaking of and what the accused is guilty of. With regard to (f), it is more or less nebulous, may to some extent be imaginary. Any witness saying "I believe the man to be desperate or dangerous" or that he is dangerous or desperate without being able to quote definite facts will be throwing the gate far too wide, and therefore I think it was a wise discretion that the Legislature exercised in not introducing with regard to clause (f) what finds place in clause 3 of section 117. It has been suggested that my Honourable friend Mr. Samarth on this side of the House was suggesting that the Courts have held that it is wrong in principle for the Legislature to extend the scope of this section if they thought fit to do so. The Honourable the Law Member, if I may say so with great respect, is quite right in saying that the law courts found themselves powerless in these cases, because clause 3 of section 117 did not apply to the case of dangerous and desperate characters. But, Sir, the point that I should like to make with regard to those cases is that, if the Courts felt that such an enactment was necessary with regard to dangerous and desperate characters, and that its absence was really felt one should have found some indication of that in the judicial decisions. Their trend is on the other hand that the courts were unwilling that this principle should be extended to the cases in question in the absence of express provision and that they did not want to countenance such unauthorised extension.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Is that so?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: I say that is the trend. I am entitled to draw my own conclusions. . . .

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Have you a single case in which language of that kind is used?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: My suggestion is that there is not a single word in any one of these cases where the courts found it necessary to suggest the need for the extension of this principle to dangerous characters.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Could you quote any case?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: No. That proves my point all the more, because it was not the Judge's business to make remarks against the principle of extension if the Legislature later intended it. But as custodians of peace and order, as some law Courts here have imagined themselves to be, we should have found some indication if that was necessary. And because of real dangers that there are in extending the principle in the case of those not yet guilty of anything habitual, we should be well advised in not pressing for enactment of the provision of clause (iii) of section 117 with regard to (f) of 110.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, the fears entertained by the Honourable Mover and those who sustain him can easily be understood. There is no doubt that the conferring upon Courts of a general power of this kind is attended with a certain amount of risk. As has been pointed out by the Honourable the Law Member, this is a case where you create an exception to a rule of the law of evidence. Nevertheless, a Legislature has to take risks of this kind. The amendment which the framers of the Bill propose to introduce seems to me almost consequential to a retention on the Statute Book of clause (f), section 110. To my mind, it seems to be inconsistent that we should have one rule of evidence for cases coming under clauses (a) to (e) of that section and that we should shut out that exceptional rule of evidence, if I may so speak of it, in the case of clause (f), where perhaps its presence is more necessary than in any one of the other cases. The High Court rulings which have been cited will be accepted as sound law by every lawyer. As the Honourable the Home Member has pointed out in his very clear enunciation of the subject, they restrict the exception to the cases expressly provided for. But for that very reason they indicate the necessity of the amendment which the framers of the Bill have now put up. The Honourable Mover said, if I heard him correctly, that this would be a dangerous power to put into the hands of the police. We have heard also other speakers condemning the police. That condemnation, I take it, is based upon "general reputation"; but it seems to me that it is not a power placed in the hands of the police: it is a rule of procedure laid down for the guidance of the Courts. No doubt, it is a procedure which the Courts of supervision have to watch with extreme care. If the estimate made by the Honourable Mover is correct, that in Madras 90 per cent. go wrong, then either the quality of the magistracy or the supervision of the supervising authorities there calls for improvement. But I think that, if Honourable Members will halt a moment and give their full significance to the words "general repute," perhaps they will be disposed to see that many of their fears are not so well founded as the casual consideration of that phrase might lead one to believe. "General repute" means something than mere statements by one or two persons as to the reputation of a man. It means that there is a general body of people, in a position to know and to hear and to sense the character of a man who lives among them, who are agreed in condemning him as desperate and dangerous. A headman of a village may receive daily complaints from ryots concerning the unscrupulous conduct or dangerous conduct or intimidation or bullying of a particular man but only upon the understanding that he is not to give them away as informants lest they should find themselves going from the frying pan into the fire. In all communities, every day, it happens that you have a marked man. Plenty of people are ready to tell one another in confidence about him but very few have the necessary moral courage, or the necessary standing, to take active steps to put a stop to the acts which have made him a marked man. I think it is very essential that, since desperate and dangerous characters do exist against whom specific offences cannot be proved, that our Courts should be armed with authority to help the general body of the public in obtaining relief against the acts and misconduct of such characters. I admit,—as I have already said—it is a power which requires very careful control and watching; but that of itself is no reason why the power should not be given. We are dealing now with what we have been reminded over and over again to be preventive and not punitive sections. We do not want here provisions to punish crime. We want provisions to prevent crime. We do not want evidence so much that a particular crime has been committed, as evidence that a particular individual is likely to commit a particular crime; and I find it difficult to understand how you can have anything except evidence of this class to say what a man is likely to do—what there is danger that he may do—if he is not checked by an order for security or the like. And so, I think that while we retain clause (f) as a part of section 110, we should in all consistency include the additional words added by the Bill, but proposed to be omitted by the motion now before the House.

(Several Honourable Members: I move that the question be now put.)

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 20, sub clause (iv), omit the words from 'and after' to 'inserted'."

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, 23rd January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.

Secretary of the Assembly: I have to inform the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. President at to-day's meeting.

Mr. Deputy President then took the Chair.

STATEMENTS LAID ON THE TABLE.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): Sir, I lay on the table the information promised in reply to a question by Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan, on the 16th January, 1923, regarding the Pusa Institute. •

The reply to

(a) is—17 years since the foundation stone was laid in 1905, but the Institute came into full working order from 1908.

(b) The chief objects of the Institute are (i) research with a view to evolution of principles and methods likely to be of general application in agricultural improvements; (ii) Post graduate instruction.

Care has been taken to avoid dealing directly with cultivators where the Provincial Departments can do the work, but the Institute assists local Agricultural Departments, when called upon, mainly with regard to measures for the suppression of diseases and insect pests, in supplying seed of improved varieties of crops, in the testing of improved methods, in the supply of pedigree cattle, etc.

The work of the Institute is described in its Annual Reports from which it will be seen that the research aims mainly at establishing general principles which can be put into practice with the necessary modifications to suit local conditions. Amongst results which have been adopted directly in the provinces, however, the following may be cited:

1. The evolution of superior strains of wheat which are fast replacing the country varieties in the United Provinces, parts of the Punjab and Bihar;
2. The successful production of a superior type of tobacco suitable for Indian made cigarettes;
3. The use of phosphate manures combined with green manuring as a method of maintaining the fertility of soils which are being depleted through overcropping;
4. Improvement of Indian cattle from the point of view of the production of milk;
5. Successful campaign bud rot disease of palms in the Godavari delta;
6. Methods of storage of grain and potatoes against insect attack;
7. Improvement of agricultural implements.

As regards (c), the total expenditure up to 1921-22 is as follows:

	Ra.
Recurring since 1903-04	75,45,000
Non-recurring—
(being the cost of buildings, etc., constructed by the Public Works Department)	15,38,000

As regards (d) and (e) the Institute offers facilities for post-graduate work in the laboratories. A statement is enclosed showing the number of students trained (total 369) including short course students. Most of the students, especially of the long course (123) are those who are deputed by the Provinces and Indian States for special training and are absorbed in the respective Departments after the training. Out of the students trained at Pusa, 4 are now in the Imperial Agricultural Service, 12 in the Provincial Agricultural Service and 4 are employed in Pusa as Research Assistants. Definite information regarding others is not available but the majority of them are employed in the subordinate service of the Provincial and Indian States Agricultural Departments.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

RUINED MOSQUES, MONUMENTS ETC: IN MALDAH.

211. *Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Are the Government aware that in the District of Maldah in Bengal there have been many 'mosques', 'monuments', 'tombs', 'dargas' and sacred buildings of the Mogul Emperors of Gour and Pandua (ancient capital) under rack and ruin and their bricks, stopes and other materials are being stolen and carried away as res-nullius by the people without any interference by the Government and that many brick-built houses are being constructed by the people of the district with the materials thereof?

(ii) Will the Government be pleased to enquire how much of the properties has been taken away and usurped by the people for their personal uses, explaining in full and giving their particulars as regards the actual price of the same at the market rate if possible?

(iii) Will the Government be pleased to state how much money has been spent by Government for the preservation of the ruins of Gour and Pandua under the Ancient Monument Act?

(iv) Will the Government be pleased to inquire how much land appertaining to them has been settled with tenants by the Khas-Mahal and other local Zamindars having landed properties at and near the ancient capital of Gour and Pandua?

(v) Do Government propose to take proper step for the recovery of those properties, movable and immovable immediately, or in the alternative consider advisable to make over the present tombs, monuments, mosques, dargas and sacred buildings including all the lands appertaining to them left by the Mogul Emperor to the Mohammedan Community of the District with the necessary costs for the recovery of those lost properties in question as stated above?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: The Government of India are not responsible for all mosques, monuments, etc., as suggested in the Honourable Member's question, but only for such as have been placed in the charge of the Archaeological Department as being of archaeological, historical, or artistic interest. In the circumstances it is not possible to give any reply to the Honourable Member's extensive enquiries. If the Honourable Member will specify clearly the buildings, etc., about which he needs information an endeavour will be made to get it.

Mr. K. Ahmed: What is the meaning of the Ancient Monuments Preservation Act? What are the provisions, what is the object of that Act, Sir?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: They are as well known to the Honourable Member as to myself.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that in the opening era of the present century His Excellency Lord Curzon went to inspect those Gour and Pandua tombstones, dargas and other sacred and holy places, and that for the preservation of these he brought out a certain scheme and made a large grant of money and that there has not been any substantial benefit from it?

(There being no answer to this question, Mr. Deputy President called upon Mr. K. Ahmed).

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact, Sir, that there are . . .

Mr. Deputy President: I have called upon the Honourable Member to put his question No. 212.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I am ready to put question No. 212 and I put it if I am not entitled to put the above supplementary question to question No. 211.

ACCESS TO HOWRAH RAILWAY STATION.

212. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Are the Government aware that the gates leading to the platforms in the Howrah Railway Station are opened for the third and inter-class passengers only five minutes or so before the train starts and several barriers have been constructed near the platform gates preventing easy access of the passengers to the platforms?

(ii) Are the Government aware that in consequence of these restrictions great inconvenience is caused to the third and inter-class passengers especially women and children, who owing to rush often fail to catch the trains?

(iii) Do Government propose to consider the desirability of opening the platform gates at least half an hour before the starting of the trains and to remove the barriers near the platform gates for the convenience of the passenger public?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (i) and (ii) Inquiry has been made from the East Indian Railway Administration and it is understood that the gates leading to the platforms at Howrah station are opened for intermediate and third class passengers an hour before the departure time in the case of main lines trains, and half an hour before the departure time in the case of local trains. Barriers are erected so as to prevent a rush of passengers against the entrance gates to the platforms. These measures have been taken in order to prevent passengers from boarding trains without tickets a practice from which the railway revenues have suffered considerably in the past.

(iii) In the circumstances, Government do not propose to take any action.

PURCHASE OF TICKETS ON E. B. RAILWAY.

213. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Are the Government aware that on the Eastern Bengal Railway line in most stations passengers are not allowed to purchase tickets until the train leaves the previous Railway station, in consequence of which many passengers are unable to buy tickets owing to the great rush of passengers attempting to buy the tickets and many passengers thus fail to catch the trains?

(ii) Do Government propose to consider the advisability of arranging to sell the tickets in those Railway stations at least one hour before the arrival of trains and thereby removing the inconvenience of the travelling public?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (i) This question was referred to the Agent, Eastern Bengal Railway, who reports that the booking offices at important stations are kept open day and night for the issue of tickets. At all other stations the booking offices are opened half an hour before the advertised time of departure of trains and closed five minutes before starting time. No complaints have been received from passengers that they have not been allowed sufficient time to purchase their tickets, but if specific cases are reported to the Railway authorities they will be looked into.

(ii) In the circumstances, Government do not propose taking any action in the matter.

RAILWAY AND STEAMER RATES.

214. Mr. K. Ahmed: Do the Government intend to take immediate steps to reduce the passenger and goods rates on the Indian Railways and Steamers plying in Indian Waters?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government have no control over steamer freights, and see no reason at present to make any change in the Schedules of maxima fares and rates laid down for Railways in India.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that in England there has been a great deal of reduction in the fares of steamers plying both inside and outside the Thames in England as well as in the fares of goods trains carrying goods there in England managed by private companies?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government are not in possession of complete facts relating to the question which the Honourable Member has put.

Mr. K. Ahmed: If there are such reductions in England why should there not be reductions here in this country?

EASTERN BENGAL RAILWAY CONTRACT.

215. Mr. K. Ahmed: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state:—

(i) How many times the contract with the Eastern Bengal Railway Company has been renewed and extended and the respective periods for which such extension was granted, and

(ii) Whether it was not declared that at the expiration of each period the management of the State-owned Line would be taken over by the State?

(2) Are the Government aware that at the expiration of each period, reasons were brought forward to which the Government agreed, why Company Management should be allowed to continue?

(3) Is it the intention of the Government to give a further extension of Company Management at the expiration of the present period?

(4) If any such reasons are likely to be brought forward either by the Railway Board or by the Company Directors, do the Government propose in the interest of the public, to place such reasons before the Assembly at least nine months before the expiry of the Contract with the East Indian Railway Company?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (1) (i) It is assumed that the question relates to the East Indian Railway Company referred to in the latter part of Honourable Member's question and not to the Eastern Bengal Railway which is a State-worked line.

The East Indian Railway was purchased by Government in 1879 and the contract then entered into was to run for 50 years unless terminated by either party with two years' notice at the end of the 20th year, 1899, or any subsequent fifth year.

This contract was terminated in 1899 and a fresh contract entered into for 20 years on slightly different terms. At the end of this contract a fresh contract was entered into for five years which will expire on 31st December 1924.

(ii) So far as Government are aware no such declaration was made at the time of the earlier renewals of the contract.

The Honourable Member is, however, referred to the proceedings of the Imperial Legislative Council on 7th March 1919 when in reply to a question by the Honourable Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma Government stated that the Secretary of State had agreed that on the termination of the contract on 31st December 1924 the direction would be transferred to India either under State or efficient Company management.

(2) Before deciding to renew the contract on each occasion Government took all relevant facts into consideration.

(3) and (4) Government are not prepared to make a statement on the matter at the present juncture but the Assembly will shortly have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on this subject.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Has the five-year limit of agreement been found to be attended with any difficulties either by the Company or by the Government, or has it been considered necessary by either side that the period of renewal must be larger?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I think that is a question of opinion.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Has any opinion been expressed by either side?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I am not prepared to enter into a discussion on this subject at present as the House will have a full opportunity of discussing it later on.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is the answer to the question asked by my Honourable friend in the negative or in the positive?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: That is the decision given with reference to the Honourable Mr. Sarma's question that the Board of management should be transferred. Does it hold good even now with regard to all railways whose contracts may come to an end?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I understand that the declaration of the Secretary of State is still in force.

CLERKSHIP APPOINTMENTS, ETC., ON E. B. RAILWAY.

216. Mr. K. Ahmed: (1) With reference to my question dated the 15th September, 1921, will the Government be pleased to explain in full how the register of qualified candidates is kept in the Eastern Bengal Railway and how the names of the candidates for clerkship and other appointments are registered and by what officers-in-charge of the Railway Administration?

(2) Will the Government be pleased to state the names and designation of Members of the Selection Committee and explain in full their different grades of the officers and clerks of the department appointed since 1921 to December, 1922, giving their names, explaining in full the reasons of their selection in comparison to others who were not selected?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (1) The Government do not think it necessary to call for a report from the Agent on these points.

(2) As explained to the Honourable Member in the reply to his previous question No. 222 put on 15th September 1921—the Selection Committee is intended to deal with appointments of officers only. It has not yet been constituted as the existing arrangements will apply in the case of students passing out of the Engineering College up to the end of the year 1923.

OFFICIALS AND CLERKS ON E. I. AND B. N. RAILWAYS.

217. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) In continuation of my question put on the 15th September, 1921, being the question No. 207, will the Government be pleased to state the number of officials and clerks of different grades respectively appointed since then up to December, 1922, and how many among them are Hindus, Muhammadans, Europeans and Anglo-Indians in the East Indian and Bengal Nagpur Railway office?

(ii) Will the Government be pleased to state how many applications were made by writing or otherwise for such appointment to the Railway office and disposed of giving full particulars regarding the test for their selection in comparison to others who were not selected?

(iii) Will the Government be pleased to state whether all the applications for appointment are received by any responsible officer or officers or the chief clerk (Bara Babu).

(iv) Do Government propose, in the interest of the public to find out method or methods by which all the applicants' names without any prejudice may be written in some office book ensuring easy access without any interference to applicants whether any post is vacant or not and whenever vacancies occur, claims of all the applicants may be considered duly and equitably so that proper men may get the appointment?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government has no information in respect to individual appointments on Company managed railways which are made at the discretion, and in accordance with the rules of the Company concerned.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government of India be pleased to take proper steps to introduce methods which will allow the people of India to get justice done to them for the purpose of getting service or for the purpose of being taken into the service of the company?

(There was no reply from the Government Benches).

Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to state in full giving all the details of the expenses incurred up to 31st December, 1922, from the very beginning on account of the Incheape Committee item by item and the purpose for which the money was spent including the allowance given to each member of the Committee and to each of the witnesses examined with their respective names?

SCOPE OF INCSCAPE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

219. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Is it a fact that the Inchcape Committee has not been empowered to report on all the subjects fit for retrenchment and that the Secretary of State has not given the Members of the Committee entire discretion to submit their independent report in the matter of retrenchment in all the departments under the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The terms of reference to the Committee were published in the press and were as follows:

' To make recommendations to the Government of India for effecting forthwith all possible reductions in the expenditure of the Central Government, having regard especially to the present financial position and outlook. In so far as questions of policy are involved in the expenditure under discussion, these will be left for the exclusive consideration of the Government, but it will be open to the Committee to review the expenditure and to indicate the economies which might be effected if particular policies were either adopted, abandoned, or modified.'

It will be seen that these terms of reference are substantially identical with those adopted for the Geddes Committee which recently sat in the United Kingdom.

There is no limitation whatever on the Committee's powers of investigation.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: May I ask when this Report will be out or likely to be out.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am afraid I cannot answer that absolutely categorically but there is every expectation that it will be in the hands of the Government before the Budget.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Will the Report be placed before the Assembly for discussion?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: That question was answered, I think, in an unstarred question that was asked on the 15th instant. The question was whether the Report of the Inchcape Committee will be placed for discussion in the Assembly before any final orders are passed by the Government. The answer was that the Government regret that this course is not practicable.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask whether the Inchcape Committee will consider the railway expenditure of both State managed railways as well as Company managed railways.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: There is no limitation whatever on the terms of reference of the Committee's powers of investigation.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask whether the Committee propose to consider railway expenditure?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: They are, I believe, considering railway expenditure.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Have the Committee examined any witnesses or representatives from the Assembly?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: My answer must be in the interrogative.

SECRETARY OF STATE'S INSTRUCTIONS RE INCHEAPE COMMITTEE.

220. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of each of the instructions given to the Government of India or to the Inchcape Committee and the Members of it regarding the scope of the work and the departments of the Government on which the report for retrenchment is asked for by the Secretary of State?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: There are no instructions other than those given in the terms of reference.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government of India be pleased to lay on the table the subject matter of the discussion?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Honourable Member has anticipated question No. 221, the answer to which is that the Government regret that they cannot comply with this request.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Why is good money thrown out? Are the representatives of the people of India in this Assembly entitled to know?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am afraid I did not succeed in quite catching the question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government of India be pleased to lay on the table the subject matter of the discussion so that the Honourable Members of this House who are elected and nominated may know the exact situation with regard to recommendations of the Inchcape Committee who are holding meetings in camera and the public are not to see what is happening there?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I trust that every opportunity will arise in this House during the Budget to discuss in this camera the whole question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: That is like the reply which Mr. Hindley gave to the question on the North Bengal flood. We want a precise answer to the question.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I have done my best to give a precise answer, and if I have followed the admirable example of Mr. Hindley, I do not think I can do better.

RETRENCHMENT PROPOSALS.

221. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table all the communication by wireless, cable, and post passed on the subject of retrenchment between the Secretary of State and the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Government regret that they cannot comply with this request.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

222. Mr. K. Ahmed: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state the names of all the people who as members of the League of Nations, representing India, are now engaged in the Conference held abroad and why not a single Mohamedan representing the Muslim population of India is being hitherto selected to take part in the discussions concerning their community both religious and political and otherwise?

(2) Is it a fact that the Government of India have selected non-Mohamedan Members from India to take part in the discussions of the Conference of the League of Nations abroad and thereby have categorically left off the Mohamedan interest to be protected thereto?

(3) Are the Government aware that a Conference of the representatives of Islam to settle questions regarding the khilafat is under contemplation by the Kemalists and that the Mohamedans of India will be invited to send in their representatives immediately to take part in the discussions which would be held at Angora?

(4) Do Government propose immediately to select suitable Mohamedan Member or Members having the confidence of the community and send them to take part in the League of Nations?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (1) India's representatives on the 3rd Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva were—

(1) Lord Chelmsford,

(2) His Highness the Maharaja of Nawanager, and

(3) Sir Sivaswamy Aiyar.

I must emphasise that the Indian representatives are chosen to represent India as a whole and not any particular community.

(2) No.

(3) Government are aware that there have been reports to this effect in the press but the suggested Conference has of course no connection with the League of Nations.

(4) The 3rd Assembly of the League has now closed. The Honourable Member will understand that when representatives are again nominated the same criterion must be employed as before, namely, fitness to represent India as a whole, but I need not add that should any topic of particular interests to Muhammadans be likely to come up for discussion the advisability of including a representative from among Indian Muslims will not be overlooked.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Are the Government of India aware that in London the Moslem League claimed that at least there should be two representatives elected by the Council of State and the Assembly and it wanted that the Government of India will accede to that and send the representatives?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am aware of the facts mentioned by Mr. Kabir-ud-din Ahmed. But I am also aware that when the matter was discussed in this Assembly, it was not of the same opinion as the Moslem League regarding representative by election.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Was there an article ten days ago published on the 13th by the Allahabad paper 'Independent' in which it was said that General Wali Khan who is not an Indian was alleged to have represented India?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If there was such an article, it is entirely inaccurate. No General Wali Khan was sent to represent India.

Mr. K. Ahmed: That is what the article said and I wanted to ascertain and verify the facts.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BHURGRI.

223. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to state the reason or reasons why the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri has tendered his resignation refusing to act as a member of the Council of State any longer and lay on the table the whole correspondence that has passed between him and the Government of India or the Governor General or the Viceroy and the references which are available from the office of the Home Department?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Mr. Bhurgri addressed no communication to the Government of India on the subject of his resignation. There is, therefore, no correspondence between the Government of India and Mr. Bhurgri which can be laid on the table. Mr. Bhurgri tendered his resignation by means of a telegram addressed to His Excellency the Viceroy. The Government of India are not in a position to lay a copy of this telegram on the table.

Mr. K. Ahmed: On the 14th of November last a paper called "The Servant," a Calcutta paper, Sir, published this: "Mr. Bhurgri, while in England, resigned his Membership of the Council of State as a protest against Mr. Lloyd George's pro-Greek policy and his resignation was held by the anti-war Press as a timely warning reflecting the Indian position."

Mr. Deputy President: That is not a question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is not that the reason, Sir?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I would suggest to the Honourable Member that he should ask Mr. Bhurgri.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I am sorry, but I am entitled to an answer, according to the rules of this Assembly, from the Honourable Member representing the Government.

ACCOMMODATION FOR LASCARS.

224. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Are the Government aware that in the House of Commons on the 11th December, 1922 Mr. Gilbert, National Liberal Member of Southwark asked the President of the Board of Trade whether Steamship Companies who bring Lascar Crews to British Home ports are under liability to provide house accommodation and food to either discharged or waiting crews of Eastern Origin, and the reply was given by the Under Secretary of State, Earl Winterton, stating that there is room for considerable improvement in the accommodation available for Lascar Seamen at the London Docks?

(ii) Do Government propose amending their answer in answer to my question No. 378 dated the 8th March, 1921 at page 591 put in the Assembly, in view of the reply given by Earl Winterton, the Under Secretary of State in the House of Commons as above?

(iii) Will the Government be pleased to state or otherwise consider whether they will follow the same course in the case of Indian Seamen regarding house accommodation for them in all the ports of India including Home or foreign as was promised by the Under Secretary of State for white seamen in various ports?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) Yes.

(ii) and (iii) The Government have nothing to add to the answer referred to by the Honourable Member.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Honourable Member make a statement to this House showing that he is ready and willing to place on the table of this Assembly for the benefit of the public any account or description they might come to have, after enquiry is made with regard to the subject in question involved in No. 224, (i), (ii) and (iii)?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): The Government of India do not propose to make any enquiry.

WAGES, ALLOWANCES, ETC., OF INDIAN AND EUROPEAN SEAMEN.

225. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to state giving full particulars, the difference between Indian Seamen and European Seamen regarding their monthly wages, allowances, outfits, accommodations and quality, quantity and prices of food supplied to them per day and the number of hours they work on board the vessels both Mercantile and those chartered by the Government?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Honourable Member will find the information he wants regarding Indian seamen in section 70 of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1859, and in the Lascar Agreements. I am afraid that I cannot undertake to supply him with the required information regarding European seamen but if he desires to study the subject, I shall be happy to place at his disposal such books of reference as the Commerce Department Library contains.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I am very much obliged to my Honourable friend, but will he be good enough to take the trouble to ameliorate the condition of the poor Indian seamen through the Department of which my Honourable friend is the Member?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: We are always prepared to consider specific grievances brought to our notice.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will my Honourable friend explicitly say how and when he is going to do that?

DEMANDS OF INDIAN SEAMEN.

226. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Is it a fact that Indian Seamen engaged in Indian ports while going to foreign ports in vessels frequently visiting ports which are much colder than Indian ports, ask for warm clothing, rich food, cabin and saloon accommodations similar to those provided for European Crews along with their higher salaries and that in spite of promises made by the Captains and other persons in authority, their requirements have not been complied with?

(ii) Will the Government be pleased to state on enquiry from the Calcutta Shipping Office how many cases or instances have occurred mentioning the names of vessels and their agents during the last five years up to 1922 in which the demands mentioned as above have been made by the Indian Seamen and in spite of promises of Captains and other persons in authority specially regarding the increment of pay, the said demands have not been complied with?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Honourable Member is probably referring to the fact that Indian seamen may not be taken during the winter months to ports on the East Coast of America North of 38°

North latitude except under special agreements voluntarily undertaken. These special agreements provide for special clothing and special heating of the Seamen's quarters. In the circumstances the Government are not prepared to make the enquiry suggested in part (ii) of the question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: May I state one or two names of steamers in which Indian seamen have been engaged through men registered under the Shipping Act both in Calcutta and Bombay and elsewhere also and when they arrived at the foreign ports and ask for higher wages. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid I cannot allow the Honourable Member to make a speech.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I am not making a speech, Sir—and the Captain of the steamer, it was the Steam Ship s. s. Hatipura or Hatinara; there is another steamer, Sir, under the agency of Messrs. Shaw Wallace and Co., a big office in Calcutta,—they entered into a fresh contract only last year that they will pay 50 per cent. more than the salary. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: I think, I asked the Honourable Member to abstain from making a speech. If, after hearing the reply to his question, he thinks that the statement is of great importance, I think it might well form the subject matter of another question.

(Mr. K. Ahmed again rose.)

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order.

SEAMEN RECRUITMENT COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

227. Mr. K. Ahmed: (i) Are the Government aware of the Report of a meeting of the Indian Seamen's Union, Calcutta, published in the issues of the Statesman and the Amrita Bazar Patrika dated the 5th December last in which the Union urged the Government to take immediate steps to give effect to the Recommendations contained in the Reports of the Seamen's Recruitment Committee in non-compliance of which it has been declared that there will be a Seamen's Strike?

(ii) (a) Do Government propose in the interest of the country to expedite the enforcement of the Recommendations of the Seamen's Recruitment Committee immediately during this Session without waiting any longer?

(b) If the answer be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state whether they are going to introduce Legislation embodying the Recommendations of the Committee in this Session?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) Yes.

(ii) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the answer given on the 7th September last to a similar question asked by Mr. Joshi. The Government of India are still awaiting the views of the Governments of Bengal and Bombay on the recommendations of the Committee and until these have been received they are unable to make any statement on the subject.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact, Sir, that in the report submitted last May and published in the Gazette of India dated May 27th 1922, the majority of the Committee Members state this: "The proposals of the Committee will be examined at once in consultation with the Maritime Local Governments?"

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: They were examined at once, and they were referred after a very short period of time to the two maritime Local Governments whose names I have given.

MR. S. K. GHOSE, SHIPPING BROKER.

228. *Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Is it a fact that the Government of Bengal after the termination of the sittings of the Seamen's Recruitment Committee in March 1922 appointed a new Shipping Broker in the person of Mr. S. K. Ghose in contravention of the recommendations of the said Committee and that the said new Shipping Broker of Calcutta is a relation of one of the nominated Labour Members of the Bengal Council who had recommended him?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to state whether they received any resolution of protest from the Indian Seamen's Union, Calcutta against the appointment of Mr. S. K. Ghose as the new Shipping Broker in the port of Calcutta by the Government of Bengal?

(c) If so, what steps the Government have taken for his removal?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the answer given on the 26th September 1922 to a somewhat similar question (No. 230) asked by Mr. Hussanally. Mr. S. K. Ghose was recommended by a Member of the Bengal Council, but the Government of India do not know whether they are in any way related. As already explained, the new broker was appointed purely as a temporary measure by the Government of Bengal, pending a decision on the recommendations of the Seamen's Recruitment Committee. The appointment was made by the Government of Bengal in the interests of the seamen themselves in order to break an existing monopoly, and the Government of India do not propose to take any action.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Honourable Member explain the reasons why the Government of Bengal made this temporary appointment?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government of India take steps, Sir, for the removal of that broker according to the terms of the Committee's report?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No, Sir.

EMPLOYMENT OF LASCARS AND CASUALTIES IN THE GREAT WAR.

229. *Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to answer my question No. 198 re Indian Seamen and lascars put in the Assembly on the 7th September 1922 as early as possible giving all the particulars in full?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The answer to question No. 198, dated the 7th September 1922, was sent to the Honourable Member on the 11th January 1923, and will now be laid on the table.†

† The statement will be printed in the next issue of these Debates.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I want a ruling from the Chair. Suppose, certain questions are put by an Honourable Member. The Honourable Member gets a demi-official letter written by a certain Department of the Government of India saying "would you be good enough to withdraw the question,—I shall be very much thankful in case you approve of the terms set forth in the letter" instead of his answering the question publicly in the open Assembly for the benefit of the country?

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid the Chair can take no notice of private correspondence between the two Honourable Members.

Mr. K. Ahmed: No, Sir. I think you have caught hold of the wrong end of the stick. What I am asking is whether a starred question put by an Honourable Member of this Assembly should not be answered openly in the Assembly for the benefit of the Members and the country and not in a demi-official letter, in which the Department writes to the individual and asks him to be good enough to withdraw the question instead of troubling the Honourable Member in charge of the Department to answer it.

Mr. Deputy President: I can add nothing to what I have said before.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I want to inquire from Government, whether they approve of the practice which is growing in this House of not answering questions in the House but sending the information to the Member?

The Honourable Mr. G. A. Innes: May I say, Sir, that that practice has been adopted solely in the interests of economy and to avoid printing charges. In regard to this particular question, I am certainly prepared to lay the answer on the table in order that Honourable Members may see it in the printed proceedings; but I may point out to the Honourable Member that if I had taken that course it would not have enabled him to ask the supplementary questions on which he was so keen.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I think this point has already been decided. Mr. K. C. Neogy met the argument of my Honourable friend, Sir William Vincent, and it was decided by this Assembly that all the questions would be answered in the House. The excuse brought forward by my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, therefore, will not hold water. It is not a question of space but the irregularity and error which my Honourable friend's Department committed, and they were accused of the same thing by Mr. Neogy. So far as printing charges are concerned, they have printed this long syllabus instead of taking the trouble of answering the question. I think we come within the four corners of the principle then decided and are entitled to have everything published in the proceedings; there is no getting out of it. May I ask, Sir, that the answer read out by my Honourable friend from his papers and the demi-official letter written to me by one Mr. E. Rogers of his Department. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: I think the Honourable Member has already intimated his intention of having the answer published and laid on the table.

Mr. K. Ahmed: When Sir? Will that question be put down again for answer?

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: May I ask if it is a fact, as stated by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ahmed, that he was asked by demi-official letter to withdraw his question?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I understand that one of the officers of my Department got this question after the information required by Mr. Ahmed had been sent to him, and he wrote to Mr. Ahmed and asked whether in those circumstances he still wished the question answered. Those are the facts of the case.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I place the letter in the Assembly.

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid I cannot allow the Honourable Member to go into that question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Could not that question be threshed out in this Assembly, so that we may have a ruling from the Chair?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Might I suggest that a general question of this nature could better be brought up on a motion, or by special leave at a convenient time and need not delay the House during question time.

Mr. Deputy President: I hope the Honourable Member will take the advice of the Leader of the House and bring this matter up on a formal motion or through a separate question.

LICENSED SHIPPING BROKERS.

230. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to state how many Licensed Shipping Brokers are there in the ports of Calcutta, Bombay, Rangoon, Madras and Karachi and the time when the licenses of these brokers commenced and terminated during the years of 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922 giving full particulars of any period when their licenses were in abeyance and they had acted as broker or brokers; and how many licenses were renewed each year and who renewed them giving full particulars of the same?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Since the licensed brokers system has recently been the subject of enquiry by a special committee and since the question of discontinuing that system is now under correspondence with Maritime Local Governments, the Government of India do not think it necessary to put those Local Governments to the trouble of collecting and supplying the information required by the Honourable Member.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Was it not illegal for a broker without a licence to supply seamen?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: If a shipping broker committed any illegal act the person aggrieved had a remedy in the Courts of law.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not for the Government of India to prosecute them, Sir, without leaving it to other people?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No, Sir. The Mercantile Shipping Acts are administered by Local Governments.

DEPUTY SHIPPING MASTER, CALCUTTA—DISSATISFACTION AGAINST.

231. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware that the Indian Seamen's Union, Calcutta, dated 8th December 1922 passed a resolution declaring that the present Deputy Shipping Master, Calcutta be immediately recalled Home, removed or transferred as his office was not for the purpose of facilitating appointments of Seamen and also for their interest and benefit?

(b) If the answer be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state the reasons for such dissatisfaction of the Seamen?

(c) Will the Government be pleased to state what action the Government have taken in the matter, if there be any?

COMPLAINT AGAINST DEPUTY SHIPPING MASTER.

232. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether they received a petition signed by some 400 Seamen of Calcutta complaining against the Deputy Shipping Master for his treatment towards the seamen in general?

(b) If so, what action the Government have taken or propose to take in the matter.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes. I will answer the preceding question at the same time as this.

(b) and (c) The Government of India recently received an English translation of a petition signed by certain seamen in Calcutta in which it was alleged that the Shipping Master and the Deputy Shipping Master were unsympathetic and took the side of the shipping brokers. The petition has been returned for submission through the prescribed channel, i.e., the local Government.

INDIAN SEAMEN IN THE GREAT WAR.

233. Mr. K. Ahmed: In continuation of my question No. 198, dated the 7th September, 1922, regarding the number of Indian Seamen engaged from all the Indian ports in foreign ships registered from the United Kingdom, as well as in ships registered under the Indian Registration of Ships Act, 1841 and the Indian Steam Vessels Act, 1917, will the Government be pleased to state how many seamen were engaged in 1921-1922 from each of the ports in India including the number of Indian Seamen who were killed during the last European War in the Merchant Ships as well as the ships chartered by the Government?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Particulars of the numbers of Indian seamen killed during the European War and also of the number of such seamen shipped from Bombay and Calcutta during 1921-22 were supplied to the Honourable Member on the 11th instant in response to question No. 198, dated the 7th September 1922. They will now be laid on the table.† Information relating to recruitment from Karachi and from the other ports (except Bombay) in the Bombay Presidency is not available, while there was no recruitment either from Rangoon or from Madras.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, with reference to the demi-official letter in connection with this question No. 233, it states that there were 1,200 seamen captured and imprisoned in the enemy countries. I want to ask a test question. You see, Sir, there are two double zeros after the figure 12. Whether it would not be a few less or a few more than 1,200 if the Honourable Member is prepared to answer?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I understand, Sir, that the information supplied to the Honourable Member was correct to the best of the Commerce Department's knowledge.

† The statement will be printed in the next issue of these Debates.

COMPENSATION TO INDIAN SEAMEN.

284. Mr. K. Ahmed: (a) Are the Government aware that the dependants of seamen in England killed in the War received pensions and compensations and that in addition they are getting a share of German Reparation Award?

(b) Do Government propose to follow the same principle in dividing the same Reparation Award among the dependants of the Indian Seamen instead of transferring the same to the different funds?

GERMAN REPARATION AWARD FOR SEAMEN.

235. Mr. K. Ahmed: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table all the correspondence that may have passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State regarding the German Reparation Award for Seamen and the matters ancillary thereto?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I will answer the preceding question at the same time as this.

The suggestion in part (a) of the Honourable Member's question is not correct; and as a report appears to be current among Indian Seamen that in addition to receiving pensions dependants of British Merchant Seamen killed in the war are receiving compensation from German reparations, the Government of India take this opportunity of clearing up the matter. The facts are as follows:—In 1921 His Majesty's Government decided that a sum of five millions sterling should be devoted to the payment of compensation for "Suffering and Damage by enemy action." It was originally intended that the expenditure should be met from reparation claims. But in January 1922 His Majesty's Government decided not to wait to see whether any payments would be received on reparation account from Germany, and they provided the promised sum of five millions sterling in the Civil Service estimates partly for 1921-22 and partly for the current year. A Royal Commission was then appointed to consider claims. As I have said, the sum was provided for compensation for suffering and damage by enemy action, but the Commission decided that in the first instance they would recommend grants in specially necessitous cases, whether among seamen and their dependants or among other classes of the population. It will be seen that it has not been decided to earmark any portion of reparation payments for distribution specially to British seamen, and in the circumstances neither part (b) of the Honourable Member's question or his succeeding question arise.

FRANCHISE FOR INDIANS IN KENYA.

236. Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether they have received any communication from Indians living in Kenya relating to the exercise of franchise by them at the ensuing election for the Legislative Council?

(b) Whether the Government has addressed the Secretary of State on the subject and if so, would the Government be prepared to lay on the table of the House a copy of the communication, if any, addressed by them?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Yes.

(b) The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given by me on the 15th instant to a similar question asked by Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas in which I stated the substance of the telegram addressed by the Government of India to the Secretary of State. Government are not prepared to lay the correspondence on the table at the present stage.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Has any reply been received from the Secretary of State in regard to any representation made by the Government of India on the subject?

Mr. J. Hullah: Yes.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Are the Government aware that the conditions are getting very acute in that colony?

Mr. J. Hullah: Yes, certainly judging from newspaper reports.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Are the Government taking proper steps to protect the interests of Indians there?

Mr. J. Hullah: Yes.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Are the Government prepared to state the substance of the reply of the Secretary of State?

Mr. J. Hullah: No; but I can say that the Secretary of State is working in complete accord with the Government of India.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Is there any likelihood of Government yielding to the threat held out by the European community that if the claim of the Indian community to the franchise is accepted they will resort to violence?

Mr. J. Hullah: No such threat has been communicated to the Government of India.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: It has not been communicated to the Government of India, but has the Honourable Member read the telegram purporting to the effect that that threat has been held out by the European community?

Mr. J. Hullah: Yes, I have seen a telegram of that kind in the press.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Has the Government impressed on the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for the Colonies that any attempt at whittling down the rights of the Indian Community would be subversive of the Resolution of the Imperial Conference of 1921?

Mr. J. Hullah: Certainly, we have done that.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: In view of the fact that Government are aware of this information, although they have not received it officially, are the Government prepared to take any action in the matter or send any communication to the Secretary of State as to the threat held out by the European community?

Mr. J. Hullah: Yes, Government will certainly consider, and consider immediately, the advisability of making such a communication.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Will the Government of India communicate to the Governor of the colony its opinion that care should be taken to protect the lives of the Indians in the colony against violence. Will the Government take proper steps to protect the domiciled Indians there against the contemplated violent action of the European settlers there?

Mr. J. Hullah: We should certainly take steps if we had any reason to believe that there was serious danger of violence, but we have received no information of the kind.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Has the Government of India received a telegram addressed to His Excellency the Viceroy by the Indian Congress where they appeal for protection to His Excellency Lord Reading?

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: We propose to communicate to the Secretary of State the feeling of the House and the feeling of the Indian community to see that all that can be done is done.

FOUR-WHEELER COACHES.

237. Mr. N. M. Joshi: What is the number of coaches, in terms of four-wheelers, which do not normally form part of the daily passenger carrying trains and their cost?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I am sorry that I cannot answer this question for I do not know precisely what information the Honourable Member requires. If he will let me know later what information he wants I will endeavour to supply it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: What I want to know is this. There is a lot of rolling stock of passenger trains which is not used daily. I want to know what the number of such stock is.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I beg to suggest that if the Honourable Member will perhaps discuss this matter with me, I shall be able to explain the difficulties and then if he will make a specific request, I will give him any information in my power.

MANAGEMENT OF E. I. AND G. I. P. RAILWAYS.

238. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Do Government propose to place their proposals regarding the future management of the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways before the Legislative Assembly during the current session?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: In accordance with the undertaking given by the Government in the Legislative Assembly on the 7th September 1922 in the course of the discussion on the Resolution relating to the revision of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, moved by Moulvi Miyan Asjad-ullah, a Government day will be given during the current session of the Legislative Assembly for the discussion of that Resolution. Notice has been given of amendments to that Resolution which will give the Assembly an opportunity of discussing the future management of the two Railways mentioned.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Will that date be before the other Resolution by Government about the separation of Railway and ordinary Budget is taken up? Will an opportunity be given to the Assembly before that?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We have not yet settled our dates, but we shall do so as soon as possible. I may remind the House that at present we have great difficulty in settling them owing to the delay in disposing of the Criminal Procedure Code Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: My question was whether the discussion will be before the other question is taken up.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I cannot give any indication at present of the date. We will consider the point and let the Honourable Member and the House know as soon as possible.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Do I understand that the Government is not in a position to chalk out the whole programme of this session, because I intended to put a question before the commencement of business to-day whether we will be in a position to know, so that we may regulate our movements accordingly.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We should be very glad, if we could give such information to the Honourable Member which would enable him to regulate his movements; but at present we are unable to say even whether the session will terminate in March or not. At our present rate of progress it appears not impossible that we may have to sit through April and possibly through part of May.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: I want to know whether the Governor General in Council has fixed the date under the Standing Orders for the introduction of the Budget.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Yes, Sir. It is the usual date, 1st of March.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Coming back to the original question, will the Government kindly make a note of this point that many of the Members of this House desire that the discussion of the question of State versus Company management of Railways should precede the discussion on the question of the separation of the Railway Budget.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I will certainly take note of that and will discuss it with the Honourable the Leader of the House.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact distinctly understood by the Member of the Assembly and my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, that the earliest date will be fixed for the discussion of this Resolution which was moved by my Honourable friend Miyan Asjad-ullah and I, Sir, objected when the Home Member said that there will be an adjournment of this at the next November Session, which has not been held at all, the reason for which is obvious to the Honourable Member. Under these circumstances are we not entitled to have the earliest date fixed for the discussion of this Resolution, viz., Company versus State management.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Without entering into further discussion, I might say that we shall do our best in the circumstances to give the House as early a date as possible.

TEMPLES AT PAHARGUNJ, DELHI.

299. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the proceedings of the All-India Hindu Maha-

Sabha held at Gaya on 31st December last regarding the demolition of the temples situate within the area proposed to be included in the New Railway station at Pahar Gunj, Delhi?

(b) How many temples and Dharmshalas appertaining to the temples were there within the said area?

(c) Has any of the said temples or Dharmshalas or any portion thereof been demolished; if so, to what extent and by whose order?

(d) Has any body been consulted in the matter?

(e) What do the Government propose to do in the matter now?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) No.

(b) Six temples and one dharamsala.

(c) No.

(d) Yes. All those who claimed to be interested in the matter and who approached the Chief Commissioner, Deputy Commissioner, or the Engineer-in-Chief have been consulted.

(e) Nothing at present.

PILFERING AND COMPLAINTS ON N. W. RAILWAY.

240. Dr. Nand Lal: 1. Is Government of India aware that

(a) there is a great deal of pilfering on the North Western Railway;

(b) there is a general complaint in respect of overcrowding in the third class carriages;

(c) there is a great inconvenience to women and children travelling in the third class.

2. If answer to question No. 1 be in affirmative, then will they be pleased to state as to what steps they have taken to put an end to them (pilfering, complaints, and inconvenience)?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Government are not aware that there is a great deal of pilfering on the North-Western Railway. Cases of pilferage occur on the North-Western Railway but they are not peculiar to that Railway. The subject of prevalence of theft and pilferage on railways and the measures for remedying the evil were examined in detail by the Railway Police Committee in 1921 and steps have been taken by the railways on the basis of the recommendations made by the Police Committee. Copies of the Committee's Report are available in the Library.

(b) and (c) The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given on 16th January 1923 to item (b) of starred question No. 92 asked by Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha in a similar connection.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Does that answer imply that the recommendations made by the Railway Police Committee have been acted on by the Railways?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I am not prepared to say they have all been acted on. They have all been considered, and will be acted on if necessary.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Is there any improvement in regard to pilfering since the report of the Committee?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: I am afraid I have no figures to substantiate that point one way or the other.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I personally know there has not been. A motor car fittings were pilfered the other day.

PRESENTS TAKEN BY TRAFFIC INSPECTORS.

241. Dr. Nand Lal: 1. Is Government of India aware that some of the Traffic Inspectors on the North Western Railway take a periodical allowance, in the form of presents or pecuniary gratifications, from some of the Station Masters, excepting those who are posted at principal and very important stations?

2. If answer to question No. 1 be in affirmative, will they be pleased to state as to what step they have taken to put an end to it?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The Government regret that a sweeping allegation of this kind should have been made against a whole class of Railway servants. If the Honourable Member has charges of corruption to make against individual Traffic Inspectors, the Government trust that he will make them to the Agent. The charges will then be investigated and suitable action taken if necessary.

INCREASE IN RAILWAY FARES.

242. Dr. Nand Lal: (i) Will Government be pleased to state as to whether the last increase in the Railway fare of the third class has effected any appreciable increase in the revenue? If so, what is the amount of that increase up to the end of December 1922?

(ii) Will Government be pleased to state as to whether the last increase in the Second Class Railway fare has effected any appreciable increase in the revenue? If so, what is the amount of that increase up to the end of December 1922?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The Honourable Member is referred to the answer to a somewhat similar question, viz., No. 150 asked by Mr. P. L. Misra on the 17th instant. The Government hope to collect shortly more detailed figures and on receipt of them, they will be able to give to the Honourable Member the information he requires.

DISCONTINUANCE OF RAILWAY RETURN TICKETS.

243. Dr. Nand Lal: Will the Government be pleased to state as to whether the last discontinuance of Second and First Class Return tickets has occasioned any appreciable increase in the revenue? If so, what is the total amount thereof?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The revenue derived from 1st and 2nd class passenger traffic increased year by year from 1915-16 to 1921-22. The extent to which the abolition of 1st and 2nd class return tickets at less than two single fares contributed to this increase cannot be estimated, owing to factors being involved, the effect of which cannot be calculated.

FEMALE TICKET COLLECTORS.

244. Dr. Nand Lal: Will the Government be pleased to state as to whether there are female ticket collectors at every principal and important Junction Stations?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: Women ticket collectors are employed at the larger railway stations situated in Upper India where tickets are checked. Their employment on railways in other parts of India and in Burma is generally speaking not considered necessary.

SUPPLY OF WAGONS TO TRADERS.

245. Dr. Nand Lal: Is the Government aware that, at many Railway Stations of the North Western Railway, Traders and Merchants cannot get wagons till they pay in the form of bribe to the Station Masters or Goods Clerks?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The Government of India are of course aware of the remarks of the Acworth Committee on the subject of irregularities on the distribution of wagons. The matter is one which has been receiving the careful attention of the Railway Board. The systems of registration in force on the various railways have been under examination and are now under trial. The matter has also been taken up by the Indian Railway Conference Association. Further steps will be taken as is found possible in consultation with the Railway Administrations.

CORRUPTION IN THE SERVICES.

246. Dr. Nand Lal: 1. Is Government aware that there is corruption in

(a) Railway Department—both Traffic and Engineering?

(b) Commissariat Department?

(2) If the answer to question No. 1 be in affirmative, will Government be pleased to state as to what effective measures they have taken to put an end to it?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: As regards the Railway Department the Honourable Member is referred to the reply given in the previous question.

To enable Government to answer satisfactorily that part of the question which relates to the "Commissariat Department", it has been necessary to make certain enquiries, the result of which will be communicated to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

CREW SYSTEM OF CHECKING TICKETS.

247. Dr. Nand Lal: (a) Is Government of India aware that the Railway Department, though it is according to section 60 of the Indian Railways Act, required to collect Tickets from passengers at the end of journey or near that, have, in the Lahore District of the North Western Railway, recently introduced a new system, called the Crew System, according to which seven or eight Ticket Collectors and an Inspector are put in charge of a train at the starting station in order to collect tickets, and check the train at each station giving little chits, as substitutes or tokens, for the collected tickets?

(b) Is the Government of India aware that no female ticket collectors are provided under the new Crew System?

(c) Is the Government of India aware that some passengers and a Municipal Commissioner of Wazirabad complained against this new system some months back?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government have no information. Enquiry will be made from the Agent, North-Western Railway, and the result communicated in due course.

WATERING STAFF ON N. W. RAILWAY.

248. Dr. Nand Lal: (a) Is Government of India aware that only 58 extra watermen were employed for supplying water to trains on the Lahore District of the North Western Railway, last summer, whereas 80 watermen used to be employed in the previous years?

(b) Is Government of India aware that the Traffic Department of the North Western Railway dismissed, in the Lahore District, water staff at many roadside stations, barring a few principal ones?

(c) Is Government of India aware that this dismissal of watering staff caused great trouble to the third class passengers?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Government of India presume that if the facts are as stated the Agent was satisfied that the reduction in the staff would cause no inconvenience to the public. They are however forwarding the Honourable Member's question to him in order that he may reconsider the matter if he thinks it necessary so to do.

REVENUE FOLLOWING ON CHANGE IN POSTAL RATES.

249. Dr. Nand Lal: (1) Will Government of India be pleased to state as to whether the last abolition of pice post cards has occasioned some increase or decrease in the Revenue, giving in either case an approximate amount of such increase or decrease.

(2) Will Government of India be pleased to state as to whether the last increase in postage stamps on letters, namely, from half an anna to one anna, has brought about some increase in Revenue and if so, what is the approximate increase, and if there is a decrease in consequence thereof, then, what is the amount thereof up to the end of December 1922.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (1) and (2) Separate information regarding the revenue from the sale of postcards is not available, but it may be stated that the gross amount realised from the sale of ordinary postage stamps and postal stationery of all kinds for the period from April to December 1922 was Rs. 5,03,88,000 as compared with Rs. 4,77,04,481 for the corresponding period of 1921.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: May I inquire if the anticipated income has been realised?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, it is difficult to state at this particular period of the year whether the anticipated revenue on the Posts and Telegraphs combined will be fully realised, but I can inform the House this much, that it is likely that the profits on the two branches taken together will amount to over 30 lakhs of rupees as compared with the deficit which would have occurred had this Honourable House not had the foresight to increase the postal rates from a quarter anna to half an anna for post cards and from a half anna to one anna for letters.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: What has been the total cost of reprinting and labelling to be deducted from this Rs. 30 lakhs?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crockshank: I shall be much obliged if notice can be given of that question.

DR. JIWAN LAL, BUSHIRE.

250. *Dr. Nand Lal: 1. Is Government of India aware—

- (a) that one Doctor Jiwan Lal, Sub-Assistant Surgeon, Military Indian Station Hospital, Bushire (Persian Gulf) was convicted and sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment in May 1922, under the charge of tampering with the loyalty of the troops, by the Court Martial;
- (b) that the convict was transferred to some Jail in India;
- (c) that the relations (brothers) of the convict addressed the Government of India begging to be informed as to where the convict was;
- (d) that his brothers are anxious to know whether he is living;
- (e) that the convict was an inexperienced youth.

(2) If the answer to question No. 1 be in affirmative, will Government be pleased to state as to whether the convict is living and if so, in what Jail he is.

Mr. E. Burdon: (1) and (2) Government are aware that Dr. Jiwan Lal was convicted of the offence mentioned by the Honourable Member. As far as their present information goes, he is in Thana Jail, Bombay Presidency, to which he was transferred from Bushire. I will ascertain definitely whether he is still in Thana Jail, and I will inform the Honourable Member of the result.

IMPRISONMENT OF PAIRA BHAN, CHAUDHURI NIRMAL DAS AND DEVI DAS OF DERA ISMAIL KHAN.

251. *Dr. Nand Lal: 1. Is Government aware—

- (a) that on 31st October, 1921, Paira Bhan, Chaudhri Nirmal Das and Devi Das and others, residents of Dera Ismail Khan, were charged under section 40 of the Frontier Crimes Regulations, for repeating the Karachi resolution and were convicted by the District Magistrate and sentenced to two years' simple imprisonment;
- (b) that they were transferred to Peshawar Jail on 9th November, 1921;
- (c) that on 12th November, 1921, the District Magistrate without notice to the accused enhanced the imprisonment of all the accused by changing the simple imprisonment into a rigorous one;
- (d) that there was a constant complaint of bad food;

- (c) that the treatment accorded to them was worse than that of ordinary criminals;
- (f) that a memorial was submitted to the Honourable the Chief Commissioner, North-West Frontier Province, in which these circumstances, inter alia, were referred to.

2. If answer to question No. 1 be in affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state as to what enquiry has been made by them and what result they have arrived at? Have they done anything to redress these grievances of the convicts and considered the prayer of the memorialists?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information has been called for and will be supplied when available.

GRATUITIES IN INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

252. Dr. Nand Lal: (1) (a) Is Government aware that temporary European candidates, to be recruited on five years' contract, are to get a gratuity at the rate of Rs. 250 per mensem, while temporary Indian Officers of the Indian Medical Service are not getting any gratuity?

(b) Is there any special reason for this inequality?

(c) If there were no special reason for this inequality, will the Government be pleased to state as to why this inequality should exist?

(2) Is Government aware that Temporary Indian Officers of the Indian Medical Service are not allowed any proportionate yearly gratuity in lieu of the pension of the permanent members of that service. If not, why not?

(3) Is Government aware that unlike the permanent members of the Indian Medical Service, temporary Indian Members of the Indian Medical Service, do not get any increment of pay according to the time scale, after three or more years' service as a captain?

If not, why not?

(4) Is Government aware that unlike the permanent members of the Indian Medical Service temporary Indian Officers of the Indian Medical Service, do not get the advantage of their accelerated promotion for captaincy towards their pay?

If not, why not?

Mr. E. Burdon: (1) (a) The position is substantially as stated by the Honourable Member.

(b) and (c) There is an essential difference between the respective obligations of the two classes of officers mentioned. The 80 European officers are being recruited conditionally for permanent commissions in the Indian Medical Service and for a minimum period of 5 years. If they fail to serve the minimum period, they receive no gratuity. The Indian officers mentioned serve on a purely temporary engagement which is for a maximum period of one year.

(2) and (3) Yes. The terms offered are sufficient to secure the candidates required for the purely temporary posts.

(4) Promotion to Captain is granted, both to temporary and permanent officers, after three years' service. This promotion is not accelerated in the case of either class of officers.

POLICY REGARDING WAZIRISTAN.

253. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table the correspondence that may have passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India relating to its future policy with respect to Waziristan.

Mr. Denys Bray: Government do not consider it in the public interest to make public the correspondence.

RAILWAY WORKSHOPS.

254. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state—

- (a) What stations of the East Indian Railway, Bengal and North-Western Railway, and at Lucknow on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway have workshops?
- (b) Alongside which of the workshops referred to in question (a) have technical schools been established?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: There are workshops at Jamalpur and Lillooah on the East Indian Railway, at Gorakhpur on the Bengal and North-Western Railway, and at Lucknow on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway. At all four stations apprentices in the shops receive technical training. At Jamalpur and Lucknow schemes for the erection of new and larger technical schools at which a higher class of training will be possible are now being introduced, the local Government in each case co-operating with the railway administration.

INTERMEDIATE CLASS ACCOMMODATION.

255. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether all the trains of the East Indian Railway, Bengal and North-Western Railway and Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway are provided with intermediate classes?
- (b) If not, will it be pleased to issue necessary instructions to the Railway authorities to make the provisions?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) All trains carrying passengers on the East Indian and Oudh and Rohilkhand Railways are provided with intermediate class accommodation but certain trains on the Bengal and North-Western Railway carry third class passengers only.

(b) Government do not consider that any instructions are necessary in the matter.

PUSA AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH INSTITUTION.

256. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table the last Annual Report of the Pusa Agricultural Research Institution?

Mr. J. Hullah: The Honourable Member will find copies of the report in the Library adjoining this Chamber.

URINAL ARRANGEMENTS ON RAILWAYS.

257. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Husain Khan: Is the Government aware of the great inconvenience caused by the absence of privy and urinal arrangements in all servants compartments attached to 1st and 2nd class compartments of Railway trains?

If so, do the Government propose to issue necessary instructions for the removal of the inconvenience referred to?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government has not received any complaints in regard to the alleged inconvenience, but the matter will be brought to the notice of the railway administrations.

WAZIRISTAN OPERATIONS.

258. Mr. B. S. Kamat: Will Government be pleased to state:

- (i) the total expenditure incurred since April 1922 up to date for the Waziristan operations;
- (ii) the cost of the punitive air operations recently undertaken and the quantity of bombs used to date;
- (iii) the total number of persons killed since April last by enemy raids and also persons killed on the enemy side by the Waziristan force?

Mr. E. Burdon: (i) Figures up to the end of October, 1922, only are at present available. The total military expenditure booked up to that date is approximately Rs. 109 lakhs. This amount includes certain charges including arrear charges on account of the North-West Frontier as a whole which it is impracticable to distinguish from the charges incurred on account of Waziristan proper.

(ii) The cost of the recent air operations cannot be precisely stated. The total weight of bombs dropped between the 17th December, 1922, and the 16th January, 1923 (both dates inclusive) is 78 tons.

(iii) The total number of persons on our side killed by enemy action since the 30th April, 1922, is as follows:

Military 68, including followers.

Civil 14, including levies.

So far as is known, 57 of the enemy have been killed.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Is it not a fact that the air operations have not proved effective in Waziristan?

Mr. E. Burdon: I think I gave an answer to that question to the 12 Noon, Honourable Member at the last meeting of this Assembly.

RECOMMENDATIONS BY THE RETRENCHMENT COMMITTEE.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, may I be permitted to ask a question of which I have given notice to the Honourable the Finance Member. It is as follows:

Will the Government be pleased to give an opportunity to the Assembly to discuss the recommendations of the Inchcape Committee, more especially those recommending the abolition of civil departments of the Government of India, before action is taken thereon by Government?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: This question has been to some extent anticipated in the supplementary questions that were asked in the course of the last hour, as also by an unstarred question put on the 15th instant, when it was asked:

“Will the Government be pleased to state whether the report of the Inchcape Committee is to be placed for discussion in the Legislative Assembly before any final orders are passed by the Government?”

The answer to that was:

“The Government regret that this course is not practicable.”

It is hoped that a full opportunity will arise in connection with the Budget discussions for considering the recommendations made by the Inchcape Committee in connection with the Budget for the next year.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: No doubt the Honourable Member is aware that, in connection with matters excluded from the Budget, it is not open to this House to get them included. The Honourable Member is no doubt aware of that difficulty.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am aware of that fact, but I think there will be every opportunity for discussing the recommendations of the Inchcape Committee in connection with the Budget.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I ask if the Inchcape Committee cannot be asked to adopt the procedure of sending their report in batches, as the Geddes Committee did, so that more time may be saved, instead of waiting for the final report?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I will inquire as to what procedure the Inchcape Committee think they may be able to adopt in this matter.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Does the Government propose to prepare and place before this Assembly its Budget on the basis of the recommendations of the Inchcape Committee as far as they may reach the Government in time for the preparation of the Budget?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Government have every hope that they will be able to take full advantage of the work of the Inchcape Committee in the preparation of the Budget.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

INDIAN ENGINEERS ON RAILWAYS.

106. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly lay on the table the information re Indian Engineers on Railways, referred to in the answer given in the Council of State on the 6th September 1922 to question No. 18 (i) and (ii)?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The statement containing the information asked for by the Honourable Member is placed on the table.

Statement showing numbers of Indian Engineers recruited annually on the Great Indian Peninsula, East Indian, Bombay, Baroda and Central India and South Indian Railways, the percentage to recruitment of Europeans and particulars in cases of termination of service.

WAGON SERVICE ON RAILWAYS.

107. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to the suggestions made by the late Mr. Thomas Robertson in 1903 in paragraphs 181-189 of his report for obtaining greater amount of service with a smaller amount of wagons, will Government kindly lay on the table a statement showing the steps taken and progress achieved during the decade immediately preceding the outbreak of the Great War?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The more efficient working of rolling stock was the constant care of the Railway Board and Railway Administrations during the period referred to, and every effort was made to effect an improvement.

Records show, however, that they were hampered by lack of adequate facilities.

Information as to the work done by rolling stock year by year can be ascertained by reference to the Administration Reports of Indian Railways.

QUARTERS ON E. I. AND G. I. P. RAILWAYS.

108. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government kindly lay on the table a statement showing the designation of the officers for whom quarters have been built during the five years ending 31st March 1922, the pay of each officer, the cost of each quarter, the interest payable on the capital cost of each quarter, and the rent per annum realized on each of the quarters on the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The information asked for is not readily available, and Government do not consider that the time and labour involved in collecting the particulars are commensurate with the results to be obtained.

O. AND R. RAILWAY DISCOUNT SINKING FUND.

109. Mr. N. M. Joshi: With reference to the item "Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway Discount Sinking Fund in redemption of debt incurred in excess of money raised" appearing in the Railway Budget for 1922-23, will Government kindly state:

- (a) the amount of debt incurred in excess of money raised;
- (b) the date of the loan and the date fixed for redemption;
- (c) the amount accumulated in the Fund up to 31st March 1922;
- (d) the amount payable into the Fund every year;
- (e) the amount yet remaining to be paid into the Fund; and
- (f) the circumstances differentiating this debt from the issue of £10,089,146 India 3 per cent. stock to the stockholders of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway Company in satisfaction of £9,085,581 in part payment of the purchase price of the Undertaking.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: In order to reply fully to the Honourable Member's question, it will be necessary to refer to the India Office. This is being done and the reply will be communicated to him in due course.

TEMPLES AT PAHAR GUNJ, DELHI.

110. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table:

- (a) A full statement of what has been done or is proposed to be done with respect to the temples and Dharmshalas appertaining to the temples situate within the area proposed to be included in the New Railway Station at Pahar Gunj, Delhi?
- (b) The copies of all the correspondence on the matter?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Apart from consultations with those immediately interested in the temples and Dharamsala nothing has been done nor is it proposed to do anything at present. Government therefore does not propose to lay a statement on the table.

(b) As the matter is still under consideration Government do not propose to lay on the table copies of the correspondence.

DR. GOUR'S CIVIL MARRIAGE BILL.

83. †Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: Will Dr. Gour, M.L.A., be pleased to state whether he has received a copy of the Resolution adopted at a meeting of the Parsees held on the 26th November, 1922, protesting against the Honourable Member's Civil Marriage Bill, and if so, will he be pleased to place a copy of the same on the table?

Dr. H. S. Gour: The answer to the question is in the affirmative. I have also received a number of Resolutions adopted by the Parsees strongly approving of my Civil Marriage Bill. It seems that the Parsees like the other communities are divided into two sections, orthodox and reformers. The former oppose all changes, the latter consider each change upon its merits. As a distinct body of all communities are in favour of my Bill, both its utility and necessity are obvious.

TENURE NATURE OF POSTS OF SECRETARY, ETC., IN SECRETARIAT.

82. †Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it a fact that the posts of Secretary, Joint Secretary, Deputy Secretary, Under Secretary and Assistant Secretary in the Government of India Secretariats are all tenure appointments and if so, what is the maximum period fixed for such tenure appointments?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The posts of Secretary, Joint Secretary, Deputy Secretary and Under Secretary are tenure appointments and the period of tenure is normally three years. No maximum period is fixed and the period can be and is sometimes extended. The posts of Secretary, Joint Secretary and Deputy Secretary in the Legislative Department and of Secretary and Joint Secretary in the Railway Department are not tenure appointments.

The post of Assistant Secretary in the Education and Health Department is a tenure appointment and the tenure is limited ordinarily to three years. The post of Assistant Secretary in the Political Department has not been a tenure appointment but is limited to a salary of Rs. 1,600. Military officers appointed to Assistant Secretaryships in the Army Department have a fixed tenure of three years extensible to five years. Extensions beyond this period are only granted in exceptional cases. The other posts of Assistant Secretary in the Government of India are not tenure appointments.

THE INDIAN COTTON CESS BILL.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): Sir, I move for leave:

"To introduce a Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India."

The purpose of this Bill, Sir, is, briefly, to improve the quality and quantity of the Indian cotton crop and to enable the industry to levy from itself a small tax for its own development. The Indian mill industry already consumes about half of the commercial crop in India, and half of the mill consumption consists of what are known as the long staple varieties, that is, those suitable for working up to 20 counts and over. This consumption of the longer staple varieties practically absorbs the whole of those varieties that are grown in India and, consequently, there is no surplus left over for export and practically none for what is still more important, the development of the mill industry itself. On the other hand, we have a very large exportable surplus of the inferior cottons, namely, those of the shorter staples, and the export of these amounts on an average to 12 lakhs of bales annually and has been as high as 20 lakhs. But the market for these is limited and uncertain, and we do not know that the world will always be ready to take cotton of this inferior kind. The recent shortage in the American crop has now created a favourable opportunity for us to export cotton of superior varieties, if we can work up an exportable surplus of these varieties, and it is, therefore, obvious that we should aid the cotton cultivator to produce varieties which will enable him to profit by the demand of the world's markets and, at the same time, to produce the larger stocks which the development of the Indian mills must inevitably require.

Considerations of this kind led the Government of India some five years ago to appoint a small technical committee, known as the Indian Cotton Committee. That Committee recommended a very large expansion of agricultural work on cotton, the establishment of a Central Cotton Committee at Bombay with a technologist and a laboratory, and they estimated that the cost of bringing into effect the proposals that they made would be about Rs. 16 lakhs. They suggested that this sum might be obtained by the levy of a cess of eight annas a bale on the whole of the commercial cotton crop. We have already established the Central Cotton Committee and they have shown very great energy and activity. Their advice has been most useful to us in connection with the Cotton Transport Bill, of which the Report of the Select Committee was recently laid before this House. We have also received most valuable advice from them on the very vexed question of the licensing of gins and presses. They are framing constructive proposals for the improvement of the marketing of cotton, by which I mean that the cultivator should obtain premia for cotton of superior staple, and, lastly, or, in point of time, firstly, it was they who made the definite proposals for the imposition of a cess which now find expression in the Bill which I seek to introduce.

The cost of the Central Cotton Committee is at present borne by general revenues and provision on this account exists in the present year's budget to the extent of Rs. 79,000. It is proposed in the Bill that the cost of the Committee shall be met from the proceeds of the cess. If so, it disappears from our Budget and to that extent this Bill will effect a measure of retrenchment.

[Mr. J. Hullah.]

We placed the proposals of the Cotton Committee for a cess before the Local Governments and they in their turn consulted all the more important commercial bodies such as the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, the Indian Merchants Chamber and Bureau, the Mill-owners' Association of Bombay, the Mill-owners' Association of Ahmedabad, the Cotton Contracts Board, the Punjab Chamber of Commerce, the Upper India Chamber of Commerce, the Karachi Chamber of Commerce and so forth. On the general proposal that a cess should be imposed there is absolute unanimity of opinion. Everybody, official or non-official, agrees that there should be a cess. There are differences of opinion on points of detail and on two points especially there is some divergence. The first is whether the cess should be levied on all commercial cotton—by which I mean all cotton exported and all cotton consumed in the spinning mills; or whether it should be levied only on the cotton brought to the mills and consumed there; or again only on exports. The great majority of opinion is that it should be levied on all commercial cotton, and we have framed the Bill accordingly. The other point on which there is a divergence of opinion is that the cess should not be 4 annas a bale, as we propose, but 2 annas. But here again, in retaining the rate of 4 annas we have followed the very great majority of opinions, but we have made provision in the Bill that the Governor General in Council may reduce the amount of the cess.

We anticipate that the proceeds of the cess—and the estimate can be made with fair confidence—will amount to between 8 and 9 lakhs of rupees a year. So far I have mentioned only the expenditure on the Central Cotton Committee itself as a direction in which this money will be spent; but, of course, this will absorb a very small amount of the total proceeds. The bulk of the proceeds we propose to spend on agricultural development and research. The Indian Cotton Committee itself placed this in the forefront of their proposals and we are doing the same. Neither we nor the Central Cotton Committee have any intention of relegating to the background, or even to a secondary place, the important matter of doing all that we can for the agriculturist and from the agricultural point of view. The Indian Cotton Committee, as I have said, made proposals which they thought would cost 16 lakhs. Out of this 16 lakhs, 14 lakhs would be spent on the agricultural side. Those were days when the War had just come to an end; when peace—and, we thought, plenty—was at hand; and in those Arcadian days we were thinking of turning our sword into a ploughshare and not into an axe. But now it is clear that the Local Governments are quite unable to incur the extra expenditure which the proposals of the Indian Cotton Committee will involve, and it is proposed that from the proceeds of the cess expenditure of the kind contemplated should be met. There is plenty to be done. Mr. Burt, the Secretary of the Cotton Committee, has supplied me with some notes of the main schemes which are under the consideration of the Central Cotton Committee and some of which they have already decided to support. In the Punjab a very grave position has already arisen owing to the unsatisfactory yield of the Punjab American crop. The Punjab American crop covers an area of approximately half a million acres and has added about 140,000 bales to the supply of Indian long staple cotton. It is the most striking instance in India of the replacement of a very short staple by cotton of a superior staple and has until recently been very rightly regarded as a triumph of the Agricultural Department. But recently there has set in a very serious deterioration and we urgently need research to remove the causes of this deterioration which are at present imperfectly known. The Central Cotton Committee have recommended that a special Research Staff should be provided from the cotton cess funds, and the investigations that will be made in the Punjab will have an important bearing on problems in Sind, Northern India generally and the western part of the United Provinces. In Bombay there are several schemes which require to be taken up and which the Local Government is unable to finance. The Agricultural Department has drawn attention to the necessity of investigating two very important problems. One is the loss caused by wilt in the southern Mahratta country, and the other the loss caused by boll-shedding in Gujerat. Again, there is need for special plant breeding work for the production of a better strain of the upland type of the southern Mahratta country. These problems, as the Central Cotton Committee realise, are of more than provincial importance. The first of them affects all the black cotton-growing soil in India—that is, about three-fourths of the entire cotton producing country. The second affects a well-defined tract of country lying between two provinces and one Indian State. It is a problem of very considerable importance. Another important problem to which the Bombay Government draw special attention is the loss caused by the spotted boll-weevil, and the problem of attacking this menace is at present under the immediate consideration of the Central Cotton Committee. Madras has put forward its own problems—two important schemes of research which they are unable to undertake, plant breeding work on the herbaceous cottons. Others have been received from the Central Provinces and the United Provinces. So it is pretty evident there is a very great deal of work to be done if the necessary funds can be found. Another proposal which the Central Cotton Committee have made is the institution of research studentships for graduates of Indian Universities for research on cotton, to be trained under competent experts; and finally we have in view as well, if we have sufficient money, the establishment of a Central Research Institute for cotton. That scheme has already been worked out in full detail and we hope some day, when the necessary funds are available, that such an Institute will be established.

Honourable Members may have noticed, in the papers that have been sent to them, a proposal by the Central Cotton Committee, following the advice of the Indian Cotton Committee, for the appointment of a technologist and the establishment of a laboratory for him. The purpose of this is to have a small spinning plant to test the suitability of the different Indian cottons for spinning up to various counts and especially to test new varieties of cotton. The great problem in India has always been to get the cultivator a fair price for cotton of superior varieties, and our agricultural officers know by bitter experience how trade valuations of new cottons are practically useless. The fact is that a commercial mill cannot undertake this work. It cannot go through all the very thorough and detailed tests which are required, and it cannot work on the very small quantities which a plant breeder will produce in the early stages of attempting to evolve a new variety. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: I wish to draw the attention of the Honourable Member to Standing Order 87 and to ask him to bring his remarks to a close; he has taken already over quarter of an hour. Under that Standing Order only a brief explanatory speech is allowed at this stage.

Mr. J. Mullah: I am sorry, Sir. I only wish to add that there remain two points emphasised in the opinions we have received. One is that there should be central control so that no province shall be able, by over-representation on the Committee, to obtain an undue share of the proceeds of the cess; we have provided for this in the Bill; central control is reserved to the Government of India. The second point is that the proceeds of the cess shall be spent on cotton and on cotton only; that we have effected by keeping the proceeds out of the general revenues and making them into a separate fund.

I now, Sir, ask for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That leave be given to introduce a Bill to provide for the creation of a Fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. Hullah: I now introduce the Bill.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. Deputy President: The House will now proceed with the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, it now falls to my lot—an unpleasant task—to criticise the action of the police under this section. My learned friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, moved the first portion of my amendment on the last occasion. Therefore, Sir, I propose to move the latter portion, giving up that portion which has been already moved by my Honourable friend

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid I must ask the Honourable Mover to move the first portion of his amendment No. 61.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, Sir, the first portion has been moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. You leave the matter entirely in my hands, Sir, and I shall do the needful

Mr. Deputy President: It will read like this:

"At the end of sub-clause (iii) insert the following:
'and the words 'or otherwise' shall be omitted'."

I call upon the Honourable Member to move that amendment.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I beg to move, Sir, that:

"At the end of sub-clause (iii) insert the following:
'and the words 'or otherwise' shall be omitted'."

and at the end.

Mr. Deputy President: No, it would be to the convenience of this House if the latter portion of the amendment is taken up at a later stage.

Mr. K. Ahmed: So I am moving just the middle clause, Sir. Honourable Members of this Assembly are aware that when a man is brought forward before a Magistrate under section 110 he is alleged to have committed the offence of bad livelihood; that is to say, whenever it is within the knowledge of a Magistrate—Sub-divisional Magistrate or Presidency Magistrate—that a man is by habit a robber and that he is by habit a receiver of stolen property knowing the same to have been stolen or habitually protects or harbours thieves or aids in the concealment or disposal of stolen property or habitually commits or attempts to commit or abets the commission of offences under Chapter XII of the Indian Penal Code or habitually commits mischief, extortion or cheating or counterfeiting coin or offences under any such sections as 489-A, 489-B, 489-C, 489-D of the Code or is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community, then, Sir, under section 117 and sections 112 and 118 the accused is tried according to the evidence which is adduced by the police. The police as a matter of fact bring all sorts of evidence—such as was discussed on the last occasion. The word 'otherwise' is a very extraordinary word. Learned Judges of many High Courts have observed that this sort of word is very objectionable. As a matter of fact the meaning of the words 'or otherwise' has been held to be ambiguous by Judges, and reported in 15 Criminal Law Journal at page 705 and also in 21 Criminal Law Journal at page 810. Their Lordships found that a man's guilt under the above sections could not be proved by witnesses in all those ways and otherwise. What is the meaning of the words 'or otherwise?' If I follow the definition of law as it is defined by Bentham, Holland, Austin and by Professor Kenny of Cambridge University, Lecturer to the law students as well as to the successful candidates of the Indian Civil Service, who teaches them criminal law, i.e., Indian criminal law,—he defines it in this way, that unless and until you have got authentic evidence to prove that a man is bad, the science of jurisprudence tells you that in the eye of the law ipso facto he is an innocent person, and therefore you cannot prove anything against him by 'otherwise.' The science of jurisprudence tells you that every one is supposed to be innocent in the eye of the law, an honest trustworthy person, not a habitual criminal of the description given in the section I have read. A police sub-inspector arrests a man and tries to prove that he is an offender of the description given in any of those items; and in the matter of proving the guilt of the particular person the fact that he is a habitual offender or is a person so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community is to be proved by evidence of general repute or otherwise.

This man is a bad man. Give the dog a bad name. But why should you not go in a straightforward manner and prove that he is a bad dog or a bad man? Instead of doing that, you are making provision in the administration of justice to prove bad character by getting evidence not in a proper channel, not in a straightforward manner and something besides which is called "or otherwise." Suppose, Sir, in returning a compliment, any Member of this Assembly, out of courtesy, goes to pay a visit to my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, at his residence, and at the time of coming back, after leaving his card in the box, anything is found or alleged to have been found stolen from his premises. Then you say "Oh, this thing has happened when such-and-such M. L. A. was walking along the street" and you prove by calling witnesses that he was found in such-and-such a place. Is that the way, Sir? No, certainly not. That is not the principle of law in any country, and I hope sincerely that this part of the clause—"or otherwise"—will be omitted. Here, Sir, I will quote from the judgment of two of the most important judges—for whom I have the greatest respect and reverence—two distinguished judges, the people of India have ever seen—I mean Sir W. Comer Petheram, Kt., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beverley of the Honourable High Court of Calcutta. It is reported in I. L. R. 28 Calcutta, page 621. They say:

"Evidence that there are rumours in a particular place that a man has committed acts of extortion on various occasions, that he has seduced in his employ to assist him, and generally that he is a man of bad character is not evidence of general repute under section 117 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Evidence of rumour is mere hearsay evidence of a particular fact. Evidence of repute is a different thing. A man's general reputation is the reputation which he bears in the place in which he lives amongst all the townsmen, and if it is proved that a man who lives in a particular place is looked upon by his fellow-townsmen, whether they happen to know him or not, as a man of good repute, that is strong evidence that he is a man of good character. On the other hand, if the state of things is that the body of his fellow-townsmen, who know him, look upon him as a dangerous man and a man of bad habits, that is strong evidence that he is a man of bad character.

It cannot be said that, because there are rumours in a particular place among a certain class of people that a man has done particular acts or has characteristics of a certain kind, these rumours are in themselves evidence under section 117 of the Code."

Now, Sir, you have the words "or otherwise," that is, by means fair or foul, either this way or the other, you can bring evidence. You know the police. They are all-mighty, as I have said, and it is not difficult for the police to get any number of witnesses to depose that a man is of bad character. This is a matter which is specially confined to the police and he can prove anything he likes. There is the Evidence Act. It applies anywhere and everywhere. But, as I have said already, the police is a magic lantern which gives you all shades of light, the mystery of which we cannot understand. The Evidence Act fails; knowledge and experience fail when you bring a man under arrest and prove his character to be bad by calling in anybody and everybody in any way you like. Certainly, Sir, for the ends of justice, these words "or otherwise" should be omitted, and I therefore move that the words "or otherwise" should be deleted from sub-clause (iii) of clause 20.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved is:

"At the end of sub-clause (iii) insert the following:

'and the words 'or otherwise' shall be omitted'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, I have listened to my friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, with great attention because I wondered what arguments he was going to advance for the deletion of these words "or otherwise." He began by regretting—I am glad that it is a matter of regret for him—that he had to attack the police. Well, Sir, that, I would suggest, was not relevant to the amendment before the House. There is no question here in this clause of the conduct of the police at all. The sub-section which the Bill amends is merely framed for the guidance of the Magistrates, and the police have no concern in it whatever. The case is, by the time this sub-section operates, entirely in the hands of the Magistrate.

Sir, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed recited numerous rulings which, he says, go to show that the words "or otherwise" cause great difficulty. He went so far as to read us a long extract—a very interesting extract indeed, but entirely irrelevant to his notice of amendment. All that the Court said in that case was that certain evidence which had been produced was not evidence of general repute. We are not talking about evidence of general repute at the moment. We are talking about the words "or otherwise." Sir, the point is a very simple one and I hope I can explain it to the House clearly. The words "or otherwise" have occurred in the Code of Criminal Procedure since 1882. When the Lowndes Committee was appointed to consider the Code and to suggest a revision, they cut these words out. They gave no reasons for it. They just merely mentioned in their report: "We have, however, deleted the words 'or otherwise'". I venture to suggest to the House that they did so without full consideration of the effect of the amendment which they were suggesting. The Courts in this country, as in any other country in the world, look upon the Legislature as a reasonable and responsible body. That is to say, when the Legislature does something, the Court assumes that the Legislature had some reason for its action. Here we have got a law which has been in force for 40 years. The Legislature suddenly cuts out the words "or otherwise" and apparently makes a change in this section. Well, Sir, the Courts then say to themselves, "The Legislature must have had some reason for cutting these words out," and they find it rather difficult to find that reason. It is not that the words 'or otherwise' are doubtful. There has never been any doubt about them at all. (Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: "What is the meaning?") I will explain what the meaning is if the Honourable Member will wait for a moment. It is merely this. The sub-section runs thus:

"For the purposes of this section the fact that a person is an habitual offender may be proved by evidence of general repute or otherwise."

The meaning of that simply and solely is this, that evidence of general repute is not the only means of proving that the person is an habitual offender. The words "or otherwise" are added to make it quite clear that you are not overriding the provisions of the law of evidence; that is, any evidence which would be relevant or admissible under the Evidence Act can also be utilised for the purpose of proving that a man is an habitual offender. I think that is the only explanation. If we cut out the words, and the Courts seek for the reason of our action, what conclusion do they come to? They arrive at this conclusion,—the Legislative Assembly and the Legislature, if the Bill is passed in this form, intended to lay down that the word "may" in this section, as so often happens in our Statute Book, is equivalent to "shall"; that if you want to prove that a person is an habitual offender, the only way you can do it is by evidence of general repute. That point was very carefully considered by the Joint Committee. The Joint Committee decided that it was unsafe to remove the words and that it was much better to put them back again, and I submit that this is a case in which, at all events, this House should endorse the action of the Joint Committee. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Will you please read the chit I sent you?") (An Honourable Member: "May be proved also by evidence of general repute.") (A Voice: "'Also' by itself has no meaning there.") Mr. Rangachariar has sent a note across from which I gather he quite understands that it means that it may be proved by evidence of general repute in addition to any evidence that is admissible under the Evidence Act. The section may be worded in numerous ways, but I would suggest to the House that the drafting that has stood for forty years is clear. Mr. Ahmed has cited rulings to support his contention that the words have caused difficulty, but the words "or otherwise" have not been referred to in those rulings. There is not a single case in which they have caused difficulty. Commentaries refer to the words in one High Court Judgment, but in that case they caused no difficulty. Therefore I would suggest that we do not alter the phraseology of the section which has stood so long.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): I have very little to say in supplement to what has been said in explanation of these words by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith. The argument of the Honourable and learned Mover suggests that he interprets the words "or otherwise" to mean "or in any other informal or illegal or hearsay manner that the police and the Magistrate may please." They do not mean that at all. This is a portion only of the adjective law and this section is governed by the Law of Evidence. It provides an exception to the law of evidence where it provides for proof by evidence of general repute; and then it makes it clear that the general law of evidence also applies by using the words "or otherwise." "Or otherwise" means "or in any other way allowed by law." There is no published judgment which has interpreted the words in any other way; and that being so, although there is much to be said for the improved form which has been suggested by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar (if I may refer to him by name), still it is always advisable to keep to a phrase that has been on the Statute Book so long as this phrase "or otherwise." Therefore I would suggest that the clause be allowed to stand as it is.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I do not like to prolong the discussion, but I would just point out to the Government that there is a difficulty which it is better to avoid by adopting the suggestion which Mr. Rangachariar has brought forward. If you use the word "otherwise" following the words "of general repute," according to the ordinary canon of construction, the word "otherwise" would govern the kind of evidence which is referred to in the previous clause. That is the reason, I take it, the Calcutta High Court had felt some difficulty. Unfortunately I have not been able to get at the judgment. When I read the clause it struck me that the word "otherwise" is liable to be misunderstood, and that is the reason why the Lowndes Committee wanted its omission. If your idea is that the general rule of evidence should apply plus "repute" evidence, the proper way of carrying out that idea is to use the language which has been suggested to you by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. If you allow the words "or otherwise" to stand, I fear it is capable of being interpreted, as evidence of the same character that has been enumerated before, namely, "repute" evidence. That is the proper rule of construction and it is liable to be understood in that light. Therefore, in order to make the position clear, I think the Government will be well advised to accept it—we do not care very much about the matter—but I think in the interests of proper drafting, it is desirable that the ambiguity should be removed, as the words "or otherwise" are liable to the construction which I have just mentioned.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"At the end of sub-clause (iii) insert the following:
'and the words 'or otherwise' shall be omitted.'
The motion was negatived.

(Mr. Deputy President then called upon Mr. Agnihotri to move his amendment.* Mr. Agnihotri was absent.)

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muham-madan Rural): I am appearing for Mr. Agnihotri. I do not move it* as Mr. Ahmed is moving his amendment.

* "After sub-section (5) as re-numbered the following sub-section shall be inserted:
'(6) General repute in this section means an opinion based on either personal knowledge of the deponent or concrete instances.'"

Mr. K. Ahmed: I move:

"That the following clause may be inserted after clause 20, sub-clause (iii).

Explanation: General repute is the reputation of a person in the place where he resides or carries on business, among the general body of his neighbours who are acquainted with him or have personal knowledge of his reputation, and excludes mere belief and opinion not founded on specific instances of acts falling under clauses (a) to (e) and rumour."

It is not necessary for me to dilate upon the subject any further. I will add to them by reading the closing lines of the judgment of Sir Comer Petheram C. J., and Beverley J., reported in I. L. R., 23 Cal. page 621. The closing lines are these:

"We cannot help thinking that if that state of things, which is said to exist and to have existed, had in truth existed there, some very different measures would have been taken by the authorities on their own motion than those which have been taken; and that being the state of things, we cannot think it safe to act upon this evidence, and the result is that the rule will be made absolute and the bonds were cancelled."

That is the opinion of the Learned Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court and his words are before the country and the Honourable Members of this Assembly who represent the people of this country. We get so many Statutes and Acts passed by this Assembly and they are interpreted by the Honourable Judges of the High Court and their rulings are accepted in the interpretation of Acts. That was the ruling of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beverley. We use that ruling and use it successfully in any Court of law to defend persons accused on evidence of general repute adduced by the police. What I want is that the law should be brought into conformity with the ruling given by the Judges of the High Court and that the following words should be added as an explanation:

"General repute is the reputation of a person in the place where he resides or carries on business among the general body of his neighbours who are acquainted with him or have personal knowledge of his reputation and excludes mere belief and opinion not founded on specific instances of acts falling under clauses (a) to (e) and rumour."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Do you mean to say clauses (a) to (e) or only clauses (a) and (e).

Mr. K. Ahmed: I have no hesitation in moving that the concluding portion should read "clauses (a) to (e) and rumour". In order to prove a case like this, it is absolutely necessary that it should be "clauses (a) to (e)." That evidence is necessary to prove reputation. It is absolutely necessary for the ends of justice that it is only the people who live in the neighbourhood or vicinity of the village who can come forward and they are the only persons who come forward and give evidence as regards the reputation of a man and not persons who are not in any way concerned to come forward and give evidence in support of the defence or the accused and therefore it is necessary that this Explanation after clause 20, sub-clause (iii) should be added. Otherwise there is no royal road for the poor accused to get out of the trap. That being so, my proposition has been supported by the rulings and the observations which I have read out. I think, Sir, representing the people of India, we are not here to accept a law which does not give protection to our people whom we are supposed to represent and therefore it is the duty cast upon each and every Member of this Assembly to see that the welfare and the amelioration of the condition of these Indian peoples is not endangered and that they are not made victims in the hands of the police. I suppose, Sir, I have made out a strong case. The ruling which I have cited is already in existence and we generally use it. You cannot go back on the ruling of the Honourable High Court Judges. My Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, is not here. He would have wanted a little bit of economy towards this expenditure of paper and I ask the Honourable Member for the Government to accept this Explanation after clause 20, sub-clause (iii) and will not object to any further, depriving the justice suggested by the Judges in those rulings which I have already read out. I hope the Government Member will accept this amendment.

[Mr. K. Ahmed.]

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I want to put forward two reasons why the Government cannot accept this definition of "general repute" put forward by my Honourable friend. Experts have recognised for a long time that it would be a most excellent thing if we could introduce a definition of "general repute" into our Code of Criminal Procedure in this section 117, but the experts have always failed to arrive at a satisfactory definition. The House will remember that only on Saturday my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, who is not here, to-day, pointed out that no difficulty had arisen from the absence of a definition and that the courts had had to consider it so often and had laid down so clearly the principles that the magistrates should follow that no magistrate now found the slightest difficulty in finding out and deciding for himself what evidence was admissible and what was not. Those were practically Mr. Subrahmanayam's words. Here again, I would ask the House to realise what section 117 (3) really means. It says that the fact that a person is a habitual offender can be proved by evidence of general repute. That is

1 P.M. to say, notwithstanding what we have in the Evidence Act, general repute is a relevant fact when you try to prove that a person is an habitual offender. Now Mr. Ahmed has, I think, followed the line of examining all the High Court rulings he could get hold of and of trying to bring them together under one definition. One High Court has had before it a case in which the witnesses have come from distances, and their evidence has been mere hearsay: the High Court said, 'this was not evidence of general repute, because the evidence was hearsay evidence, it was not evidence within the knowledge of the witnesses and therefore could not be brought within the four corners of the law of evidence.' That is what happened in every ruling. The Judges have merely laid down that if you attempt to give evidence of general repute, general repute as a relevant fact must be proved according to the law of evidence. I wish to indicate to the House the dangers of attempting the definition of a term like this. As I say, the Courts have in various cases indicated what evidence should not have been admitted; and when they go on to say that evidence of general repute must be of people living in the neighbourhood, that remark naturally applies to the particular case. If we are to attempt a definition at all, the definition should be on such lines as the rulings of the Courts, that evidence of general repute is not so and so, and it should be in a negative form; it is practically impossible to get an exhaustive definition in the positive form which will not rule out very much valuable evidence. Let us take the ordinary case of an habitual offender or of a desperate or dangerous person who now comes within the purview of the section. A very ordinary case is that of a man who is never at home at night. He is a suspected person. The police go round to his house at night, and they never find him at home. On the contrary, they always find him asleep all day. Well, that, by itself, may be no evidence, because he may have an occupation which keeps him employed. But suppose the evidence is that the man has no occupation at all, none whatever,—that he is seen in the company of ex-convicts, and he has no income; nobody knows what his income is, and yet this man lives in very good style, spends a lot on his clothes, on luxuries, and on vices. Well, all that is corroborative evidence, surely, of the man's reputation, and it might come within some of the four corners of Mr. Ahmed's definition, but it is very dangerous indeed to attempt an exhaustive definition in case you rule out evidence, the only evidence in the case which may be available, to bring this habitual offender to book. I began by saying that experts realised that it would be an excellent thing if we could have a definition and it is not the first time it has been considered. It has been attempted over and over again. It has been attempted so often that the House will find, if it looks at the Report of the Lowndes' Committee, that that Committee referred to it and said, "it has been suggested that a definition should be introduced into the Code", and they went on to say, "we have not attempted to frame a definition". They realised the impossibility. The fact is, you would have to work right through the Evidence Act and consider every clause of the Evidence Act and to have regard to that in making your definition if it is to be at all exhaustive. Therefore, I would suggest to the House that where experts have failed and where the Lowndes' Committee, which included many eminent Judges and many eminent lawyers, has failed, has realized the impossibility of even making an attempt, the House itself should not attempt to make any change in the law which has stood in this case also for 40 years.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan, Urmah). Sir, I cannot support this amendment and must object to it strongly. In the first place, the man who would require most protection, if this is a protection, is the one covered by clause (f) of section 117 which is now added to the category of people against whom evidence of general repute may be given. I need not labour the point because I set out my objection in opposing that amendment about the desperate character who however dangerous might be a tyro against whom anything in the shape of general repute such as could be predicted about an habitual offender might be urged; but I do think, Sir, and I should suggest to Mr. Ahmed to consider that what he is seeking is not a help to the people, not a help to the accused but is really taking away existing safeguards broadcasted over a series of well understood judicial interpretations and decisions about which neither the police nor the magistracy can have the slightest doubt. If you were to attempt to circumscribe and define it in that way, however much a good definition or explanation be needed a variety of safeguards, such as the decisions, however contending, already contain would not be provided for. Mr. Chief Justice Petheram's judgment itself for example is a strong argument against the acceptance of this amendment. It is by a series of negotiations that the different High Courts have from time to time provided the safeguard as to what is or is not general repute and what shall not reckon as general repute. They are there and they have the force of law, therefore, why interfere with them? Let the accused have the fullest possible benefit of these judicial decisions upon which nobody can go back unless the Legislature chooses to go back upon them, as is now suggested. However necessary they may be, it cannot be effectively done on the way proposed. If my view is correct, Sir, I would like to suggest to Mr. Ahmed and some of my friends that we might agree upon the different amendments that might well be given the go-bye and let us concentrate our attention on things that really matter. We have a tremendous number of clauses yet to go through, and, as was indicated to-day by the Leader of the House, other necessary work of the House must suffer unless we are very careful about time. I do not for a moment suggest that the things that matter should be hustled or rushed, but we ought to concentrate our attention upon those, and might well agree upon letting things alone that may very well be let alone. I believe this, as put, is one of them.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I am sorry, my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, has chosen the wrong moment for his homily to the movers of amendments to the Criminal Procedure Code. Sir, those of us who have to work the machinery of this Code alone know the defects which exist in the Code, and, Sir, the lay public, the impatient lay public, no doubt are getting impatient over the amendments moved in this House, and they offer all sorts of advice; and I am surprised that my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, has chosen to join those ranks.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Not of the lay public, though.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: But this subject of general repute has given the greatest difficulty to the Courts in administering this section, and I can quote from the Honourable Bar to which my Honourable friend belongs. This is what the Calcutta Bar Association say, it is important:

"There is no phrase in the Code round which a larger body of legal literature has grown up than general repute. It is hopeless to reconcile the bewildering array of rulings on this subject or to draw any clear ruling from them taken as a whole. As evidence of habit, general repute is of the least value; it is mere opinion, it is hearsay. We therefore think that the elucidation of the meaning and scope of the expression 'general repute' is absolutely necessary.

We suggest here a few salient points based on certain rulings, though we do not pretend to deal exhaustively with such a difficult matter."

Sir, I am glad to admit that there is no greater Bar than the Bar of the Calcutta High Court; and when they recognize such great difficulty in this matter, for my Honourable friend to spring up and warn the movers of amendments not to waste the time of the House, etc., he is really quite out of place. I may also say, Sir, that the Madras Bar have felt the same difficulty. They say:

"The character of the so-called repute evidence is well-known to be a very dangerous departure from the salutary principle of the exclusion of hearsay evidence. The manner in which the evidence of repute, so-called, has been admitted, even where admissible under the present law, has not been satisfactory."

I think I may say from my own experience that this is a very very difficult question. And we are now dealing with the cases of Magistrates of the second and first-class, probably raw men who are put on to perform the duty of admitting evidence of general repute. Admittedly, that evidence ought not to be admitted; we are making an exception in the general law of evidence and we are departing from the English law and from our ordinary law in this respect in allowing this evidence to be admitted at all. Therefore, it is but right that we should give some guidance to the magistracy by way of an explanation. That explanation is based upon several rulings of the Calcutta and other High Courts. My Honourable friend, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, has no objection to the wording of the explanation so far as that goes; at any rate he has not said that it is incorrect; but what he fears apparently is that there may be other cases of evidence relating to general repute which may be excluded by this explanation. But what is the explanation? "General repute is the reputation of a person in the place where he resides or carries on business." what is there wrong in that?

Do you want the reputation which a person residing in Madras has in Calcutta or anywhere else equally far? Then it goes on—"among the general body of his neighbours who are acquainted with him or have personal knowledge of his reputation, and excludes mere belief and opinion not founded on specific instances of acts falling under clauses (a) to (e) and rumour." That is what the explanation is and it is embodied, so far as I have been able to see on the rulings of the Calcutta High Court. I am not able myself to see what other evidence can be admissible as evidence of general repute. It must be remembered too that repute evidence is admissible only as an exception, and I think we should limit it as far as possible. It is dangerous to allow this exception, and it is much more dangerous to allow it without an explanation for the guidance of the magistracy who are not trained lawyers. Even English Judges in trying matrimonial cases, in which repute evidence is admissible, have felt the greatest difficulty in deciding what evidence is admissible and what not. Unless, therefore, the Government Members are able to suggest some other kinds of evidence which come under general repute, I do not see why we should not use the explanation, which is comprehensive enough to allow all such evidence as can safely be admitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 20 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I move the amendment which stands in my name, viz.:

“Omit the whole of clause 21.”

I wish to briefly explain the object of this amendment. We are now dealing with the Chapter relating to taking security for keeping peace and good behaviour. We have passed the stage in which the order has been passed by the Magistrate calling upon the accused person to give security. The stage now is where the security is offered under section 122. As it now exists a Magistrate may refuse to accept any surety offered under this chapter on the ground that for reasons to be recorded by the Magistrate such surety is an unfit person. The new clause proposed by the Government is an attempt to improve that section. Honourable Members will notice that the section as it stands leaves it to the discretion of the Magistrate to refuse to accept a security for reasons to be recorded by him on the ground that he is an unfit person. The first attempt made in this amendment by the Government is to define what is meant by an unfit person, and in making that attempt, if Honourable Members will now look at the amended clause before them, they will see that they want to tell the Magistrate in such and such a case you may call him an unfit person, that is, he is not a man of good moral character. What is meant by a man not of good moral character. Not only is the reputation of the poor fellow who is called upon to give security for keeping the peace or good behaviour at stake, but the reputation of the unfortunate person, whom it may be very difficult to secure in order to find as a surety, is in the hands of this Magistrate, who can say that he is not a man of good moral character. Are persons belonging to the C. I. D. men of good character, of good moral character, when they pry into other peoples' affairs? Do people belonging to the Income-tax Department come under the category of men of good moral character when they pry into my accounts and encourage my neighbours to spy on me and give evidence? What is meant by a man of good moral character? Is a big zemindar who openly lives with his concubine a man of good moral character? Is he a man of substance? Is he not a man quite worthy? Is he not a man whose bond is good enough? What is meant by the alteration now proposed by Government? It is merely adding to the terrors of this chapter. Not only do you bind the man to give you security for keeping the peace but you make it impossible for him to give that security. Would I, even if he were my best friend, go and stand surety and take the risk of being called a man of bad character at the hands of the Magistrate? Am I to place my reputation in the hands of the ill-paid police and the other agencies which are at work in binding over people to keep the peace? Now, take the other thing: “unable to control the movements or action of the person by whom the bond is to be executed.” You cannot judge beforehand. If I am unable to control the movements, if the man commits a breach of the bond, I forfeit a substantial sum, and the man who breaks the bond will be convicted for the offence and sent to jail; and I forfeit a heavy bail which I have given. The Magistrate is to decide whether I, the surety, will be a man who will be able to control the movements or action of the person by whom the bond has been executed. It is a very difficult task which you are imposing upon the Magistrate. The next condition is “of insufficient means to enable him to fulfil his pecuniary liability under the bond." That goes without saying. Why do you want an explanation? Have any Magistrates found any difficulty in rejecting a security when they found that the man was not of sufficient means? That shows that you do not want to have any faith in the Magistracy and that you do not think that they have the common-sense to find whether a surety is a fit surety or not. If he is not possessed of means to fulfil his pecuniary liability under the bond, that is the commonest ground on which the Magistrate would refuse to accept a security, so that the guidance given to the Magistrate in this case is in one respect unnecessary and in other respects it is a dangerous pitfall and shows the anxiety of the authorities to make it difficult for the man to find a surety, which even ordinarily is difficult to find. That is one of the objects in view. I now come to the second object in view. Under the law as it now stands, the Magistrate, once he has taken security, once he has accepted the surety, cannot cancel it afterwards if the circumstances change. Now it is proposed not only that he may originally refuse to accept the securities, but after having accepted security, say after six months of the period is over, that the Magistrate should have power to cancel it and call upon the man in question to give security all over again. Of course the position now is that the surety himself may come forward, after having given security and ask to be relieved of the security if he finds the man on whose behalf he has given it is a troublesome man. Then the Magistrate will call upon the man to furnish additional security. Now we are to give this power to the Magistrate again, although a man finds difficulty enough in finding the original security. To give this power to a Magistrate to revoke a security once it has been accepted is not necessary and it may lead to abuse of the power. It is not a case of punishment; it is of a purely preventive nature. A man has given security which is thought good enough; there is no reason why power should be given to revoke it afterwards.

The third provision is that if the surety is to be rejected the Magistrate is to do this and that. It is a judicial discretion which has been invested in the Magistrate; he is to be taught the elements of his duties, informing him that if he wishes to reject a surety, he must, in making an order refusing to accept, take evidence. Any Magistrate with any sense in him will do it. What is the use of telling him to record the substance of the evidence? It is not necessary for this duty to be taught to him; otherwise he is not fit to be a Magistrate. Therefore the three objects aimed at by this amendment are either unnecessary or likely to be mischievous, and this amendment is unnecessary. The section may be left as it is; it is wide enough. The discretion may be left to the Magistrate. What is the difference? The Magistrate may refuse to accept a surety on the ground, for reasons to be recorded by him, that such surety is an unfit person. His hands are not tied, and that judicial discretion is to be controlled by the High Court. I do not think therefore that any case has been made out for making this change. The 17 and odd amendments which follow will show what difficulty lawyers feel in laying down rules for the guidance of the discretion of Magistrates. I think it was Jenkins C. J. who said:

"In these matters of discretion, it is always very difficult to lay down rules for guidance. You must leave it to the good sense of the Magistrate, and that good sense is liable to be controlled by higher authority."

Therefore I ask that the section be left as it is, and this amendment be not made, and I move the amendment which stands in my name.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment is to omit the whole of clause 21.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, my Honourable friend proposes to delete the whole of clause 21 from the Bill. This clause, Sir, proposes to substitute a new section for the existing section 122. Let us see, in the first instance, what the provisions consist of. In the first place the Magistrate is given power to refuse to accept any surety offered, or to reject any surety previously accepted by him or by his predecessor. Secondly, provisions are made as to what is to take place before a Magistrate refuses to accept or reject any such surety. He must satisfy himself by inquiry on oath into the fitness of the surety, or cause such an inquiry to be held by a subordinate Magistrate. Then for the guidance of the courts an attempt has been made to indicate the grounds upon which a Magistrate may find a person to be unfit. Fourthly, it is provided that he shall record the substance of the evidence [sub-section (2)]; and finally in the case of an order rejecting a surety, it is provided that the person for whom the surety is bound to appear must be present. Now, Sir, my Honourable friend objects, in the first place, to the provisions as to the reasons for finding a surety to be unfit. We have amendments later in the list on which this question can be more fully and perhaps more properly considered. I would merely remark now that, as regards the first clause in it, as to good moral character, the Government lay no particular stress upon the word 'moral.' That a person is not of good character is, however, certainly a ground which has been generally considered by all the High Courts as one which should be applied. Then he objects, Sir, to clause (c) to the effect that the surety is unable to control the movements or actions of the person by whom the bond has been executed. That, Sir, is, in very general terms, the criterion which has been consistently considered by the Allahabad High Court to be the principal ground for finding whether a surety is fit or is not fit. Surely, Sir, what we should consider on the present motion is not these particular provisions. We shall have a chance of considering those at length later. Is it not now advisable to consider whether it is desirable to place in the Code definite provisions which will guide our Magistrates as to the action which they should take in these cases? Before proceeding further, I should like to draw the attention of the Assembly to the fact that in clause 107 of the Bill we are providing for an appeal against the orders passed under this section. Now, Sir, that clause has not been unnoticed by my Honourable and learned friend because he has given notice of an amendment to that clause. I submit, Sir, the amendment which he has proposed to that clause is entirely inconsistent with the amendment which he has proposed to this one. The position is that we propose to provide in the Code for an appeal against the orders of a Magistrate. At present we have a provision for revision. Well, there is a great difference between provisions for revision and provisions for appeal. Powers of revision are powers given to the courts. They are discretionary powers which may be exercised or not as the courts think fit; but when we give a right of appeal, we grant a right to the subject, and if we are to call upon our appellate courts to deal with these questions on appeal, it is essential that they should have proper material upon which to base their decision.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Even now the section runs: "For reasons to be recorded."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: The Honourable Member asks the question as to what is the necessity of providing in the Code for an inquiry. He suggests that it is practically teaching the Magistrate what he should do. Well, Sir, I suppose he will admit now that our High Courts are practically unanimous to the effect that there should be a judicial inquiry under this section. They are not, Sir, unanimous as regards the other point as to whether the inquiry should be on oath. The only rulings on that point are to the effect that in such an inquiry the Magistrate has the power, if he thinks fit, to take evidence on oath. I do not know whether it is necessary now to refer to the rulings on the question, but I should like to refer to the history of the clause. The proposals of the Government of India were contained in the Bill of 1914. In that Bill Government proposed to include a provision that

"before making an order refusing to accept a surety under sub-section (1), the Magistrate shall either himself inquire into the fitness of the surety or direct such inquiry to be made by any Magistrate subordinate to him, and the report of such subordinate Magistrate shall be admitted as evidence of the facts stated therein."

That clause, Sir, with opinions received upon it was considered by Sir George Lowndes' Committee and they noted in their remarks on clause 17:

"We think that the inquiry should be held upon oath and that the Magistrate should be bound to record the substance of the evidence adduced before him."

Then the Joint Committee included fresh provisions and so we have the clause as it stands in the Bill, a clause which I suggest is a distinctly reasonable proposal. We are providing for an appeal; we must, Sir, therefore definitely enact in the Code what are the materials which the Magistrate must include in the record of his inquiry under this section. Incidentally, I may say that the section does give power to enable a Magistrate to delegate the inquiry to a Magistrate subordinate to him, which the Allahabad High Court has held cannot now be done. In view of the fact that my Honourable and learned friend must, as I think he will admit, see that the amendment which he has proposed to clause 107 of the Bill is entirely inconsistent with his present amendment, I hope that he will withdraw his amendment.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"Omit the whole of clause 21."

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I rise to support the amendment so ably moved by my learned and Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. I say that the proposed new clause is quite vague and unworkable and would cause delay in the disposal of surety cases. One result would be that every person from whom a security is demanded will have to remain in custody for some time till the question whether a surety is proper or improper is decided. Now the limitation placed upon the competence and the qualifications of a surety are to be limited by these words, namely, not of good moral character. Now what is the meaning of these words—not of good moral character? It would depend upon the sweet whim of a Magistrate. One Magistrate may say that a person who is an ex-convict for murder is a man of bad character. Another Magistrate may say that every ex-convict is a man of bad character, including a man who has been fined one rupee in a case where he drove his motor without a lamp at 6-15 P.M. Then again one Magistrate may say that a Non-co-operator is a man of bad character, or not of good character; while another may say that a man who does not vote according to the Joint Magistrate's view at a municipal meeting where the Joint Magistrate happens to preside is not a good character. Where is the line of difference? How do you draw the line? Now, Sir, an orthodox Hindu might say that a man who drinks soda and lemonade is not a man of good character. Again, the "drys" will say that a man who drinks is a man of bad character. The "wets" on the contrary will say that a man who abstains from drink is a bad character. Now where is the line to be drawn? Now, Sir, some people might say that a man who marries in a community which is not his own is a man of bad character. There are many who say that. Others may say that a man who keeps a concubine secretly is a man of good character, but that he who keeps a concubine openly is a man of bad character. I do not want to be long; I have just explained my object that this is too vague. Now, sub-clause (b) runs:

[Lala Girdharilal Agarwala.]

"of insufficient means to enable him to fulfil his pecuniary liability under the bond."

This is simply saying that a man who has got no property should not be a surety. That is the ordinary law now; the present law provides also for that, and nobody would take a surety from a man who has got no means. This does not require to be changed. The last sub-clause is "unable to control the movements or actions of the person by whom the bond has been executed."

How is the Magistrate to know that beforehand? I submit that this too is most improper and one result that would be inevitable in every case would be that the person against whom an order for finding surety has been passed would have to live in jail for some time before he is, if at all, released on furnishing security. With these words I support the amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, I wish even at the risk of earning a Rangachariar like rebuke from the Government Benches I could have preached what Mr. Rangachariar calls a homily and ask them to economise time; because if they consented to dropping this proposed clause and accepted Mr. Rangachariar's amendment they would have got rid of 17 amendments at a stroke and economised much time. I am afraid, however, that that homily at all events would be inopportune. There are occasions when however it can be successfully and effectively preached and Government might also respond to my appeal by accepting what can be accepted without detriment to the public weal, as I said previously.

It is always a pleasure to be able to agree with Mr. Rangachariar. Sometimes it is possibly expedient because the severity, assumed or otherwise, of his wrath and the mode of its expression is apt to be uncomfortable now and again. But here, Sir, we have a vivid illustration of the utter baselessness of his contention. Section 122 is far too broad and general. Government attempts to define, Government attempts to afford some safeguards, some differentiating elements, that would be the much needed guide, but Mr. Rangachariar thinks that generalities, indefiniteness and vagueness are about the best and had better continue and attempted definition is to be deprecated. I do not know whether he has behind him on this occasion the support of his own Bar Association. Now, it is quite clear that section 122 as it stands is capable of improvement, certainly in two directions; one has been pointed out already by Mr. Tonkinson. We are going to have an appeal now, and the materials for a proper appeal must be there. Therefore evidence is to be recorded, at least its substance. Well, so far as insistence on moral character in sureties goes, I am afraid it is a dead horse as far as the Government is concerned. It is no good Mr. Agarwala's multiplying his notion about various elements of good or bad character; Government is prepared, I believe, to drop its insistence upon moral character in sureties, if I understood Mr. Tonkinson aright . . .

Mr. H. Tonkinson: On the word 'Moral.'

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Government does not want to insist on the word 'moral.' Any way we can discuss all that detail only in the course of the amendments that follow and we shall judge which to accept and which not to. But if you drop as Mr. Rangachariar suggests the whole of the proposed clause 122, why the, the very necessary safeguard I have referred to will be denied to us. If we can get rid of the objectionable features of section 122, as pointed out in the amendments against sub-clause (a) of clause 122 (1) and also in Mr. Iswar Saran's amendment with regard to the incoming man interfering with what his predecessor had done, where is the good in retaining the clause as Mr. Rangachariar suggests? I think we ought to concentrate our attention upon the details that suggest improvements, and without attempting to preach a homily once more I suggest the omnibus desire to drop section 122 should be dropped.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): Just before the interval, we on the Government side took certain risks; we did not desire to prolong the discussion on the proposal to introduce a definition of "repute" which we thought to be thoroughly bad, and therefore did not discuss it at length, although we had material by which we could have riddled it not in one, but in fifty different directions. Fortunately the House showed that we were justified in taking that risk, for it refused to support Mr. Kabeer-ul-Din Ahmed in stepping in where one of the greatest legal luminaries had feared to tread. But the present case is one which we must argue out, because we feel that in justice to ourselves we must make it clear that it is not primarily in the interests of Government that our revised clause 122 has been put forward. It has been put forward entirely in the interests of persons affected by an order to provide security. It is always a pleasure to have to deal with an amendment by Mr. Rangachariar; he always supports it on definite grounds, capable of no misapprehension. What is his ground here? It is, that we already in the present section 122 have all that we want. Why seek to lay down for Magistrates rules designed merely to help them to decide who they shall and who they shall not accept as surety? Trust your Magistrates; they are men of discretion. Why tie their hands in any way? I am only too glad that the genial influences of yesterday's holiday have so weighed with Mr. Rangachariar (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "It was not a holiday to me") that he is now prepared to place so high a measure of confidence in our Magistrates. There have been other respects in which he has not shown an equally liberal spirit. When we were dealing with section 107 he showed no such spirit of confidence. In dealing with the question of taking security for breach of peace (section 107), what did he demand the Magistrate should do? Why, that he should immediately report each and every order to the Sessions Judge, who was to pass orders as to the propriety or otherwise of his conduct. But now that we have this handsome admission from Mr. Rangachariar, we shall not forget it, and when we come to the numerous amendments tabled by him, which propose to place restrictions on the discretion of our Magistrates, he will not, I know, resent it if I remind him of what he has said this morning, and hold him to it. But, as a matter of fact, have we been unwise in attempting to lay down for our Magistrates definite rules of conduct here? Like the sons of Levi, have we taken too much upon ourselves? Let me give the reasons why it has been done. Let me quote the demand of an authority which Mr. Rangachariar will, I think, be the last to depreciate. This is what the Bar Library of Calcutta said to us:

"We think it absolutely necessary that the question of the grounds of fitness of sureties should be determined by the Code having regard to the great diversity of judicial opinions on the matter. The Allahabad rulings have generally adopted ability to control as the test. The Calcutta decisions while dissenting from this view are in conflict inter se. Some accept the test of property qualifications and others regard the question as one to be determined on the facts of each case."

Then again, let me quote the opinion of the Calcutta High Court. They say:

"Some difference of opinion exists as indicated in recent decisions of this Court whether the obligation of the surety is simply pecuniary or whether he may be expected and required to exercise some measure of control over the person whose good behaviour he guarantees. The clear intention of the Legislature might, in the opinion of the Judges, find expression in the section."

And all that the Lowndes' Committee proposed to do was to allow the Legislature to express its opinion on this particular point. It is not really Government that has initiated the insertion of the new section; it was legal opinion itself that has prompted us to this action. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to one part of Mr. Rangachariar's attack on us; but to complete my case I will quote to the House yet one further legal authority on the point. The Chief Court in Rangoon found that its Magistrates needed guidance in the matter; they felt the matter so important that they laid down the following rules for Magistrates in accepting sureties. They say:

"Before any person is accepted as surety for good behaviour the Magistrate should satisfy himself that the person . . ."

I ask the House to note the words which follow; they bear a curious similarity to what we have got in our Bill.

"is of good character, is able to pay the penalty in the bond and lives in a place where he is likely to be able to exercise some supervision over the conduct of the suspect."

If then our legal advisers and the administrators of our Courts are correct, it is clear that Magistrates do actually need some guidance in the matter. It is particularly the case, as Mr. Tonkinson pointed out this morning, that some such provision as this is required now that we are prepared to give an appeal against the refusal of sureties. If you take section 122 as it now stands in the Code, all that the appellate Court could say is since there are no criteria laid down by the Legislature, it had no material upon which they can over-rule them, and the same differences of opinion as to what criteria should be applied would continue to trouble both the Magistrates and the appellate Courts. That the differences are material the rulings in the commentaries show. I have given reasons—perfectly adequate reasons—for making some provision of the nature of the new section 122 to take the place of the very wide discretion left under the existing section 122. I am not at this point proposing to argue the details of our new clause. It has been attacked by Mr. Rangachariar on principle, and not primarily on questions of detail. As Mr. Tonkinson said this morning and as Dr. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadliakary has just repeated, the House will have full opportunity to judge whether the criteria we have laid down are adequate or need amendment. We are, for instance, quite prepared to give way on the question of the insertion of the word “moral” before “character.” After all, a person’s private peccadilloes lie between him and his creator or his wife. There is no real reason why they should be allowed to count in deciding his sufficiency as a surety. With regard to the remaining two requirements, (b) and (c), we are quite prepared to argue them on the merits and if necessary to amend them on the merits. I am arguing here solely on the question whether some provision such as the new 122 is required or not, and that is the point on which the decision of the House is in the first place necessary.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, I took advantage of the holiday yesterday to give a good deal of consideration to this amendment and I came to the conclusion that the proposal of the Honourable Mover ought to have support. I have listened to the arguments which were advanced in support of the clause in the Bill which the Honourable Mover wishes to have omitted and my opinion in favour of the motion remains unshaken. The present section 122 is a simple and straightforward section, introducing no complications, involving no undue delay in procedure, which, if it is to be worth anything, ought to be prompt, and it contains in its one simple provision, namely, that the Magistrate shall record his reasons in writing, all the safeguards which can possibly be got if the Magistrate is to be anything more than a mere machine. I at all events can claim freedom from any inconsistency in asking for confidence in the discretion of Magistrates. The clause which the Bill now before us proposes to substitute for this simple section shows many disadvantages. The first thing is that it involves an error of a well known judicial principle. It is an attempt to crystallise judicial discretion. It purports to substitute for the simple procedure laid down by the present section 122 a cumbrous and complicated procedure. I join issue with those who say that this proposed clause will introduce safeguards. My own impression is that while affording excuse to the weak Magistrate, to the arbitrary Magistrate, to the pro-police Magistrate—and there are such Magistrates—to refuse security, it will merely harass and confuse the conscientious Magistrate. What does it involve? When a man offers security, instantly on behalf of the prosecution

3 C.M. in a great many cases will come the objection to the security; and then the Magistrate will be required to enter upon a preliminary inquiry into the moral character, or into the solvency of the surety or into his power of control over the accused, (if I may so speak of him) before anything is done in the original case itself. A regular case will be tried, substantive evidence recorded and a finding delivered; and then will follow an appeal which may take days, or weeks or months; and all this time the man who is required to give security will be “hung up,” possibly under arrest. Well, that I think is a procedure which will not commend itself to the House. Why is this particular distinction made in this case? If a Magistrate can be trusted to take surety for bail in serious cases, why not in a case where there is no offence whatever alleged except the general badness of character or an intent to commit an offence. The reason for that distinction does not appear to be quite clear. Then, without going into the little details that have already been sufficiently urged, as to the difficulty of deciding exactly what is a bad moral character, I would submit for the consideration of the House, that in a great many of these cases under the rule "set a thief to catch a thief," a man of bad character may be the best security that the public can have, to look after the man that wants supervision. No doubt the solvency of the surety is a very proper subject of inquiry; and I do not imagine that any Magistrate or any court would accept a surety unless he or it was satisfied in a reasonable way that he was a man whose bond could be depended upon. With regard to the point of control over the person bound, it is difficult to understand exactly what is meant by the surety's control. A surety must not indulge in wrongful restraint or wrongful confinement, he can only use moral influence or whatever influence he may have, to control the person bound over. Well, no surety will ever bind himself unless he feels he can control the man. The mere fact that he binds himself indicates that he feels confident of being able to keep his man in the right way so as to save his own money. When a man stands surety for a particular person for not breaking the peace or for being of good behaviour, he naturally stands surety to see that he does so. In that view the provision is unnecessary. But the main ground upon which I venture to oppose the clause in the Bill and to support this amendment is this that this crystallising, or an attempt to crystallise, the discretion of the Magistrate, is not a move in the right direction. It is a retrograde step; and while it will not control the Magistrates in any particular way, it will, on the other hand, furnish excuses to refuse sureties upon unjustifiable grounds. For all these reasons, I recommend to the House to sustain the amendment.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I move that the question be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the whole of clause 21 be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division. Non-Muhammadian): Sir, practically my amendment is the same as that of my predecessor, the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar. My amendment is to the effect that the Magistrate may refuse to accept any surety offered under this Chapter on the ground that, for reasons to be recorded by the Magistrate, the surety is not fit to stand as such.

Mr. Deputy President: I am afraid, it cannot be moved. Munshi Iswar Saran.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, after the speeches that have been made on the subject, I do not think it is at all necessary for me to make a long speech. The House will notice that under section 122 in the Bill it is provided that a Magistrate may after having accepted a surety reject it. I submit that it is not at all necessary to give him this power, and I do not see that any necessity has arisen for introducing this change in the law as it stands. The provisions in the present Criminal Procedure Code have stood the test of time and they have worked very well. I submit that a change like this in certain cases is apt to be misused. If you have a weak Magistrate or a pro-police Magistrate, as Sir Henry Stanyon puts it, he may, after having accepted a surety, very well say, "well, on further facts that have been brought to my notice, I am inclined to reject this surety." I therefore submit to the House that this power should not be given to the Magistrate. I move, Sir:

"That in clause 21 in section 122:

Omit the words from 'or may reject' to the word 'predecessor' in sub-section (1)."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, all that the Bill proposes in this matter is to enable a Magistrate to reject a surety previously accepted, not arbitrarily, but on the same grounds which would have justified him in refusing to accept the surety in the first case. There is a clause in the Bill, much later on, which provides for two possible contingencies which may arise. One is when a surety becomes insolvent, and the other when a surety dies. The Bill provides for both those cases and enables a Magistrate to demand fresh security. He obviously must do so. But there are other cases in which a surety may subsequently become an unfit person though at the time he was accepted he may have been fit. It seems to me that it is only logical to provide that if a surety subsequently becomes unfit for reasons which would have justified the Magistrate in rejecting him in the first case, then the Magistrate should be able to call for fresh security. What is to happen if a person who has been bound over under these sections finds a surety who at the time is perfectly fit, able to control the person for whom he stands, is of good character and sufficient financial means, but who later emigrates to Fiji? In the first place there can be no question of his controlling the person for whom he stands surety. In the second place there will be no means of enforcing the bond as the man will be gone. Or take the case of a surety who is sent to jail for a long period. Is there any reason why in such cases the Magistrate should not have power to call for a fresh surety?

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.]

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 21 in section 122:

Omit the words from 'or may reject' to the word 'predecessor' in sub-section (1)."

The motion was negatived

Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao (Guntur cum Nellore: Non-Muhamadan Rural): The amendment which I have the honour to move is as follows:

"In clause 21 in sub-section (1) of proposed section 122:

Omit clause (a), viz., 'not of good moral character.'"

The Honourable House is aware that the Lowndes Committee, which consisted of members upon whom much encomium has been lavished by this House, have deliberately held that it is a mistake to define the grounds of fitness. Anyhow the House has decided by a majority of one vote that it is necessary to define the same. Now the question for the consideration of the Honourable House is whether this condition should be retained, namely, "not of good moral character." Government either in their desire to meet the wishes of the Honourable Members, or for other reasons, have generously offered to drop the word "moral." It seems to me, Sir, that this makes no difference whatever. I cannot understand character divorced from moral principles. Then taking the illustration of my learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar . . .

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Not his own illustration.

Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao: The illustration quoted by him,—of a zamindar keeping a concubine but having great influence over his tenants. Suppose he offers to be a surety for one of his tenants against whom proceedings are instituted. I believe there are some zamindars who think they would not deserve the name of zamindar unless they kept one or two women. Would they come under the category of persons of good character according to the view propounded from Government Benches? It seems to me that though the word "moral" is dropped, the substance is there. It would not make any change whatever. And it seems to me that this clause cannot commend itself to the Honourable House. What is the effect of having a proviso like this? Any person who wants to be a surety would have to allow his character to be inquired into by a Magistrate. I do not think any man of self-respect would allow his character to be impeached or challenged by the police or any Magistrate who presides over the court. If the Magistrate has a dislike against the man, he will say, he is not of good character and he cannot accept his security. The words are so comprehensive and elastic that they will include everything, and any person may be rejected as not being a fit person on one ground or another, and it would be absolutely impossible for any person against whom proceedings are instituted to get a surety. It will strike any one that the object is practically to deprive these persons from getting sureties. Judging from the practical point of view, I suppose it will be conceded that every opportunity should be given to persons bound over to be of good behaviour, and even under the existing law it is difficult to procure sureties for good behaviour. I think we must encourage people to come forward to give surety, because there is always the prospect of a good, healthy, influence being wielded over the persons bound over. Now, this new section will frustrate the very object of bad characters or habitual offenders being reformed into really good men, by preventing respectable persons from coming forward and standing as sureties for their good behaviour. Therefore, it seems to me that by retaining this clause you will practically deprive every person against whom proceedings are instituted from being able to get respectable sureties.

[Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao.]

For these reasons, Sir, I have no doubt that the Honourable House will accept my amendment to omit clause (a) in sub-section (1) of proposed clause 122.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the Honourable Member proposes to omit clause (a), the first of the conditions which it is proposed to specify to guide Magistrates in their action as regards the rejection or the acceptance of a surety. Now, Sir, I would submit that, although, as regards clauses (b) and (c), there have been very considerable differences of opinion in the different High Courts, as regards clause (a) there is practically no difference of opinion, that is, the question as to whether a man is of a good character or not is generally accepted as one of the points which should be considered by the Magistrate. The Honourable the Leader of the House read out the instructions given by the Lower Burma Chief Court to the Courts in Burma. Good character was included amongst them. The Judicial Commissioner in Sind has held that the character and status of the sureties required may suitably be specified. The Bombay Courts have done the same. The Allahabad decisions are generally on the lines of clause (c), but they have definitely held that it is a material point in the inquiry as to whether a man has had a previous conviction, and so on. There is, Sir, I think not the least doubt whatsoever that this is a criterion which should be included. We are quite prepared, as we have said already, to omit the word "moral" and, if that would meet the wishes of the House, we would accept that amendment. (Cries of "No, no.") If, however, this clause is cut out from section 122, I would submit, Sir, that then we should have a contradiction between section 122 and section 112 of the Code. Under section 112 it is definitely stated that when the Magistrate makes an order in writing setting forth the substance of the information received, he shall also state the amount of the bond to be executed, the term for which it is to be in force, and the number, character and class of securities, if any, required. The omission, Sir, of this clause will mean that we shall have a definite contradiction between section 122 and section 112, because, Sir, if that clause is omitted, then the Magistrate in refusing to accept security may follow only clauses (f) and (c).

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Character there has a different meaning altogether.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: That word existed in the old Code.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I say a word? I am sorry the Government should think of opposing this amendment also. If you omit the word 'moral' and still retain the word 'good', I do not think you are improving the position of the accused. On the other hand, as has been pointed out by Sir Henry Stanvon, a good Magistrate will find it very difficult to come to a conclusion whether a man is of good character or of good moral character, and a bad Magistrate would take it into his head to make it impossible for the accused to give security. Already the House has empowered the Magistrate to reject a security which has once been accepted. Supposing a man has been speaking at a political meeting, and the Magistrate comes to the conclusion that this man is on that ground a bad character and that therefore the security offered by him should be cancelled. What would be the position of the accused? I do not think the Government is facilitating the work of the Assembly by speaking against the amendment which has just been moved. Sir, it becomes very difficult for us, if we find no spirit of "give and take" in a matter like this, to make any advances to Government. I thought this was one of the occasions when the Government may go out of its way to accept an amendment. By omitting the word 'moral' and retaining the word 'good' you are not improving matters at all. On the other hand, you are making the position of the accused more difficult.

Mr. S. C. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zamindars: Landholders): Sir, I have merely to point out that the Government are doing something very bad in omitting the word 'moral' in the clause providing for a surety to be of good moral character. The ideas of some of the people with regard to 'good' and 'moral' may be not a little confounded, if the Government come forward to advisedly drop the word 'moral.' The position of the Government here is anomalous, and I think based on ignorance as to the meaning of the two terms, good and moral. No one in human society can be good without being moral. ("Hear, hear" from Government Bench.) You may cry "Hear, hear" but in doing so you really show that at least you do not understand the terms. If you analyse the word 'moral,' you see that in its reference is clearly made to the relations subsisting between one man and another which to be true must needs be good. Separating social relations from the dictates of God regarding goodness should be deemed incorrect and unwise. I would request the Government, in spite of their having assumed in this matter airs of superiority, to apply their minds to the ideas involved in the two terms and to make the position they assume in their regard more logical and consistent. Apart from the objections that have been raised by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, which are indeed valid, it would, as I say, on ethical-political grounds be advisable on the part of Government not to go in for a course of conduct of such a dubious nature.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): Sir, I do not understand quite clearly whether the Honourable the Mover has accepted the suggestion of Government that the word 'moral' should be omitted; but if he has not, I would beg your permission to move definitely a further amendment that the word "moral" be omitted from clause (a).

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I had no intention of speaking upon this motion but

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That in clause 21 in sub-section (1) of proposed section 122, clause (a) be omitted to which a further amendment has been moved that the word 'moral' be omitted."

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): The amendment is that the clause be omitted; the amendment to the amendment is that the clause be not omitted except with the word 'moral,' which may be omitted. Such an amendment, I submit, is not in order.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 21, in sub-clause (1) of proposed section 122, clause (a) be omitted."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: As I said, I had no intention of speaking upon this motion. But with regard to the remark that fell from Mr. Tonkinson as to the inconsistency in section 122 (as it is proposed to be amended) and section 112, I must say I cannot see that inconsistency at all. Mr. Tonkinson was of opinion that if the clause were omitted from section 122 it would become inconsistent with the words "number" and "character" in section

[Mr. W. M. Hussanally.]

112. I do not think that the word 'character' in section 112 bears the same meaning as in the new clause in section 112. "Character" in section 112 means only 'kind' and nothing further; whereas in section 122 it refers to moral character, and I think, Sir, that so far as the inquiry into the moral character of a person is concerned, it will be very difficult for Magistrates to hold an inquiry and to come to any satisfactory decision in the matter; because moral character is such a vague term that any inquiry into that matter will result in nothing; and as has been pointed out by my friend, Mr. Srinivasa Rao, even if a person has spoken a lie he becomes a man of bad moral character. Therefore if the character of a person is to be inquired into, the section ought to be recast and made more definite. As the section stands I think there is no go but to delete it.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): I only wish to point out, Sir, that, if we omit this clause, the Magistrate would not be able to refuse any surety however notorious he might be. It seems to me that that would be the effect, because you are tying down the Magistrate strictly to the remaining clauses, namely, clauses (b) and (c). Consequently the Magistrate could not refuse a man who had been convicted of a serious offence involving moral turpitude. Even Mr. Agnihotri agrees, that a man who has been convicted of an offence involving moral turpitude should not be allowed to stand as surety. But, if you cut out this clause altogether, a man who has been convicted of any offence whatsoever could not be refused by a Magistrate.

Mr. H. E. Holme (United Provinces: Nominated Official): Sir, it seems to me to be assumed that in every case an inquiry would be made as a matter of course into the character of the surety and unless that inquiry issues in a satisfactory result the surety will be rejected; whereas it would seem that as a matter of course the surety would be accepted unless there is some reason for objection to him, in which case an inquiry will have to be made, and the Magistrate would, I think, not take upon himself an additional burden especially when he is heavily over-worked by making such an inquiry unless there is some reason for it. At present it appears that the usual course is to make some inquiry or have some inquiry made into the qualifications of the surety before the surety is accepted, and to give power to reject him later will rather tend to result in the surety being accepted as a matter of course at once, unless some reason is shown to the contrary.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, in addition to what Mr. Hussanally has said in reply to Mr. Tonkinson, there is also this consideration, that this word "character" in section 112 existed in the old Code also side by side with section 122 as it then existed, whereas in section 122 the word "character" did not appear. So, the absence of the word "character" would not create the difficulty or inconvenience which Mr. Tonkinson has pointed out. I quite agree with Mr. Hussanally there. Mr. Percival said that it would be absurd that a Magistrate should not be in a position to refuse security from a man who has been previously convicted. To begin with, it is quite one thing to say that a man should be refused as security because he has been previously convicted and quite another thing to say that a man who is of a bad moral character should be refused. To overcome that difficulty the more logical and more consistent course is to make a provision that "if any person has been previously convicted, he should be refused " without saying anything about his being a man of bad moral character. But I do not see any force of reasoning in refusing security of a person who has been previously convicted. As Sir Henry Stanyon pertinently pointed out what is the object of taking a security? The object of taking a security is that in the event of the accused person violating his bond and not observing the terms upon which he has been let off, the security should pay up the amount. That is the only object. What have you got to do with his moral character or his having been previously convicted? What have you got to do with his having control over the man or not? The only criterion, the only principle upon which you are taking security is that the accused will be of good behaviour during that period. If he is not of good behaviour, then his security forfeits the money. As Sir Henry Stanyon pointed out, in very many cases there would be men of bad character who would be qualified to stand as security for their friends, because there will be a kind of obligation upon the security to see that the accused person does not go astray so that he may save his money. Further, I think—this is a point that has been laid stress upon by previous speakers, but I think nothing will be lost by my repeating it—you would be making it very hard for Magistrates to find out whether a man's character is really such as can come within the category of the provisions of the Bill or not. There are various and various kinds of bad characters. There may be some who might think that a man who has done a particular wrong or who has been very bad to his neighbour is an immoral man. Another man may think that in his relations with other men the proposed security does not possess the requisite qualifications. When such considerations can arise, I think, Government are committing a mistake by trying to maintain the position they have taken of retaining this clause of the Bill. I think it is not in the interests of legislation, if it is not in the interests of the subjects or the people that this clause should be retained.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar and Mr. J. Chaudhuri (at the same time): I move that the question be now put.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I want to refer to one point in regard to the remarks which fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally. He said that even omitting the word "moral," if we have the word "good character" in this clause, the Courts will be in doubt as to what "good character" means. Now, I think that argument might tend to mislead the House. I doubt whether my Honourable friend had in his mind the Evidence Act, because the words "of good character" are used in the Evidence Act, and they have never caused any difficulty there. I have never heard of any suggestion that they should be amended. Section 53 of the Evidence Act says:

"In criminal proceedings, the fact that the person accused is of a good character is relevant."

There is the Evidence Act laying down definitely that a certain class of evidence is relevant. What is the good of telling the Courts that it is relevant if the Courts do not know what it means? The course of the debate has, I think, shown that a certain section of the House is of opinion that the character of the surety ought not to be taken into consideration at all. Certain Members think that if he is a wealthy man and lives on the spot, it does not matter what sort of character he may have, and the Magistrate is not to be justified in rejecting him. That is a view which will not commend itself to any of the High Courts. I think the House is overlooking the fact that the High Courts have practically unanimously laid down that character is one of the grounds which may be considered when the Magistrate is making an inquiry into the surety's fitness. It has been done over and over again. If you take up any commentary you will find the rulings. Sohoni's commentary is to the following effect:

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.]

"The generally accepted view seems to be that the Magistrate is at liberty to take into consideration the 'moral unfitness' of the person as well (that is, as well as the financial position)."

The Calcutta High Court in a case in which the surety had been rejected on several grounds brushed aside some of the grounds. As regards the ground that the surety had three brothers in jail, they said, "No, that does not affect his character. We take the man as he is." The other ground that he did not live close by—they brushed that aside also, but the fact that the sureties were reported to be of bad character—the Court found that to be sufficient ground for a Magistrate to reject a surety. I would ask the House to consider most seriously whether by rejecting this clause altogether, throwing out clause (a) of the Bill altogether, they are going to prevent Magistrates from rejecting a surety though he may be a bad character. We are, as far as I understand, discussing whether clause (a) should stand. If it stands, then Government are quite prepared to accede to the amendment moved by my Honourable friend opposite that the word "moral" should be omitted.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor; Non-Muhammadan): We started this morning with the precept that we ought to cut short the discussion and that we should proceed with the amendments as quickly as we can. I am afraid the blame for prolonging the discussion does not rest on one side of the House or on one section of the House, but it rests on all sides, on all sections of the House. Character, as has been several times pointed out, is an element in testing sureties that are submitted to the Court. Whether in civil matters or in criminal matters character has always been considered, and no Magistrate or Judge worth his position ever ignores the character of person who is offered as surety. Of course, the primary consideration is that he is solvent. Therefore, having been unable to carry the amendment which my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, suggested, we are now dealing with the details of the clause of the Bill. Government has made a fair offer that they would omit the word "moral" which lends itself to all sorts of misapprehensions. I think it is advisable to accept that small concession to omit the word "moral" and have "good character" only in the clause. That will save us a lot of trouble and will also be in conformity with the decisions of the Courts. We need not stand up for persons who are considered not to possess character, but with regard to "moral" there is the difficulty of interpretation of the term, and therefore on that ground the word "moral" is offered to be omitted, and I think we will do well to accept that offer and close with it as quickly as we can.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: May I ask if I would be in order if I suggest that the words "a convicted person" be substituted for clause (a), and ask if that is acceptable to the Government Benches?

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 21 in sub-section (1) of proposed section 122, clause (a) be omitted."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: On a point of order, Sir, may I at this stage propose An amendment in place of clause (a), with reference to a convicted person being accepted as surety . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I object to his coming forward with a new amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: I rule it out of order. I want to know if Mr. Srinivasa Rao will move his amendment to (b) of clause 65.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: He does not move it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Then I would ask your permission, Sir, to move the omission of clauses (b) and (c), that being the amendment put forward by Mr. Srinivasa Rao.

(Voices: " We did not catch properly what the Honourable Member said. ")

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I am asking the permission of the Chair to move the omission of clauses (b) and (c). I now formally move the following amendment:

"In clause 21 in section 122:

Omit the words 'as being' and clauses (b) and (c)."

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I move, Sir:

"That in clause 21 in proposed section 122, sub-section(1), in the proviso for the words 'cause such inquiry to be held and a report to be made thereon by the Magistrate subordinate to him' substitute the words 'accept a certificate of fitness from a pleader practising in the court of the Magistrate or of some superior court, or from any respectable inhabitant of the locality'."

The reason why I have been impressed to move this amendment is that Magistrates from time to time, according to the case of the prosecution, have held that in certain villages there is no respectable person because all of them are low-class Hindus, low-class Muhammadan cultivators or probably they are a class of people whom the Sub-Inspector will not be kind enough to acknowledge to be respectable, and who are very often being prosecuted under section 110 and sent to jail. That is the reason why I have suggested the words noted above in substitution for the words "cause such inquiry to be held and a report made thereon by the Magistrate subordinate to him" as desirable.

And this, I submit, is a sound principle, which should be accepted by this House, because the poor man who rightly or wrongly by the decision of Court has been convicted and bound over for a certain amount to be of good behaviour for a year or two or three years, certainly, Sir, has got to furnish surety. The principle is that some substantial security which is forthcoming should be furnished within the time fixed. After the poor man has arranged everything to get the surety in compliance with the law, the police will tell the Magistrate some thing and the Magistrate will say 'Look here, Sir, this man is no good, because there was a case against him,' because some person went there and lodged information at the police station. There is entry of the information in the diary—I do not know how many kinds of diaries are kept, but I may say according to the Procedure Code and for the satisfaction of this House and under the provision of law there are only two kinds of diaries kept in every police station. But they bring a certain entry which is not a proved entry; it is only a matter of complaint which is not inquired into and reported or a charge sheet of it submitted, it is only an ex parte entry which is found in the police diary and the Magistrate takes the word of the police as gospel truth and rejects the surety, which is an insult to the educated people of this country when they stand surety for their servants, etc. It is an insult to the morality, nay of civilization, that they should insist on keeping the man in the lock up without accepting the surety offered. All this has been put under section 110 and the wrong end of the stick has been caught hold of, leaving aside the principle of law, forgetting that a man in compliance with the order of the Magistrate under section 110 has furnished the security. This has been abused in the past and there is no way of getting out of it, because the police will throw some blue light from his magic lantern and the Magistrate will take that blue light as the beacon light and that is the only light that reflects on the so-called justice according to him against 99 persons out of 100 and that is how, Sir, there is miscarriage of justice in this country. People having come to the Court and being ready and willing to give security cannot get out of the clutches of the police, and it is very obvious from the decisions of Judges that this engine of oppression should be removed. Sir, in this connection I ought to read the opinions of some of the distinguished bodies in India. I should have handed over this to my Honourable friend Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith. But he has got a copy, I know. It is not quite relevant to the point, but the substance of it will cover exactly what he wants probably for the time, being to fit in this amendment.

Sir, I will read from page 123 of the opinions of various distinguished bodies recorded in 1918 on the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, the comments of the Bar of the Calcutta High Court on this subject:

"We think it is absolutely necessary that the question of the grounds of fitness of sureties should be determined by the Code, having regard to the great diversity of judicial opinion on the matter. The Allahabad rulings have generally adopted ability of control as the test. The Calcutta decisions, while dissenting from this view, are in conflict inter se, some accepting the test of property qualification and others regarding the question as one to be determined on the facts of each case. We would refer to Abdul Karim versus Emp. 44 Cal. 731, as exemplifying the conflict between Calcutta cases, and indicating the necessity of settling the question once for all."

Sir, this is relevant to the amendment I wish to make, namely the substitution for the words—"cause such inquiry to be held and a report to be made thereon by a Magistrate subordinate to him," of the words:

"accept a certificate of fitness from a pleader practising in the Court of the Magistrate or of some superior court, or from any respectable inhabitant of the locality."

Sir, this amendment will bring the solution for all the difficulties and it is good for the Government and for the country and the people at large, and is necessary to serve the ends of justice; and that is why I have brought it before you for your kind acceptance. Such difficulties are against good polices and it is against the public interest; and that the Legislature should undertake to legislate where the conditions cannot be fulfilled. Therefore I think I have satisfied you for the substitution of these words. You will find, it is not difficult at all, because if a man is defended by a pleader or lawyer of a Magistrate's court or a higher court, he is supposed to know his client well; he has got correspondence from the village where he lives. The man has been writing letters to his pleader and his pleader's clerk. The pleader knows the position of the man and his certificate is enough. If you think the certificate of a Bachelor of Law who is practising at a court is not enough, I ask you to exercise your common sense and see how and where the poor ryot would stand when he comes for justice. There must be some way of providing for his case; you do not want to keep him in the lock-up. It is against public policy. With due respect I ask the Government to be good enough to accept this amendment and bring a solution of these difficulties.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban):
I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

That in clause 21 in the proviso to sub-section (1) of the proposed new section 122 for the words from "cause such inquiry to be held and a report to be made thereon by a Magistrate subordinate to him" substitute the words "accept a certificate of fitness from a pleader practising in the Court of the Magistrate or of some superior Court, or from any respectable inhabitant of the locality."

The question is that that amendment be made.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Sir, I have to move an amendment to this.

(Several Honourable Members moved that the question be now put.)

The amendment moved was negatived.

Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava (Ambala Division: Non-Muhamadan): Sir, with your permission, I beg to suggest an amendment which is of a non-controversial nature, namely, that in the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 122 the words "or solemn affirmation" be added after the word "oath."

(An Honourable Member: "Oath includes solemn affirmation?")

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I object to the moving of the amendment.

(Mr. Deputy President then called upon Mr. Pantulu to move his amendment.)

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I propose:

"That in clause 21, in sub-section (2) of proposed new section 122, between the word 'inquiry' and the words 'the Magistrate', the following words, namely:

'the person on whose behalf the surety is offered or has been previously accepted shall be given an opportunity of proving the fitness of the surety and' be inserted."

The clause to which I am referring reads thus:

"In every such inquiry the Magistrate holding the same shall record the substance of the evidence adduced before him."

The inquiry which is referred to here is the inquiry which a Magistrate makes for the purpose of finding out whether he should reject a surety already accepted, and this inquiry will evidently be based upon the evidence adduced by the police. That would be a one-sided inquiry and there is nothing in the section, as worded here, to prevent a decision being arrived at without the person on whose behalf the surety has been offered or accepted having an opportunity of saying what he has to say. It would be very unfair that a surety who has been once accepted, should be rejected behind the back of the person who offered that surety and simply on the one-sided inquiry that is made and the evidence adduced by the police. It is only fair that, when you reject a surety who has been already accepted, that you should give the party on whose behalf the surety was once accepted an opportunity of saying that he is still fit to be accepted and that the reasons given by the police are not sound.

I think this is a very reasonable proposition and I hope the Government will see their way to accept this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I may say at once that the Government has no objection whatever to the principle of this amendment. I do not myself quite like the drafting. I would rather not weld it on to the section as it is at present. There is no reason whatever why notice should not be given to the person most affected that is, the person offering surety and why he should not be given an opportunity of showing cause but I think it would be better if instead of introducing the words into the clause as it stands we substitute a new sub-section (2) in the proposed section 122 as it stands in the Bill, and I would move, Sir, and I do move accordingly, that for sub-section (2) of the proposed section 122, the following be substituted:

"Such Magistrate shall before holding the inquiry give reasonable notice to the person by whom the surety was offered and shall in making the inquiry record the substance of the evidence adduced before him."

The amendment I propose lays it down that the Magistrate shall give reasonable notice to the person affected. It is quite unnecessary, as in any other cases, to lay down that the man should be given an opportunity for giving evidence. He is bound to have that. If any Magistrate holds an ex parte inquiry in this case, the House has to remember that we are providing an appeal in every case, and the Appellate Court would immediately upset any order rejecting a surety if the Magistrate had made an ex parte inquiry without giving notice to the person affected. I would therefore commend this redraft to the House.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: What is the amendment, will you please read it out?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It is to substitute for sub-section (2) in the Bill these words, which embody what Mr. Pantulu desires:

"(2) Such Magistrate shall before holding the inquiry give reasonable notice to the person by whom the surety was offered and shall, in making the inquiry, record the substance of the evidence adduced before him."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: What about the surety?

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Notice should be given to both the surety and the person affected.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If you use the words 'persons affected,' that includes the accused as well as the surety.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The original amendment by Mr. Pantulu used the words "person on whose behalf surety is offered." I used the words "the person affected" as a short way of describing the person on whose behalf surety was offered.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Why not the surety also?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: If the person affected is given notice, surely the surety himself will come forward if he is really anxious to give security.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, the amendment proposed by Government provides for notice being given to the person on whose behalf surety has been accepted, but it does not say that he can show cause why the surety should not be rejected, and, therefore, to attain that object I think the wording of my amendment is preferable; but in order to minimise discussion I would accept the amendment proposed by Government provided they add the words "on either side" at the end of their amendment—that is, "record the substance of the evidence adduced before them on either side." That would mean that the party on whose behalf a surety has once been accepted will have the right to adduce evidence.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I have no objection at all to meeting my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. The amendment will then read:

"Such Magistrate shall before holding the inquiry give reasonable notice to the surety and to the person on whose behalf such surety is offered, and shall in making the inquiry, etc."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Yes, yes.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Then I accept the amendment, Sir, that has just been read out.

Mr. Deputy President: Has Mr. Pantulu the leave of the House to withdraw his amendment.

(Leave was given.)

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in Clause 21 for sub-section (2) of the proposed section 122, the following be substituted, namely:

"(2) Such Magistrate shall before holding the inquiry give reasonable notice to the surety and to the person by whom the surety was offered, and shall in making the inquiry record the substance of the evidence adduced before him."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 21 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): The amendment that stands in my name is:

"That in clause 22 for sub-clause (2) substitute the following:

"(2) In sub-section (5) for the words 'for keeping the peace' the words 'under this section' shall be substituted and sub-section (6) shall be omitted."

The substance of my amendment, Sir, is that whosoever is required to furnish security under this chapter, whether he is required to furnish security for keeping peace or for being of good behaviour or anything of the sort, if he fails to furnish security and is ordered to be imprisoned he should be given simple imprisonment in all cases. The Bill as it stands makes an exception in the case of habitual offenders, those who are required to be bound over under section 110. Under the present Bill those people can be given rigorous imprisonment, while all others are to get simple imprisonment, I do see that as regards persons who are bound over under section 110 their moral character is surely more to be deprecated than that of those who are bound over under section 107, section 108 or section 109. But all the same we have been talking over these sections for so many days; and we have been saying always that these provisions are not punitive but preventive. I need not take the time of the House by quoting any authorities in support of this fact. It has been held very often that these sections are preventive and not punitive. There seems to be absolutely no reason why if we want to award imprisonment and send a man to jail we should give him rigorous imprisonment under any circumstances if the action you are taking against him is simply preventive, simply meant to keep him away from committing any offence. The man could have just come and offered security and then he would have remained out altogether. Why, if he is sent to jail, should he be required to be put to hard labour and given rigorous imprisonment? I think the proposition that I am putting before the House is so very clear that I would request the Government to accept it and I hope that the Honourable Members will see the reasonableness of my request.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I am sorry that I do not see the sweet reasonableness of this proposal. How does the law stand at present? For failing to give security for keeping the peace—107—the alternative is simple imprisonment. Under sections 108 and 109 and 110, the Magistrate may give rigorous or simple imprisonment at his discretion. What do we now propose? We propose to keep 107 as before, namely, the imprisonment will be simple. As regards 108 and 109 we now propose that instead of the Magistrate having any discretion in the matter, the imprisonment must be simple. For my own part, I fear that it will create a good deal of astonishment in the country when it learns that a man who can find no security under section 109 receives simple imprisonment. It seems to me myself strange that he should not be put to any form of labour. However, that is not the immediate point; it is the proposal of the Bill and I forbear to argue against it. The immediate point is that of Bhai Man Singh, who demands, as a universal rule, that imprisonment shall be simple imprisonment under all the punitive clauses. The difference between us is, then, that he would have only simple imprisonment under section 110. The list of offences which qualify a man for an order under section 110 is known to the House; they have been read to it more than once. I need not enlarge on the category, the habitual robber, the habitual forger, the habitual kidnapper and the like. If such a man cannot find security then he must thoroughly fill the picture as a bad character; he has got no friends; nobody will stand up for him. Yet it is proposed by Mr. Man Singh that a man of this type, who may have been convicted several times over for these serious offences, shall when he is in jail not be put to any form of labour. It seems to me an unkindness to the taxpayer that we should keep a man of this type in jail without demanding that he should contribute by labour of any kind to pay for his subsistence. I quite admit that the object of these sections is preventive, and not punitive; but if a man is adjudged a bad or dangerous character and can find no surety, it seems to me not unreasonable that when in default of security he is committed to prison under section 110, the Magistrate should have discretion to give him either simple or rigorous imprisonment.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, I do not see any point in the arguments advanced by the Honourable Leader of the House when he says that we are only following the old law. I can understand that in countries where Indians are employed as coolies, for want of labour they would give rigorous imprisonment so that they can take work. But there is no such dearth of labour in India for the Government to utilise this section of people for labour. Here, a person has not committed any offence. If he is convicted of an offence, he has already suffered punishment for it. We are here only providing for preventing him from doing further mischief. With that object in view why should you give him rigorous imprisonment? It is only a preventive provision for the purpose of keeping him out of danger for the benefit of society. That is the only thing the Government should do. The only excuse for the Government is, "Why should we maintain him in jail without asking him to do some work"? I do not know why Government should think of securing some work out of him on that ground. The only ground for which he should suffer rigorous imprisonment is for any particular offence that he has committed. Otherwise I do not think any discretion need be given to the Magistrate. I therefore strongly support the amendment moved by Mr. Man Singh.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I should like to say a few words in support of this amendment. Ordinarily I know that under section 123 the imprisonment to be awarded in lieu of failure to find surety may be either simple or rigorous, but in the province from which I come, Sind, I think I shall not be far wrong if I say that imprisonment for failure to give security for keeping good behaviour is almost invariably rigorous and I think that in the interests of society it is not right that such persons should be condemned to rigorous imprisonment, because I think that people going to jail specially to suffer rigorous imprisonment come out more hardened criminals than when they enter the jail. I think the object being to keep them away from mischief, as my friend, Mr. Raju, has said, the ends of justice would be met if they are given only simple imprisonment, and they should be kept apart from ordinary criminals, so that when they come out of the jail they come out reformed men and not made into hardened criminals. On that ground and on that ground alone I will support this amendment.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I think there seems to be some misapprehension in the minds of the last two speakers as regards the effect of an order of rigorous imprisonment. To deal first with Mr. Hussanally. He suggests that if a man who has been ordered to find security to be of good behaviour is unable to do so and is sent to jail and caused to undergo rigorous imprisonment, his morals will be contaminated and he will come out of jail a worse man than when he went in, whereas if he only has to undergo simple imprisonment this is not the case (Mr. W. M. Hussanally: "If he is kept apart") if he is kept apart from those who are undergoing simple imprisonment. In the first place, you must remember the class of people who normally go to jail under section 110. I need not read again the list. It ranges from a forger to a desperate and dangerous character, and I would suggest to the House that it will not take the argument seriously that people of this class who are unable to find anybody to stand security for them will have their morals contaminated by going to jail and doing hard labour, whereas they will be saved that, if they undergo simple imprisonment. Secondly, let us consider what simple imprisonment means. It means that the person is absolutely unable to do any work whatever and there he sits from day to day in complete idleness. There must be many Members of this Honourable House who have had opportunities of inspecting jails in one capacity or another, and surely they will agree that the lot of the man undergoing simple imprisonment is in many ways far worse than that of the man who undergoes rigorous imprisonment. I submit that for men of this class rigorous imprisonment is less of a hardship than simple imprisonment.

Then with regard to Mr. Raju's argument, he says that in this country there is no scarcity of labour, and therefore simple imprisonment should be applied. Well, I submit that even if there is no scarcity of labour, the finances of this country are not at present in such an affluent state that we can afford to keep in jail forgers, habitual offenders and desperate and dangerous characters entirely at the public expense and not allowed to do even a hand's turn to contribute towards the cost of their upkeep. For these practical reasons I trust the House will throw out this amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 22 for sub-clause (2) substitute the following:

'In sub-section (5) for the words 'for keeping the peace' the words 'under this section' shall be substituted and sub-section (6) shall be omitted'."

(Cries of 'Noes' and 'Ayes.')

Mr. Deputy President: Those who are in favour of the motion will please stand up.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I object to that procedure, Sir. It is only to enable you to decide whether the claim for a division is frivolous that this procedure is adopted. If a vote is to be taken by standing, then all Members will have to be sent for. The object of a division is to give notice to others who are absent. I think, Sir, the procedure you are adopting will be setting up a bad precedent.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: May I point out, that instead of asking those who are in favour of the amendment to stand up, if you just ask those who want a division to stand up, probably it would make a good deal of difference. That I think was your intention, Sir.

Mr. Deputy President: Those who are for a division will please stand up.

(Two or three members stood up.)

Mr. Deputy President: Division is refused.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 22 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I beg to move:

"That in clause 23 (iii) substitute the following for proposed sub-section (5):

"5. If any condition upon which any person has been discharged is not fulfilled, the District Magistrate or the Chief Presidency Magistrate by whom the order of discharge has been made or his successor, may, after notice and inquiry, cancel the same."

The object of this amendment is very simple. Honourable Members will find that the District Magistrate or the Chief Presidency Magistrate has got power under section 124 to release a man who has given security, and clause 5 provides:

"If any condition upon which any such person has been discharged is in the opinion of the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate not fulfilled, he may cancel the same."

Of course I take it that the Government intend it should be after inquiry and notice, although it is not clear. If a man has been let off on condition, to know whether that condition has been broken or not it should be only after inquiry and notice. I want to make that point clear in my amendment, so that the action may not be taken against him behind his back on mere ex parte or police report. That is the object of this amendment and I hope the House will accept it. I move it, Sir.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Here again the Government is prepared to accept the principle of my Honourable friend's amendment, but we have to go a little further into the matter than he has gone. Mr. Rangachariar merely provides for notice and inquiry. I want the House to understand clearly what stage we have arrived at in the proceedings. The present law does not provide for a conditional discharge to be made when a man has failed to find security. We are dealing with the case of a man who has failed to find security and is accordingly in jail. Now, we are proposing in the Bill to enable the Magistrate to discharge a man on conditions which will be prescribed by the Local Government. The reason why this was provided is very clearly explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. As the House knows, there are many numerous Reformatory settlements, many of which are run by that estimable body, the Salvation Army. They have been very freely used for the purpose of reforming our criminals. At present they are mainly used for the gipsies, the criminal tribes who wander about, and it seemed to us that they were a very suitable place in which also to enable habitual offenders to have a chance of reformation. They can learn a trade and when the period for which they are bound over expires they can go out and earn their own living in an honest manner. Now these people have been treated leniently already, the Magistrate has sent them to a reformatory settlement. While there, they commit a breach of the conditions on which they have been discharged. A notice therefore to a person of that class is not enough, and I am suggesting an amendment to the House which lays down that if the man is not already before the Magistrate, the Magistrate shall have power then to issue a warrant to have him brought before him. I quite agree, I think we are all prepared to agree, that the Magistrate should give him an opportunity of showing cause why the order of discharge should not be cancelled, but there can be no question of dilatory proceedings,—of issuing a summons to the man. You have got to remember that this man probably may have run away, may have absconded; at all events, a notice to him that he is going to be put back into jail will simply be an invitation to him to abscond. Therefore, unless the Magistrate has power to issue a warrant, you are leaving a dangerous criminal, an habitual criminal, at large in the country. The House should remember that if the Magistrate finds that a condition has been broken, after this inquiry that Mr. Rangachariar and I both provide for, if he finds that a condition has been broken, the man has to go back to jail. He is going back to jail, and therefore if the Magistrate is of opinion that the condition has been broken, the first step should certainly be that he should issue a warrant. Therefore, Sir, I am accepting the principle of Mr. Rangachariar's amendment but would take out the word 'notice,' which is vague and which might be argued to indicate a summons only, and I am proposing an amendment which would provide a definite procedure for the Magistrate and also provide for several cases which Mr. Rangachariar's amendment does not provide for. For the proposed new sub-section (5), Sir, I would move that the following be substituted, namely:

"If any condition upon which any person has been discharged is in the opinion of the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate by whom the order of discharge was made or his successor not fulfilled, he may issue a warrant for the arrest of such person, and when such person is brought before him, he may, after such inquiry as he thinks fit, cancel the order discharging such person:

Provided that if at any time after the expiration of fifteen days from the date of the issue of the warrant the Magistrate has reason to believe that such person has absconded or is concealing himself so that the warrant cannot be executed, he may cancel the order forthwith."

The proviso is more or less on the lines of section 88 of the Code which deals with proclaimed offenders. This is the case of an habitual offender; he has been found to be an habitual offender. He has had an opportunity of coming up in revision, he may have an opportunity of appeal. The order stands,—the Magistrate's order that this man is an habitual offender; therefore if after fifteen days the police are not able to find him and the Magistrate has reason to believe that he is concealing himself or absconding, the Magistrate is enabled to cancel the order forthwith; and then the following sub-clauses of this clause come into operation—'any police officer may arrest without warrant.' I may warn the House that if they accept my amendment in this form, I shall have to propose merely consequential amendments to the next sub-section, sub-section (6), and its various paragraphs, which are partly occasioned, as I say, by this amendment and partly by a subsequent amendment of Mr. Rangachariar.

Mr. Deputy President: The further amendment moved is:

"That in sub-clause (3) of clause 23 (1), for the proposed new sub-section (5), the following be substituted, namely: 'If any condition upon which any such person has been discharged is in the opinion of the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate by whom the order of discharge was made or his successor not fulfilled, he may issue a warrant for the arrest of such person, and when such person is brought before him, he may after such inquiry as he thinks fit cancel the order discharging such person:'

Provided that if at any time after the expiry of fifteen days from the date of the issue of the warrant the Magistrate has reason to believe that any such person has absconded or is concealing himself so that the warrant cannot be executed, he may cancel the order forthwith."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I have no technical objection to the amendment to my amendment moved by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith; that is, I do not object to his moving this amendment without notice. But I am sorry that I am unable to accept it on its merits. It is certainly not a reasonable course to adopt in a case like this. The position is, that a man accepts a condition offered to him quite voluntarily and the District Magistrate lets him out. Now, by the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, first of all the District Magistrate has to form an opinion that the man has broken the conditions; that is, he has to prejudge the question which he is to inquire into and decide. That is the first objection I have to the wording of my Honourable friend. In my amendment, the Magistrate has to come to a conclusion after notice and inquiry that the condition has been broken, and then only he can say—"you have not fulfilled the condition and therefore the conditional discharge must be cancelled."

Then the next thing is that the Magistrate may issue a warrant for the arrest of such person at once. Of course, if the condition is broken, he must go back to jail. But then come the words "after such inquiry as he thinks fit," which leave it open to the Magistrate to do it in any manner he likes. First of all you commit him to an "opinion" and then the inquiry may be "such as he thinks fit," which may be in a very summary manner.

This amendment therefore is open to these objections. A man may be condemned without being heard and sent back to jail. But it is very unlikely that a man will break a condition which he has voluntarily accepted, and I think the Government is rather over-nervous in dealing with cases of this nature. That is the remark which I wish to emphasise in this connection. What I mean is that they want to tighten their hold on a man who has not yet been convicted of an offence and who is merely bound over because they suspect he will give trouble; they want to bind him round and round, and although he accepts a condition they do not want to allow him to go. That appears to me to be the object of this amendment and I therefore oppose it and stick to my own amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is

"That in clause 23 (iii) substitute the following for proposed sub-section (5)

(5) If any condition upon which any person has been discharged is not fulfilled, the District Magistrate or the Chief Presidency Magistrate, by whom the order of discharge has been made or his successor may after notice and inquiry, cancel the same."

To which a further amendment has been moved that in clause 23 (iii) the following be substituted for proposed sub-section (5)

(5) If any condition upon which any such person has been discharged is, in the opinion of the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate by whom the order of discharge was made or his successor not fulfilled he may issue a warrant for the arrest of such person and when such person is brought before him he may, after such inquiry as he thinks fit, cancel the order discharging such person.

Provided that if at any time after the expiry of fifteen days from the date of the issue of the warrant the Magistrate has reason to believe that any such person has absconded or is concealing himself so that the warrant cannot be executed, he may cancel the order forthwith.

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: I may remind the House that the original amendment of Mr. Rangachariar is still before the House.

Several Honourable Members: The question may now be put.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Before the question is put, I ask an opportunity to state our strong objections to the amendment moved by Mr. Rangachariar. We offered him what looked like a very good alternative, drafted with great skill, with all the proper safeguards inserted, and not unreasonable in itself. It made full provision for the particular class of case he has in view. But he and his friends would not have it. Now where do we stand? Everybody knows the class of person to whom a conditional release is given: possibly a member of a criminal tribe, often a member of a wandering tribe. He is sent to a settlement for the purpose of reclamation. Now how does Mr. Rangachariar propose to treat this evasive sort of gentleman? The Magistrate has to send first of all a notice to him. If Mr. Rangachariar can tell us where to find a wandering criminal or a habitual absconder, he is cleverer than our Magistrates or police are often able to show themselves. To proceed. He says nothing as to what is to happen if the notice is not served, or the man does not obey it. He insists on notice; according to him no warrant is ever to issue. Again; a few minutes ago he objected strongly to Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith's wording "such inquiry as he thinks fit." And what is his own wording? Here see this new upholder of the Magistrate's full discretion comes out again. When Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith proposed to put in the words "such inquiry as he thinks fit," Mr. Rangachariar thought them hopelessly inadequate. What are his own words. "Notice and inquiry." Nothing else. So much for his consistency.

I put it that this is a rugged amendment. It does not provide for the circumstances; it inserts insufficient safeguards; it allows you to go on issuing notice after notice to an absconder, and in the end it allows the Magistrate to dispose of the case after an inquiry of a nature which Mr. Rangachariar himself has more than once pronounced to be insufficient.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I be permitted to offer an explanation as a special case?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Mr. Rangachariar has spoken twice already.

Mr. Deputy President: If it is a personal explanation, I will allow it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: At any rate the personal explanation is as regards why I distrusted the Magistrate in this case was . . .

Mr. Deputy President: That is not a personal explanation.

Amendment moved:

"That in clause 23 (iii) substitute the following for proposed sub-section (5):

(5) If any condition upon which any person has been discharged is not fulfilled, the District Magistrate or the Chief Presidency Magistrate, by whom the order of discharge has been made or his successor, may, after notice and inquiry, cancel the same."

The question is that that amendment be made.

POLICY OF HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT WITH REFERENCE TO THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): Sir, I have to lay on the table a copy of a despatch from His Majesty's Secretary of State for India, Public No. 62, dated the 2nd November, 1922, regarding the policy of His Majesty's Government with reference to the Government of India Act.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Are copies available to the Members?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Certainly.

INDIA OFFICE, LONDON.

2nd November 1922.

Public,
No. 62.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA IN COUNCIL.

MY LORD,

More than a year has elapsed since Your Excellency's Government forwarded to my predecessor the report of a debate which took place in the Legislative Assembly in September of last year, as a result of which a motion was carried recommending that the Secretary of State should be informed that the Assembly was of opinion that the progress made by India on the path to responsible government warrants a re-examination or revision of the constitution at an earlier date than 1929. On the 28th February last my predecessor stated, in reply to a question put to him in the House of Commons, that he intended to address a Despatch to Your Excellency's Government in reply to this motion, which would follow generally the lines of his speech in the course of the debate on the address a fortnight earlier. Circumstances, however, prevented the fulfilment of this intention, and since it has fallen to myself to make the reply which it is desirable that the Assembly should receive, I do not imagine that Your Excellency's Government will have expected that I should address myself to so large and important a question without mature consideration, even though some further delay was involved.

2. The result of my consideration is that I have little to add to, and nothing to qualify in, the statement of the case made by my predecessor in the concluding portions of his speech in the House of Commons on the 14th February last. The policy deliberately adopted by Parliament in enacting the Act of 1919, and recently reaffirmed by the present head of His Majesty's Government, was to provide an instalment of self-government, but at the same time to make further progress in that direction dependent upon experience of the practical results achieved in the working of the new constitution as a whole. It would have been a matter for surprise had any speaker in the Indian debate of September of last year attempted to prove as the result of six months' experience of a new constitution that its possibilities were exhausted and that nothing remained to be learned from further experience of its operation. No such attempt was made, and the arguments used in support of the motion consequently lose some of their cogency in my view, for three reasons. In the first place, they assumed that progress is impossible under the existing constitution, and can be achieved only by further amendment of the Government of India Act. This assumption I believe to be fundamentally erroneous.

3. The outstanding feature of the change made by the Act of 1919 was that it provided British India with a progressive constitution in place of an inelastic system of government, and that consequently there is room within the structure of that constitution for the Legislatures to develop and establish for themselves a position in conformity with the spirit of the Act.

4. In the second place, however great the merits shown by the Legislatures as a whole and by individual members (and I am far from wishing to underrate them), the fact remains that the merits and capabilities of the electorate have not yet been tested by time and experience. The foundation of all constitutional development must be the presence of a vigorous and instructed body of public opinion operating not only in the Legislatures, but—what is even more important—in the constituencies. Until this foundation has been firmly laid, progress would not be assisted, and might indeed be retarded, if fresh responsibilities were added to those with which the electors have so recently been entrusted.

5. Thirdly, the new constitutional machinery has to be tested in its working as a whole. Changes have been made as the result of the Act of 1919 in the composition, powers, and responsibilities not only of the Legislatures, but also of the executive Governments. No estimate of the success of the new system could pretend to completeness which was not based upon proof of the capacity of these bodies, as now constituted, to administer the duties entrusted to them—duties which, from the point of view of the public welfare, are at least as important as those of the Legislatures; and trustworthy proof of such capacity can only be established by experience of the extent to which the increased association of Indians in the sphere of executive responsibility has justified itself in practice.

6. I would add that, even were these reasons for patience less cogent, an opinion based upon six months' experience of its working that a new constitution, in the elaboration of which over two years were occupied, stands in need of revision, is hardly likely to commend itself to Parliament, since it is clear that sufficient time has not elapsed to enable the new machinery to be adequately tested. It would, in fact, be without precedent if a constitution, deliberately framed to provide a basis for development in whatever directions experience may indicate, were to be brought under review within a few months of its inauguration; and indeed any such process could hardly fail to deprive the constitution of a large element of its value, by determining prematurely the precise directions in which further progress is to be made.

7. I shall be glad if Your Excellency's Government will cause copies of this Despatch to be laid on the Table of both Chambers of the Indian Legislature.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient, humble Servant,

(Signed) PEEL.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I present the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to define the liability of employers in certain cases of suits for damages brought against them by workmen and to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident.

NICKEL FOUR-ANNA AND EIGHT-ANNA PIECES.

Mr. Khagendra Nath Mitra (Bengal: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish to ask a question of which I had given private notice to the Honourable Member concerned.

Is the Government aware that there has been for the past few days a rumour in the city of Delhi that the nickel four-anna pieces are going to be withdrawn from circulation? If so, will the Government be pleased to say if it is a fact? Is the Government aware that much inconvenience has been caused to the business men as well as to the private citizens by the refusal on the part of people in many cases to accept these coins?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): I am much obliged to the Honourable Member for giving me an opportunity of stiding this idle rumour. The Government of India understand there has been such a rumour in the local bazar for a few days; it is entirely unfounded; the local authorities took whatever action was possible and the rumour has since been dying out. I am informed that the nickel four-anna pieces are now being freely accepted. It is not true that these coins are about to be withdrawn from circulation. Similar rumours have been current for a few days in various parts of the country at different times and they have been repeatedly contradicted. I may add that the local Commissioner is going to be asked to put up a notice in prominent places in the city of Delhi with a view to stopping this inconvenience.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): There is also a similar rumour in regard to the eight-anna nickel pieces?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The same remarks apply.

LASCARS IN THE GREAT WAR.

Letter from the Assistant Secretary to the Government of India, Department of Commerce, to Mr. K. Ahmed, No. 323, dated the 11th January 1923.*

As you will remember you asked in the Legislative Assembly on the 7th September last for information on the following points:

- (i) The number of Indian Seamen and Lascars working as Serang^s, deck crews, firemen and butlers in steamship companies and in merchant vessels, etc., in Indian Waters and abroad;
- (ii) The number of Indian Seamen and Lascars killed by enemy action during the Great War; and
- (iii) The number of Indian Seamen and Lascars captured and imprisoned in foreign countries.

* Vide pp. 1349 and 1352 ante.

[Mr. C. A. Innes.]

I am afraid that we are not in a position to give you exact figures in all cases; for instance the Government of Bombay, who were consulted, have informed us that information as to the number of Indian Seamen and Lascars shipped from Karachi and other Ports (excepting Bombay) in that Presidency is not available. However I give below what information we have been able to collect and hope that it will serve your purpose :

*(i) Numbers shipped from

Bombay	29,000
Calcutta	39,207

(These figures are for 1921-22.)

(ii) 3,427 (this includes 33 who died from exposure while on war service, but excludes 47 who died while interned in Germany).

(iii) 1,200 (I have assumed that you refer to Enemy countries and not all foreign countries).

RESOLUTION RE EXAMINATION FOR THE I. C. S.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): Sir, the Resolution that stands against my name and which I propose to move reads as follows :

" This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that the present system of conducting Simultaneous Examinations for the recruitment to the Indian Civil Service be changed and that a different method of conducting the Simultaneous Examinations so as to give a fair chance to candidates belonging to different communities and different provinces be devised, if necessary, by having a limited form of competition."

Sir, in moving this Resolution, I wish to attack it or deal with it on very broad lines. It is not my desire to interfere at all with the efficiency or the traditions that are attached to the honourable service well known to us all as the Indian Civil Service; but I move this Resolution standing as I do as a representative of one of the minority communities in India and as such I believe I have every right to place before this Honourable House the views of one of the minority communities, leaving representatives of other minority communities to voice their views. In attacking this subject I do so with great diffidence because I represent a community unfortunately, which, for educational purposes, runs a very bad second so far as other minority communities in India are concerned. Why that is so I am not prepared to argue out just now, but let that pass. India as we know—I would call it the continent of India—is a mass of heterogeneous classes and races, talking different languages, with different ideas, and different creeds. There is no doubt that the cementing influence here is the British element. Take that away and I think very few will deny or disagree with me that we are likely to crumble like a pack of cards. The idea is no doubt to Indianise the Services, and being an Indian and a citizen of this country I join with them that the idea is to Indianise the Services. Minorities of course claim a place in that. The Indianisation of the Services really means the replacement of the Englishmen by the various communities of India. There is no doubt that the Indian Civil Service which is manned largely by Europeans will in time be replaced by Indians. The cry now is that this Service together with other superior Services is manned by Englishmen to a disproportionate extent compared with the rest of India. How true that is, how necessary it is, it is not my purpose to argue now. But the fact remains that Indians look forward to Indianising the Services entirely in time. Their ideal is to replace Englishmen with recruitment from among their own men, that is, Indians. But when dealing with the recruitment of the Services, the Public Services Commission which sat in 1913, and submitted its Report, apprehended such an eventuality, namely the replacement of Europeans by Indians. Now it is very extraordinary how prophetic or ultra-prophetic has been the safeguard, because if I understand rightly, since the simultaneous examinations have been in practice one province in India has been able to monopolise,—be it said to their credit no doubt,—at least 50 per cent. of the appointments in the I. C. S., and taking that as your criterion, and accepting that as a criterion for the future, it seems as if it is quite legitimate to apprehend that within a few years' time Englishmen will be replaced mainly by one community, or by the community mainly occupying one province. I understand I am right in saying that the struggle just now is between East and South versus North-West of India. I do not say that in disparagement of the communities that have succeeded, but there is no doubt that it is going to be the ultimate position unless some safeguards are put into operation in time. I ask this Honourable House to see or to visualise the Punjab being administered by no one else but by people from the south and vice versa. I take the same position from East to West, Bengal and Bombay. As I say, India is a continent with a number of communities, each wanting to attain the maximum of speed in regard to communal benefits from the Reform Scheme. The major communities in India are protected and are able to look after themselves, while the minor communities, I regret to say, are being neglected, and it is to protect these minor communities that I, as a representative of the Domiciled Community in India, move this Resolution. In doing so, I think I am in good company when I quote, with your permission, Sir, an extract from the Report of the Public Services Commission from page 172.

"Safeguards and Reservations.—These safeguards and reservations are two in number. First two candidates should be nominated each year by the Secretary of State, on the advice of the Government of India, from amongst graduates of the various Universities, and of an age similar to that of the competitors at the examination. Such nominees who should be termed 'King-Emperor's cadets', should rank as probationers below the other successful candidates of their year, pending the result of the final examination. Otherwise, they should be on an equal footing in all respects. This would make it possible to give representation to young men of good family, who had shown literary attainments of a higher order, but who were not intellectually quite in the front rank. Members of the domiciled community and Muslims might also benefit under this provision."

The Report further goes on to say:

"The Committee itself should be made up so far as may be of persons in touch with educational interests, and should consist of the vice-chancellor of the university concerned, the director of public instruction of the Province chiefly interested, and three other members to be nominated by the syndicate of the university whose area is in question. Should it be found that the candidates successful at the examination are coming too markedly from one particular area, we think that the best remedy would be to hold the examination by groups of areas in rotation. But we deprecate any such arrangement unless experience shows that it is absolutely necessary. Subject to these qualifications the examination should be conducted by the civil service commissioners, who, after consultation with the educational authorities in India, should devise a scheme having the same relation to the Indian educational courses, as the examination in England will, under our scheme, bear to the education given in the British secondary schools. To give effect to these recommendations, we recognise that it will be necessary to amend the Statute of 1858, and we advise that legislation be undertaken accordingly."

Well, Sir, these were the safeguards recommended by the Public Services Commission and to avoid a swamping of these coveted posts by any one particular community, I have brought forward this Resolution feeling as I do that those who represent the minor communities will support it. It is up to the Government to suggest which will be the most feasible and the most easy method by which the minor communities could be safeguarded and represented. Personally, I think the easiest solution will be to leave the examinations as they are, and to make certain safeguards and reservations by nominating from among those candidates who have passed the examination, representatives from the various communities. This would give all communities a fair chance; there is no doubt that it will create a feeling of harmony, and this House will be putting into execution one of its primary and most important duties, namely the protection of the minor communities in India. If this House refuses to accept this Resolution, I make bold to say that it will be failing in its duty to discharge one of its most important duties. (Voices: "Hear, hear.") I see some Members from Bombay say "Hear, hear". I trust it is meant.

[Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.]

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Ironically.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I wish to put forward this Resolution and I will ask the House to give it its support and so protect the minor communities in the Motherland of India.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move the amendment which stands in my name to the Resolution which has just been moved, and after the amendment has been made the Resolution will read thus:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that the present system of conducting simultaneous examinations for the recruitment to the Indian Civil Service be modified so as to provide for a fair representation of suitable candidates of different castes and communities residing in British India."

Sir, I am one of those who stand and very strongly too, for the Indianisation of the services. Government might say that 'look here, you Indians want Indianisation of the services and then want communal representation.' Sir, I am the last person to have claimed communal representation, but since communal representation has been granted by Government partially, I submit that it is very unfair to other communities if it is not extended to them. One happy expression has been used that the Hindus belong not to a minority community but to a majority community. I submit with the greatest respect that it is quite wrong. The meaning of minority and majority can be ascertained from their methods of living, their methods of interlining and inter-marrriages. So far as these are concerned, I would say that Hindus are divided into a very large number of castes and creeds, and they can neither interline nor inter-marry.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): They will.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: Dr. Gour says they will, but when his Civil Marriage Bill is passed, and not before that. (A Voice: "Not even then.") Now take for example the broad divisions among Hindus, Brahmmins, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras. Then, again, all these are divided into a very large number of sub-castes who would neither intermarry nor interline. I might say, for example, my own caste—the Vaisya community—is divided into several sub-castes—Agarwalas, Khandelwals, Oswals, Bajshalis and so forth. If the principle of communal representation is worked out in such a way that so many posts are given to, say Muhammadans—I hope I shall be excused for using that expression—and so many for Hindus, then they might say that Hindus mean 70 per cent. and Muhammadans mean 80 per cent. I would say that that calculation is quite wrong and quite misleading. The word "Hindus" may be applied to a large number of persons who are really Hindus, but when we come to the deeper question of inter-marriage and inter-dining, we find they are a combination of several castes and communities, and that is the reason why I have put down the word "different castes and communities residing in British India," so that, if the principle of communal representation is once accepted, I would say that it should be worked out fairly and squarely and, on the other hand, I am quite prepared to drop this question of communal representation altogether if that principle is eliminated from India. I am sure the time will come when the principle will be abandoned but, as matters now stand, I think that one community should not be allowed to have an undue share of Government posts or the like at the expense of other communities. Surely, I don't say that the minorities should not be protected. At the same time, the question is "what do you mean by minorities?"

With these few remarks I move my amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the Honourable Mover of this Resolution has appealed to the representatives of the minor communities of India to support him. I am a representative of one of those communities whose support the Honourable Mover of this Resolution has asked for. But I am sorry to say that, far from supporting his Resolution, I strongly oppose it. Does the Honourable Mover of the Resolution realise the full effect of the Resolution if accepted by the House? Does he know that his community in this country represents only 100,000 souls? What is the proportion of that community to the rest of the population of India? Well, Sir, if you examine the question, you will find that my Honourable friend, the Mover's community will stand in the proportion of 1 to 3,150. The result would be that my friend's community will get the third of a post in the Civil Service out of a cadre of 1,250. Is that the proportion that my friend wants? Is that the proportion which my friend desires his community should have in the public services of this country? He has spoken at very great length upon the value and utility of communal representation. My friend, Mr. Girdhari Lal Agarwala, with a sub-conscious humour, gets up and says the communities in India are so numerous that it will require not one but many Royal Commissions to categorise them, and then will begin a struggle between one community and another, between sub-communities among themselves and I think the time of the public services will be devoted mainly to deciding the disputes between these contending communities. Is this what my friend, Mr. Agarwala, wants the public services in this country to do? He has, Sir, referred to the present policy of the Government of India. I am glad he has done so. No one on this side of the House deprecates that policy more than I do. The High Courts of India—the High Court which is the palladium of public justice is recruited as if it were a representative institution, and what is the result? Let any practitioner in the High Court tell you what the result is. The public services throughout India have been more or less recruited upon a communal basis. I hope, Sir, that, if this debate leads to any good result, it may lead to this that this policy will be reversed in the future. We do not want people because they belong to a particular community—we want a public servant because he is efficient and capable for the discharge of the duties entrusted to him, and that should be, and I hope will be, the sole criterion for recruitment to the public services in this country.

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

We have been told by the last speaker that communal representation is recognised by the Government in the constitution of this House. There again, I deprecate communal representation. I am sorry, Sir, that communal representation was ever introduced in the first constitution given to this country and the sooner it is eliminated the better for the ultimate good of this great land. I think, Sir, I have shown that communal representation will not only serve no good purpose but would be positively mischievous and I therefore strongly oppose this Resolution.

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I have great pleasure in supporting the Resolution moved by my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney. I was surprised to hear the eloquent speech of my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour. It is surprising that on the one hand we criticise the prevailing system and with one voice ask that communal representation should be given to us and claim that the present system is leaving us discontented and dissatisfied, and on the other hand we come forward and oppose this Resolution for extending the principle of communal representation still further. When we have communal representation in this Honourable Assembly, why should we object to its application to the Services. If the present system is accepted, let us compete with the British Civilian as they are.* But if we are not satisfied with it, then I think it is the right of everybody to come forward and claim representation. I think it shows great courage on the part of my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, that he should come forward on behalf of a very small community and show that it would be in the interests of India at large that the principle of communal representation should be accepted. Now, Sir, I will draw your kind attention to the fact, which everybody knows, that the present system of recruitment to the Civil Service stands condemned. What are the general defects which are to be found in the Civilian recruited according to the present system? I do not want to be personal, but it goes without saying that the present system is bad on the following grounds. The first thing is that when the young Civilian comes to this country, he is rather closed to the people, because he is not in touch with them. Those days are gone when the Civilians were advanced and this country was backward. Now the country has got a sort of general awakening and everybody understands his interests. When we come to judge our own interests I think it is only fair that communal representation should be respected in spirit and word and that it should be safeguarded. The case of England is quite different. There you have one nation, one religion and one language. But here, in India, you have got so many different States; I might call them so many small countries. Every province has got its own sentiments and its own interests. That being the case, I think it will be in the interests of the country and in the interests of the British Empire that competition should be held separate in each province. My Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, did not enlarge on the defects of the present system of competition. At present, the young Civilians who come from England and who compete have different standards of education. For instance, some may take up Mathematics and some may take up Science. But they are not experienced in the difficult problems of humanity. It takes a long time before they study the book of humanity. They are so biased when they come here that they administer the laws in this country but do not temper them to the needs of the governed. That is the difficulty which is felt by everybody and I think Government must be realising it. If the leaders on both sides really want to have Swaraj I do not want that it should be either the Punjab Raj, or Bengal Raj or Madras Raj; it should be an all-India Raj, and if you want an all-India Raj, it cannot be had unless you respect the interests of the different communities. My Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, insisted that "the survival of the fittest" must be held to be the guiding principle. I think that is wrong. When we claim the same things from the English people, we are perfectly justified on the same grounds in claiming the same privileges from each other. With these remarks, Sir, I have much pleasure in supporting Colonel Gidney's Resolution in spirit and in word.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I rise to oppose the Resolution moved by my friend, Colonel Gidney. I assure the House that when I oppose this Resolution, I should not be understood to be in favour of monopoly, if there is a monopoly, of certain castes. Monopoly of any one community or any race or any caste is to be deprecated and must be put down. But, Sir, in the first place, nobody has yet shown that any one community in India or any one caste in India has got a monopoly of the public offices in this country. (An Honourable Member: "They have.") It must be proved first before we are asked to do something to do away with that monopoly. Then, Sir, it has been said by Colonel Gidney that the Resolution which he has moved is in the interests of the minority. I should like to know from Colonel Gidney and the people of that way of thinking what is the connection between a community being a minority in the country and the method of selecting candidates for public offices. Are the candidates selected by votes? Sir, if the candidates were selected by votes of the members in the country, certainly the minorities do require protection. But the candidates are selected by merit, which is decided by examination. Even if 10 candidates from the community to which my Honourable friend has the honour to belong compete, at least a few of them will pass if they have got the merit. Their passing or failure does not depend upon his community being a minority. I therefore feel that the point which my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, has made has no relevancy to the question which he has raised. My friend, I think, remarked that his community has the misfortune of being somewhat backward in education. I do not know whether I heard him correctly. (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "Yes.") He says "Yes." Sir, it is a misfortune that any community in this country should be backward in education, and all those communities which are backward in education should have not only the sympathy but the active support of all the Members of this Assembly. But, Sir, is the measure which my Honourable friend proposes useful in removing that defect from the community? If my Honourable friend had felt the want of education in his community or in other communities, he should have proposed another Resolution asking the Government to give special facilities for education for those communities which are wanting in education, and I am sure the whole House would have sympathised with him. But unfortunately he does not take that course—I do not know why. I have got my own surmise, but I do not wish to speak out that here. Then, Sir, before Colonel Gidney asks this House to decide this question in his favour it would have been better if he had told the House what the object is with which these officers are appointed by the Government. What is the duty which these officers have to perform? The officers appointed by Government are not appointed to represent certain communities in their offices. These officers are appointed to render certain services for the country and every officer is expected to forget his caste, is expected to forget his religion, is expected to forget his race while doing his duty. Therefore, the caste, the race and the religion of an officer has nothing to do with the duties with which he is entrusted. On the contrary, Sir, if I am asked what sort of officer Government should appoint, I say the highest qualification for an officer to be appointed is that he has the capacity to forget his religion, he has the capacity to forget his race, he has the capacity to forget his caste and such other considerations. Somebody asks me whether they do actually. Sir, it is a great pity if they do not. My point is this. The man to be appointed must have qualifications for the work, and one of the qualifications is that the man must not have a strong bias for his caste and must be able to forget all these considerations while doing his duty. If you once bring in this consideration in making appointments, then I am sure the conflict of caste, religion and race will never pass away from this country. Unfortunately, if we accept the principle which Colonel Gidney has enunciated, we shall be perpetuating these distinctions instead of trying to remove them. I feel therefore that this House will be well advised in not accepting this motion. Sir if Colonel Gidney had thought sufficiently over this question, he would have found that the whole proposal is impossible to work out. How are the numerous and innumerable communities in India to be represented in the Government service? Moreover has he mentioned all the circumstances by which people are divided in this country? He only mentioned a few. Did he mention that the whole world, not only India, is divided into poor, middle class and rich people? (Mr. N. M. Samarth: "Depressed class.") If the officers of Government are swayed by any consideration more than any other, I feel they are swayed by the considerations of the economic class to which they belong. A man belonging to the higher class finds it difficult to understand the difficulties of a man belonging to the working class whatever be the caste of the working class.

Suppose now you have got a gentleman belonging to the community to which my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, belongs and he is a great employer; there is another gentleman belonging to the community of my Honourable friend who is one of the working classes. If the former becomes a Government officer, will he sympathise with the latter if he comes into conflict with his capitalistic master simply because the servant belongs to his community? Therefore if Colonel Gidney will go deep into the matter he will find that the system which he proposes will fail if that system is worked out with thoroughness. In order to show the absurdity of his Resolution I think the Government should appoint a Committee to make thorough-going proposals to give effect to the principle which he has enunciated. If the minority communities, if the backward communities were to take their proper place in the public services of this country, the best remedy for them is to ask the Government to give them special facilities for education and for training. That is the only way in which their present grievances will be removed, and I am quite sure that the whole House will support them in their demand if they make a demand for special facilities. I hope therefore that this House will not accept the Resolution moved by my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhamadan Urban): If I had been a member of the Anglo-Indian community I would have at once proposed a vote of censure on the President of that body. The President in his zeal and in his anxiety for his community, perhaps encouraged by those who do not like to come out into the open, has initiated a discussion which is unfortunate, which is extremely to be regretted. Colonel Gidney has given us a peep into his own mentality. He has told us that the various communities are using the Reform Scheme for the advancement of their communal interests. That may be Colonel Gidney's point of view, but the point of view of the rest of us is that we are trying to use the Reform Scheme as far as possible for the advancement of the interests of the country as a whole. But that is not all. Colonel Gidney, finding the difficulty of his position, has clearly said, "Oh! If you cannot devise means by which all these various minor and backward communities cannot be fully represented, resort to nomination." He has really "let the cat out of the bag." There are some people who are in constant horror of competition. They prefer the back door to the open door. I say, Sir, once again with the kindest of feelings for my Honourable and gallant friend that when he goes home this evening and in his mind tries to reflect on his heroic performance to-day he will feel that he has really done a positive disservice to the community to which he belongs. Let me pause for a second and let me tell Colonel Gidney that this is a game at which two can play. This is not a game which Colonel Gidney can play alone. Accept the principle of representation for the moment. How much representation are you going to give.—I will take the Anglo-Indian community to it? In proportion to what? To numbers, to education, to the taxes that they pay, to the stake that they have in the country? I should be sorry in spite of the provocation offered by Colonel Gidney to the whole House, I should be sorry to say a word which should be at all unpleasant or unkind either to his community or to any other community. But I shall request him and others of his way of thinking to calmly consider that if they once bring about a discussion of the claims of the various communities, they will be driven to a position from which they will willingly like to extricate themselves. There may be some justification—for which a great deal of responsibility must rest on Government—I say there may be some justification for this principle being adopted as regards certain minor appointments, but when you come to the Civil Service are we going to accept this principle? Do we want a man in place of Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith because he is an Anglo-Indian, or because he is, according to my friend, Mr. Agarwala, a Vaisya, or according to me, a Kayastha, or according to my friend, Mr. Chatterjee, a Brahmin. (Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: "I never meant that.") You withdraw your amendment then. In the deep there is a lower deep. My friend Mr. Agarwala's amendment is infinitely worse than the Resolution of Colonel Gidney. If you go into the question of caste, I do not know where we are going to end. Take the Kayastha. There are 11 sub-sections, and then there is my friend, Mr. Samarth. How are you going to decide the claim of each? Mr. Agarwala I never knew was developing into a social reformer. What on earth has interlining and intermarriage got to do with this problem? Simply because you do not dine with the member of another caste, does it follow that you will not be able to discharge your duties thoroughly and honestly? But, Sir, I shall invite the attention of the House to the words of the Resolution itself:

"A different method of conducting the simultaneous examinations so as to give a fair chance to candidates . . ."

That implies that the present method does not give a fair chance to the various communities. Has Colonel Gidney proved it? Here is this competitive examination. Anybody who has got the brains, anybody who has got the capacity, anybody who is willing to undergo that test, is welcome. How do you say, how do you make out that the present system of conducting simultaneous examinations does not give a fair chance to the members of all the communities? The only logical conclusion is, that having regard to the fact that the members of certain communities wish to depend on favours rather than on merit they would like to make short work of all competitive examinations and would like to get into the Service through the back door. Then it does not stop there. A fair chance is to be given to different communities and to different provinces. Take the Hindu community to which I belong. Suppose Mr. Samarth passes the Civil Service examination . . .

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

Mr. N. M. Samarth: I am too old now.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Suppose my friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, passes the examination, then I, as a United Provinces man, with less brains than both of them, will say "My community has not been represented and my province has not been represented."

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: What about appointments to the High Court?

Munshi Iswar Saran: In the High Court, if appointments have been made on communal considerations, the blame is not ours. The blame must attach to those who have made those appointments. Then we are asked to accept a limited form of competition. There are varieties of competition it appears. One is limited and the other is unlimited. The limited form of competition, it is rather difficult to understand. What is this limited competition? Perhaps, it means that you take a few by competition and the rest have to be taken by nomination.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Shoved in.

Munshi Iswar Saran: My friend, Mr. Jamnadas, who is an authority on excellent phraseology, says "Shove them in somehow." The whole fact of the matter is that we cannot accept it. As my friend Mr. Joshi has said, it is the duty and the bounden duty of every Member of this House and of every Indian to see that the communities which are at a disadvantage on account of lack of education and so on should receive every encouragement, but it is the duty of those communities to see that by introducing these novel, may I say mischievous and wicked changes into the system of recruitment for the Civil Service they should do nothing to impair the efficiency of this Service. What will be the result? Not only the Anglo-Indian community or the Agarwala community but the whole of India will suffer. These appointments are made not with a view to give jobs to this or that community. These appointments are made, these examinations are held so that you may get the very best men for the discharge of the work that will be entrusted to them. That is and, I submit, that ought to be the only and the sole criterion for recruitment to this service. I do hope that after a little reflection Colonel Gidney will show his good sense and will earn our thanks if he will withdraw his Resolution. (Voices: "No.") Then, Sir, if he does not withdraw this Resolution, it will meet the fate it so richly deserves.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is :

" This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that the present system of conducting simultaneous examinations for the recruitment to the Indian Civil Service be modified so as to provide for a fair representation of suitable candidates of different castes and communities residing in British India."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I need hardly say that I rise to oppose the Resolution moved by my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney. I must however, at the outset, remove the misapprehension that it seems to me prevails in the minds of some of the Members with regard to the meaning of the word 'Indianisation.' As I had the honour of moving this Assembly in the matter of Indianisation I may at once point out that by Indianisation I do not mean that Englishmen who are the present incumbents of the Services should be removed bodily and be replaced by Indians. No. Not only that. I do not even mean that in future, although the policy of recruitment in India may be accepted, as it ought to be accepted, the services should go exclusively to Indians and not at all to Europeans. All that we mean by the term Indianisation is that the bar which at present obtains against our countrymen because most of the services go exclusively to Europeans should be removed and that the recruitment in future should take place in India and in India alone. Now that does not exclude the possibility of Europeans competing for these services. If there are men from England coming out in sufficient numbers to appear at these examinations, there should be nothing to prevent them from doing so. If in the examination it is found that the European proves to be a better candidate for the services in open competition, then by all means the post should go to him as well as to the Indians of course on new conditions with regard to salary, etc. To bring down the word Indianisation to a very narrow interpretation is in itself a mistake and if my friend Colonel Gidney's Resolution is based on that mistake, having realised this mistake, I hope he will see his way to withdraw his Resolution. Now, Sir, what is it that he asks to do. I personally look forward to a time when examinations will be conducted in India alone open of course to all candidates that come either from India or from Europe. If simultaneous examinations go on, then some of the posts, he says, must go exclusively to representatives of various communities which are said to be, to use Colonel Gidney's phrase, the minority communities. Now I ask one question. I put one question to those who think with Colonel Gidney. Have we ever approved of the distinction that is made on the ground of race? I do not think any representative of any community, any one who takes the name of Indian has ever approved of this distinction being made on the ground of race. If that is so and if we argue that the racial distinction which is wrong should go and go immediately, is it right that in our own country we should create communal distinctions and then be justified in claiming that racial distinctions should go. Is that the way to contribute to the elimination of racial distinctions that have been perpetuated in this country by those who are in authority?

12 Noon. We shall be strengthening their hands, we shall be giving them a handle, we shall be giving them an argument, for the perpetuation of racial distinction which each of us, I think, in the country has always abhorred. If by claiming communal representation we are going to create feuds and quarrels in this country, so that, they would lead to those in authority continuing the status quo and continuing the racial distinction that has gone on in this country for a long time, I ask those who think with Colonel Gidney, are they serving the country thereby, are they advancing the cause of their communities, are they advancing the cause of their countrymen, and of the country to which I am sure, they feel proud to belong? You are losing the cause altogether by claiming for your communities that which is the right of the country alone, who prevents these communities from sending their candidates to the examinations? Is there any law, is there any clause saying that only the Hindu community will represent itself at the examinations, and that the Anglo-Indian community or the non-Brahmin community is precluded from sending candidates? Is it a sign of strength that, if they are not precluded from sending their candidates to the examinations, is it a sign of strength that they should ask that, even if their candidates do not prove fit, they must be given posts because they must have communal representation? I say, I do not know whether it is doing a service to the community to deny the strength and the capacity of the community. I am not prepared to believe that the community is so weak or helpless that it must have its own men sent, although they prove themselves totally unfit for the service. I, on the contrary, am prepared to believe that if their community sends men to the examinations, then I am sure that in their community they will find men who are able to hold their own with the other advanced communities in this country. To deny that, to deny that capacity in their community is a grave injustice, a distinct disservice to their community. But what are we really coming to? We are claiming self-government for the purpose of advancing rapidly the cause of our country. Are we claiming self-government, are we claiming further reforms for the purpose of giving an opportunity to every community to grab for itself what it can out of these reforms or what it can out of this advancement? (An Honourable Member: "What about protection?") Let us not discuss irrelevant subjects here. If you do not understand the meaning of protection which has nothing to do with communal representation, discuss it and fight it out when you come to discuss this question in the Assembly as I am sure the opportunity will come to the Assembly to discuss that subject. Let us not talk irrelevant things and interrupt in an irrelevant manner in order to break down arguments you cannot break down. Well, there is, if I may use another argument, that League of Nations established for the purpose of serving all the nations. At present there is a sad picture of each component part of the League of Nations trying to grasp for itself what it can out of other nations. The picture is sad enough. There is another picture of men like Lord Curzon claiming for their race a superiority which they have not the slightest right to claim. The picture is sad enough. Well, I was about to say the picture is blasphemous enough. Are we going to add to the sadness and to the blasphemy of that picture—those of us who claim self-government for this country, by claiming for our little communities what can be the right of this country alone and of none else? Think of the picture of an India not united under the banner of one God but under the different banners, of all the petty little communal gods claiming communal representation for the so-called advancement of their respective communities, leaving the country in the lurch, and asking it to take care of itself. It would be a fatal day if this Resolution was accepted. It is conceived, if I may say so with all respect to my friend, Colonel Gidney, in a spirit of pettiness and narrowness which does not do credit to a Member of this Assembly. I feel as one who feels that all racial distinctions should go, that all communal differences should go, and that we should all proclaim ourselves believers in the fatherhood of God and in the brotherhood of man. It would be a fatal thing to do to carry this Resolution and to thus injure the prospects of this country.

Mr. Deputy President: Perhaps it will be to the convenience of the House if I call upon Mr. Shahani to move his amendment at this stage.

Mr. S. C. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zamindars: Landholders): Sir, my amendment to the Resolution that has been moved by Lieutenant-Colonel Gidney is:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that, even if necessary, the present system of conducting simultaneous examinations for recruitment to the Indian Civil Service be so changed as to give a fair chance to duly qualified candidates belonging to different communities and different Provinces."

The object with which I move this amendment is that if on account of any extraneous considerations this Resolution comes to find favour with some in this Honourable House, the most objectionable part of the Resolution may be taken away from it. Colonel Gidney, I am sorry to say, has come forward to suggest that capacity and character should not be fully taken into account in the selection of candidates for the Indian Civil Service. He is putting a premium on communal representation; that is to say, he is suggesting that at times even incompetent men, and men of no character, if belonging to communities that are not represented in the Service, may for that reason be taken up.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: No, not at all.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Then I would like very much to understand the meaning of 'limited competition' which he suggests for the Indian Civil Service. Limited competition can only mean this that even if there are candidates of superior capacity and character available, their claims might be ignored on account of their not belonging to communities that are not represented in the Service. What other meaning you could attach to the word I cannot conceive. I am surprised that anyone belonging to this Honourable House should make bold to make a suggestion such as has been made. I have heard 'no', 'not at all' from Lieutenant-Colonel Gidney; but I would like very much to have an explanation from him of what the real meaning of the phrase 'limited competition' is. It can only mean what I have said, and nothing else. If the meaning is the one I am assigning, I trust that Lieutenant-Colonel Gidney's Resolution will be rejected, and summarily too, in this Honourable House. But supposing it is not rejected, supposing it finds favour, for instance, with Government, then I say, it will be desirable for us to effect a compromise to this effect, namely, that considerations of character and capacity first, and communal representation next. Never should communal consideration be given precedence over considerations of character and capacity. I have got to say just a few words with regard to what fell from the lips of my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. He said that the highest qualifications for the Indian Civil Service should be capacity to forget one's caste, race and religion. I trust he referred merely to the credal part of religion and not to the cultural. So far as I can see, the cultural element of all world religions is the same, and, according to me, the more religious a man is; the more fit he is for the Indian Civil Service. I was surprised not a little when yesterday a distinction was made between 'moral' on the one hand and 'good' on the other; and I must confess I felt depressed when I heard cries of 'Hear, hear' at my stating that no one who was immoral could be really good. I have yet to understand that a man who has not been a good husband or a good son can prove to be a good citizen. I have yet to know it.

Do you think that a man who is not a good member of his family will ever really be a good citizen of his country? It is unthinkable. The mistaken concept of goodness without morality has to be corrected, and corrected on ethico-political grounds. It is easy to smile when a suggestion of this kind is made to you: but great or high-placed as you may be, it will, I assure you, do you a lot of good if you will bend your mind to the suggestion, and consider it in the light of the real import of your concept. Your Indian Civil Servants must be altruistic, and must respect the pieties and relationships of life. If they do not respect the obligations which are involved in the position that is assigned to them, I feel sure that they will not be able to administer rightly the affairs of the country. The more we are truly mindful of our castes and races and religions, the more fitted we are to occupy positions of trust and responsibility. Lieutenant-Colonel Gidney's Resolution is calculated to destroy the efficiency of the Indian Civil Service; it is calculated to destroy considerations of a higher nature which should guide us in our selections for the highest of our places of trust and responsibility. I do hope that his Resolution will not be accepted, and that it will receive the treatment which it deserves.

Mr. Deputy President. The amendment moved is:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that, even if necessary, the present system of conducting simultaneous examinations for the recruitment to the Indian Civil Service be so changed as to give a fair chance to duly qualified candidates belonging to different communities and different provinces."

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the Honourable Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas has made a speech in this House as if a Plato was teaching his disciples. He is a wise man; but sometimes in his wisdom he overlooks facts. Another Member, Dr. Gour, in his usual way has been led by his irrelevancy into talking about matters which were not before the House. In his zeal in opposing the Resolution he has attacked the present system of representation in this reformed Council. I do not think, Sir, that Dr. Gour's remarks can be allowed to pass unchallenged in this House. I would like to know—and I should like to be convinced on this matter—how many of my own community, or how many of the Sikh community, would have been sitting in this House to-day if there had not been communal representation? I would like to know how many non-official Europeans would have been Members of this House if there had not been communal representation. Different communities have different interests in this country. The population of this country is not made-up of one particular community and a single interest. It is made up of different interests, different peoples and different ideals and different languages. Can my friend, or anyone in this House, convince the House that by eliminating communal representation, all the different classes of the people can be adequately represented in this House? It would be a sheer impossibility. This fact has been established; it is realized by all sane people whose opinion is worth having that this fact cannot be ignored; the different communities cannot be represented in the reformed Legislatures without communal representation. But whatever merit Dr. Gour's case might have, he has destroyed it by his exaggeration. My other wise friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, has also proceeded on the same lines; but surely he must know the fate which exaggeration always meets, even when the suggestion contained therein is more or less wise. I will not dwell on that point at length, but will confine myself to the question which is before the House, and that is about the representation in the Civil Services of India. Do my friends here who advocate the cause of examination speak from experience, and can they say that merely by cramming and passing an examination a man becomes fit to govern the country? Can a man, simply by reading a few books and passing an examination, become a good executive officer? Certainly not. That requires something else. I have seen many men, very well educated people, who, placed in the position of responsibility of an executive officer, have proved greater failures than others who did not know more than the rudiments of reading and writing. Many qualities are required of a man before he can govern a country and occupy a position of responsibility with efficiency. A person who may have passed examinations in law need not necessarily make a good Judge or Chief Justice; in such a position he may be an absolute failure although he may know the law well enough; it is in the application of the law that he fails; he fails because he does not possess the essential qualities which go to the making of a good Judge. The same thing applies with greater force when it comes to the executive line. A man may be a very good mathematician; but would that ensure his success in the position of Home Member? I think not. But what Colonel Gidney has said is a totally different thing. I hope that he did not mean that inefficient people from one community should be appointed in preference to efficient persons from other communities. What is the idea behind this question of the Indianisation of the Services? What is the basis of this cry? The fact is—and it cannot be disguised—that the people believe that the English people have not been properly safeguarding the interests of indigenous communities, and they desire that the Indians should come in in larger numbers and be given a fair chance to develop their country properly. If that is the basis for their asking for Indianisation of the Services then I do not see why different communities should not have safeguards for their communities as well. If there is any examination, I would much prefer that it might be held in England, because England is a totally different country from India. In England where everybody is supposed to be equal and free the only test is that he should pass certain examinations, that he has received a proper education and that he is well trained. But in India the fittest man is not the person who has passed a certain examination. A man with lesser education but a stronger character would be a much better man than he with a higher education but with no character. Mr. Joshi may talk of his ideal world and ideal India; but I suppose his dream will be like Plato's dream. The world has never been perfect and India can never be perfect, Sir. He may say that India expects that public servants should forget everything, their caste, their creed, etc., but of course expectation is a different thing from what actually happens. Is it actually happening to-day? Does he mean to say that India, a conservative country, will forget like that in the near future? Will his dream be realised within a decade or so? I do not think so. It will take years and years. Of course when India is so perfect that every individual Indian forgets that he belongs to a particular caste or creed there will be, I suppose, not a single soul and there will be no Colonel Gidney at that time to ask for communal representation. But we are talking of the present; we are talking of present conditions; and when we talk of present conditions we should see how India is at present, and according to the present India we cannot see any other way but to ask for communal representation. My friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, may say that communal representation is a game of the present Government

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I have never said so.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: You meant that by saying this, that with these jealousies existing and all this kind of friction there can be no advancement in the country. I think that without this there can be no improvement in this country, unless we have communal representation. The different communities will develop themselves; they will have no jealousies. Formerly what used to be the case? Take any instance. Take the Councils. Take the District Boards. Take the Municipalities; take anything. What were the elections based on? It did not matter how efficient a man was; if he did not belong to a particular community nobody would vote for him. Do the gentlemen who advocate the elimination of communal representation realise what the state of affairs is in the districts? Go anywhere. If a Jat is standing I do not think that a Rajput can get a single vote from villages where Jats are living; where Rajputs are living the Rajputs will get all the votes. If a Muhammadan is standing and any Hindu gentleman is standing, probably the Muhammadan will be fortunate enough to get a few votes of his own friends. . . .

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. I would draw the attention of the Honourable Member to the fact that he has exceeded the time limit and that he should bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: Very well, Sir. On this basis I think that the Resolution which has been moved by my friend, Colonel Gidney, should be adopted by this House and I hope that the House will adopt it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City : Non-Muhammadan Urban) : Sir, I did not intend to intervene in this debate, but I wish to emphasize two or three points which should not be forgotten in giving a vote on this Resolution. Let us remember that we are now considering the question of the recruitment to the Indian Civil Service and nothing else—not the provincial service—but the Indian Civil Service which can boast of Sir William Vincent, Sir Malcolm Hailey, Mr. Innes and Mr. Denys Bray who are our colleagues here. Let us remember that (Mr. K. Ahmed : 'And Mr. Chatterjee')—I am not going to mention the Indians now for the very best of reasons. You are recruiting to this service Indians to compete with these gentlemen whom I have named; you want a Chatterjee, you want a Monomohan Ghose, you want people of that sort who can hold their own against these mighty fellows who come out from abroad and do signal service to our country. We who speak of castes and creeds, let us remember that we do not by doing anything on our part create a caste, an inferior caste in the Indian Civil Service. Let all men be equal in that service; let us not lower the reputation of that service which has won for itself a reputation all over the world. By adopting this proposition you are running a grave danger; the danger is of reducing, of impairing the reputation which it has built for itself for a whole century. The Indian Civil Service will only be proud to own in its ranks men who can by their calibre, by their capacity, administer the affairs of this country. The time is not yet when we the Legislature can do the work of this country. For years and years to come I think we will have to depend upon the Indian Civil Service, composed mainly, I hope, of Indians. In years to come they will still hold their own and carry the flag of bringing civilisation, bringing knowledge, bringing capacity in the discharge of their duties and uplifting this country as it deserves to be uplifted. Therefore, let us remember that. What is the good of talking about representation in legislatures, representation in taluk boards, representation in village panchayats? How is that an analogous question at all? Why confuse the issue by bringing in those questions? Now, I am quite willing to admit that we have to recognise this unfortunate and ugly fact that there are communities and sects and sub-sects—I know it from my own bitter experience of the small community to which I belong. Colonel Gidney spoke of minorities. I am in a minority community; we are one million out of 44 millions in our province. I am not fighting for my community at all; a time may come perhaps when I may have to stand up and fight for my community, but not yet; I hope better sense will prevail with my countrymen and that they will not carry these small ideas in their heads when they have got a bigger task before them. I know the country does not want this; a few educated people in the upper ranks are clamouring for the public services, as if public service alone is the only method of enriching this country. Am I to be told that land should be parcelled out according to the strength of the communities? Am I to be told that commerce and trade should be parcelled out according to the strength of the communities? Who prevents these people from coming forward and claiming all these benefits when you have got open competition? Uplift yourselves. Those gentlemen who are interested in their communities should do everything to uplift the members of their community. I am surprised that such a proposition should come from Colonel Gidney. Why, Sir, he belongs to the most petted and most fondled community. Look at the Telegraph list, look at the Customs House list, look at the Police; look at any of these services. Is he represented there according to the strength of his community? Why, Sir, they are a most favoured community, and I am surprised that Colonel Gidney should come forward with this proposition. If he gets his deserts according to his numbers where will he be? And that Colonel Gidney should complain comes as a surprise to me, for has he not come out in a competitive Service, topmost, I hope? At any rate, he is topmost in his profession, and he has not failed to achieve a reputation in that Service. Therefore, let us remember that we are dealing with a Service which requires our best men. If really we want them to make their mark in the Civil Service, if we want them to hold their own against men of the calibre whom we have named, and if you accept this Resolution, I say you will be lowering them in the estimation of their colleagues, you will be putting them in a lower caste, you will be treating them as Pariahs in the Civil Service. Remember that danger when you vote for this Resolution.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): Sir, I rise to support this Resolution. It is rather sad that I have to oppose those friends of mine whom I had always the privilege to support, but time comes when one has to differ from his friends, and with all deference I beg to differ from my friends like Mr. Rangachariar, and Dr. Gour. At the very outset, I should point out the defects that arise from the predominance of any one single class in certain Services to the exclusion of others. Why are we complaining against the predominance of the English element in the I. C. S.? There might be many other reasons, but to my mind there are two very important reasons against it. One is that an European officer does not fully understand the language, the ways and manners and habits of the people. Naturally, Sir, if another class in India gets the same preponderance in the same Services, it would surely be under the same disadvantage. If a gentleman from a distant corner of India goes to govern another distant part of the country, he will be in exactly the same position as an Englishman. I don't mean to suggest this about any particular gentleman, but if there are hordes of gentlemen like that, they will be exactly in the same position as Englishmen, because they will not know the language and customs and manners of the people of those parts. The other thing is the want of sympathy which we so often feel. I submit, Sir, it will be well nigh the same thing if one class predominates in a certain Service. It does not lie in our mouths to say 'Indianise the services, let anybody come at any place, we should not mind it.' I do say that I am very much in favour of the Indianisation of the Services. I am very much in favour of merit being given its due weight. But let me ask, is efficiency the monopoly of any certain class? There are mainly three objections which up till now I have been able to gather against the Resolution of my friend, Colonel Gidnev. One is that efficiency should prevail; the other is that it will break down our nationality and that we should consider ourselves as one nation; and lastly the third thing is the impracticability, and that is the principal thing. There are so many castes and creeds. These are the main objections which I have so far been able to gather. There might be some others which might have escaped my notice.

Now let us take the first objection, that is, efficiency. Efficiency is not the monopoly of any one particular class or community, and efficiency does not necessarily consist in literary education alone. I am surprised to hear long sermons on efficiency now forced upon us about literary examinations. With all humility and with all deference, I bring forward this argument—I do not mean to attack the motives of any friends of mine here, far be it from me—but I say that it is a certain mentality that certain people think in a certain way, and this might be due to that. When I was arguing this very point two years ago while we were discussing the Esher Committee's Report, I was pressing that the communities who had proved their efficiency till now in the military service should get commissions. I know that a good many of my nationalist friends—by "nationalist" I mean those who are now saying that this proposition would now demolish our nationality—I mean those friends who hold such views, opposed me then. Sir, in the military line is it the efficiency of letters only that should prevail? I remember how very strongly and severely I was opposed when I was fighting for the rights of those communities who have proved their efficiency in the military line. Efficiency, I submit, does not consist in book knowledge and in writing articles and papers. How are you to know that a gentleman who is able to answer so many questions in mathematics would prove a good Commander of the Army? How do you know that a gentleman who knows a good deal of the History of India or who can answer well a good paper on Logic would prove a very good administrator? I submit there are instances in actual practice where students who were always at the top in Arts and Law Colleges have proved themselves utter failures as practical lawyers. We cannot always say that the present competitive examination is the only test to judge merits and that it is the only successful test. I do say that it is one of the tests. And what is it that we want according to my friend Mr. Shahani? We want duly qualified candidates. Well, we say let there be a competition between us first, and let us show that we too have got our capable men, and let them be tried. If you find that some of them cannot write answer papers like others, let them be tried whether they can administer better justice or prove better administrators. I don't mean to say that there should be no efficiency, but let the minorities too have a chance. I am sorry my friend Mr. Jamnadas is not here. He was very virulent over my friend Mr. Bagde, and said 'For God's sake do not bring in irrelevant matters,' but I say let the trade of Europe openly compete with the trade of India. Because the interests of industry in India are at stake and they want protection; let them grow and let them give a fair chance of showing their capacities for development and then you can show that we compete with anybody. So, I say now let the minorities have a chance of competing among themselves. Let them prove their merit and then we shall say after some time that we can compete with anybody when we are fully grown. Minorities—the principle of defending minorities is not a bad one. I think, if you give a chance to the minorities to develop their resources, and to come abreast with you, you will be strengthening the weaker communities and creating a stronger India thereby. Sir, if there is a competition between communities themselves, if we should decide that we should have 5 Sikhs and 2 Muhammadans and 2 Hindus—I beg your pardon, I do not mean that these are the actual figures—but suppose there are so many Bengalis, so many Muhammadans and so many Mahrattas, for God's sake nobody can say that the candidates that we select from the Muhammadans or the Sikhs or the Christians or the Madrasis are bad to the extent of 20 per cent. or would have an efficiency of 10 per cent. in one case and 20 per cent. in another. Well, all we are saying is let every community have a proportion, we are not at all wanting to decrease the efficiency of the Services. We are rather giving minorities a chance of developing themselves further, so that they may give us better men in future. So much for the action proposed. We simply want that the best men from every community be taken and if there is competition between these men all over India, nobody can say that we are favouring any particular community. It has been deprecated strongly by Dr. Gour that the principle of communal representation has been adopted in the High Courts. May I ask, Sir, if the Hindu and Muhammadan Judges have not both proved highly efficient. Who can deny that the Right Honourable Mr. Justice Amir Ali was one of the best Judges as were a good many of our Hindu friends. I think the Punjab is proud of the name of our present Chief Justice, Sir Shadi Lal, and the late lamented Mr. Justice Shah Din.

Sir, the next point is about nationality. This is perhaps a most touchy point, about which it is sometimes said "We shall spoil our national unity." I would simply deplore, Sir, that our nationality should be spoiled. I would rather like that we should not come into existence as a nation if we are not to exist as a strong nation. But how can national sentiment be developed? There is absolutely no use in denying facts and dwelling on ideals. Facts are facts and cannot be changed. Communities do exist. Communal feelings do exist. There is no use saying "My dear Sir, do be quiet. People will call us bad fellows if we fight among ourselves. Sit silent. We will develop." What does it mean? As I said the other day, the cat does not run away if the pigeon shuts its eyes. Your communal differences will not run away by simply saying we should ignore them. Recognise the fact and find out a solution. I submit, Sir, that the present practice does recognise this.

[Bhai Man Singh.]

May I remind the House of a little fact—I think I am right—of course my information is not very definite—but I am told that on the retirement of Dr. Sapru a certain province, perhaps from the South, said that Bombay should now be represented in place of Dr. Sapru. Does it mean merit or efficiency, does it mean nationality? Is not the Government of India, even in the selection of its Executive Councils trying to find out, of course, efficient and very efficient men but trying to represent different communities and different provinces? Why deny facts? Does the feeling actually exist? Then, Sir, it is very easy to say "We deprecate the existence of the principle of communal representation in these Councils." But do you really think, Sir, that if certain communities had no elected men at all in this House they would be satisfied? Would the heart-burning created in the minds of these minorities be conducive to national unity? It is all very well from the point of view of one people but it is not so pleasant from the point of view of others. National unity? I mean to say the fact exists and that fact has been recognised on all hands. For so many years the Indian National Congress tried to ignore these hard facts of the existence of Hindu and Muhammadan communal feelings. They said "No, we will have a united India." But they had subsequently to recognise the fact. I go a step further. You will say perhaps the Congress men of that time were weak men.

Mr. Deputy President: I must draw the attention of the Honourable Member to the fact that he has exceeded his time limit.

Bhai Man Singh: Very well, Sir. Then I will bring my speech to a close. Even Mahatma Gandhi and Mr. C. R. Dass had to admit that we should decide about the rights of the different communities. If everybody in a family is getting his own share the family will live in peace. If some individuals of the family do not get their proper share and others predominate over them, there is bound to be a rupture. It is the same with a community. We shall become a nation when we shall learn to respect the rights of others, to give our minorities their dues, to recognise that they exist. Sir, I am sorry that I cannot further discuss the practicability of the question, and with these remarks I support the Resolution.

(An Honourable Member: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.)

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): In view of the course which this debate has taken, I had at one time some doubt whether I ought or ought not to intervene. Indeed, I hope, Sir, you will not accuse me of flippancy if I say, that I have at times felt a little like the Irishman who seeing an affray going on in the road asked, "Is this a private fight or may I join in?" But I cannot of course neglect my obligations in this respect. My friends here have asked me to define the attitude of Government in the past and present on this question. I have incidentally to clear up certain misapprehensions which have been voiced by Members here. The discussion has been so prolonged that I shall confine myself very strictly to the terms of the Resolution. I shall not be led astray, as some of my friends here have undoubtedly wished, into a discussion regarding isolated appointments such as those of Judges in the High Courts. Believe me there are certain experienced animals before whom it is quite useless to wave a red flag. I am one of them. We are talking purely about the Indian Civil Service. Then again, I shall not be led astray into attempting to justify the retention in our Electrical Rules of the principle of communal representation, since that is alien to the subject. Nor shall I be inveigled into reviving a discussion, in regard to a matter we debated yesterday, and which Mr. Shahani wishes me to resume to-day, whether a gentleman who is unfaithful to his wife can or cannot be a sufficient surety for a bad character. We are talking, as I said, solely of the Indian Civil Service, and Colonel Gidney's Resolution refers specifically to a change in the manner in which we obtain recruits for our Indian Civil Service in India, as distinguished from the Home Examination. The question has a long history. If time served, I could go with the House back to the year 1833, the year in which the famous declaration was made that:

"There should be no governing caste in British India and whatever other tests of qualification may be adopted, distinction of race or religion shall not be of the number."

But I will not on this occasion take the House through the stages of that history, because, after all, the main point then debated,

1 P.M. indeed the main point debated right up to the eighties or nineties of last century, was the question of what was then described as the monopoly of the European, and that, at present, is not the question under discussion. We first of all considered the question of communal representation in our Indian recruitment, if I may use that convenient term, in about the year 1886 when the Aitchison Committee, the first of our great Committees on public Services, made its recommendations. It was in favour of open competition among Indian recruits for the provincial Services, holding that there must be one test of eligibility only, the test of intelligence and character, and that other considerations should have no weight in the choice of Government servants. But it recognised that this system was not universally applicable; that there was a strong feeling in India that the claims of different communities and different religions should be balanced; and it accompanied its recommendation by a stipulation that where necessary the local Governments should still choose by nomination in order to attain the object to which I have referred. The Government of India in the main affirmed this view, though it expressed a preference for competition among nominated candidates when pure competition was not adopted. I omit subsequent stages, until I arrive at 1904, when the Government of India issued the well known Resolution of that year on Education. Its attitude was then determined partly by considerations of educational requirements; in dealing with the question of competition it pointed out the disadvantages of that system, showed that it did not in itself afford a test of character, and emphasized that a competitive examination was in itself a disadvantage to the progress of education, since it ceased to be liberal, and confined itself entirely to the attainment of success in examination. It was under the influence of those considerations that they then decided that local Governments need not follow the competitive system in making appointments to their provincial Services. Three local Governments had initiated the system.—Madras, Bengal, and Bombay.—and they at once discarded the competitive system and returned to nomination pure and simple. The Punjab adopted it, though only in respect of a very limited number of appointments.

I pass—again with some omissions—to the Public Services Commission of 1911. I have no doubt that the recommendations of that Commission in this respect are well known to the Assembly. I apologise for taking the Assembly through this retrospect but it is important to the explanation of our present position, for the present state of our ideas on the subject is the development of what has happened in the past. The Public Services Commission decided that it was undesirable to lay down any hard and fast rules as to the proportions of communal representation; its necessity should be met by the judicious use of the nomination system. That opinion was not unanimous. Mr. Chaubal deprecated attaching too much importance to this factor and would prefer the negative form, namely, that posts in services should not substantially be the monopoly of any one caste in India. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald thought that communal representation was a bad system, and that it should be abandoned, but he added that it could only be abandoned with an improvement in education and growth of a common civic spirit. Sir Abdur Rahim thought it inadvisable to emphasise the principle of communal representation as against that of impartial selection of the best men, and though on occasion it was advisable to secure communal representation, subject to the insistence of adequate qualifications, he added the recommendation that substantial recognition should be given wherever possible to the general conditions of a competitive system. The point was discussed at length in dealing with the report of the Commission; I pass over the somewhat divergent opinions recorded by local Governments, and merely give the decision of the Government of India. It was given in this form: "The Public Services should be recruited on the principle that they should be filled by the most competent men available. This principle is, however, subject to modification in the interests of the training of Indians in the administration of their own affairs. Full opportunities should be afforded to Indians to qualify themselves for the more important posts in the public services and to demonstrate their fitness for responsible duties. It must, however, be recognised that intellectual qualifications combined with physical capacity should not be the sole test for admission to important posts in the public services. Due regard must also be given to such considerations as character and hereditary connections of candidates both with Government and with the people with whom their work will mostly lie; while in the present conditions of India it is essential that there should not be an undue predominance of any one class or caste. The circumstances of each Service will have to be considered in view of the above principles." When Government sets out to lay down a formula on a question of this importance, it not infrequently happens that in the nice balancing of considerations on both sides its conclusions lack some of the virtue of definiteness. In this case we have a very nicely balanced judgment (A Voice: "Too nice"), which certainly combines all considerations inherent to a decision on such an important question; if the sense of balance is more obvious than the definiteness of the conclusion, nevertheless I think it will be agreed by all who have heard it that it contains a moderate and reasonable statement of principle, namely, that you should get the best men available, but that you should not allow the preponderance of any one class or any one caste in your public services. I lay stress indeed on that negative form; it is one to which I shall have to refer again. I must pass over again in my rapid retrospect the many important discussions which took place in the Imperial Legislative Council when it dealt with the recommendations of the Public Services Commission. My friend, Mr. Sarma, was one protagonist, Sir Muhammad Shafi took an important part in the discussions; there were other famous figures engaged. While the main discussion centred again on the question of the maintenance of a fixed European proportion as against progressive Indianisation, there were many, such as Nawab Ali Chaudhury, who claimed that the particular aspect of the question which we are discussing to-day should receive primary consideration. It is interesting to remember that when some Members of the Council objected that open competition pure and simple would mean that Brahmins from Southern India would largely dominate the lists, both Mr. Sastri and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya promised on behalf of the Brahmins of Southern India they would stand aside until it was generally decided that it was no longer necessary for them to do so. But indeed, whenever we discuss the question of the Services at large, and the problem of their Indianisation, this particular aspect of the question has always come athwart the discussion. It did so when Mr. Jinnah raised the question of Indianisation a year ago in our debates. It will be remembered that Mr. Bagle then moved an amendment much in the form of some of the amendments that have come before us to-day. I have troubled, I hope not unduly troubled, the Assembly with a retrospect showing how we have arrived at our present position; and I propose now to show exactly what our rules are in regard to the recruitment of Indian Civil Service in India itself. There has been some misapprehension on the subject. Indeed, I myself, as representing Government, have found it difficult to-day to understand fully whether our present position was being attacked or was being supported, and if so, by whom it was being attacked and by whom it was being supported. Here are the facts. We still look to London to supply us with the bulk of our candidates, and there of course the Indian competes without previous nomination or selection. Next, I take our Indian recruit, that is, our candidates recruited in India itself to whom this discussion particularly applies. Our practice here is to announce 67 per cent. of the appointments for Indian recruitment as available for open competition. I do not enter into the reason why that particular figure was taken; it is due to the fact that there are certain direct appointments from the Bar and to the existence of listed posts. 67 per cent. then are announced as available for open competition. Nomination is provided for in section 97 (6) of the Government of India Act in order to secure to some extent representation of the various provinces and communities in India. It will not of necessity take place every year, but only when the results of the open competitive examination in India fail to give the representation required. If the distribution of successes in the open examination turns out to be such as will meet the requirements of the various provinces and communities, resort to nomination will be unnecessary, and the vacancies held in reserve will be filled as far as possible by selection from among candidates who sat for the competitive examination and attained a certain qualifying standard. Failing this, they will be filled by nomination. Now that shows at once the very limited scope reserved for nomination, and the reasons for which we have adopted it. The scope is limited because nomination only comes into play when it is found that the 67 per cent. open competition does not give something like adequate representation of different provinces and communities, and nomination again will only be used for one definite purpose, namely, to insure that the main provinces and communities shall not be unrepresented. It will at once appear therefore that we do not and indeed never have intended that this limited reserve of nomination should be for the purpose of representing minority communities or backward classes. Our sole object may, as I have said, be described rather in a negative form, namely, to prevent the over-weighting of our Services with any one particular class or representatives of a particular province. It will interest the House if I analyse the result of our first open competition in India. There were 11 posts open for competition. They were filled up as follows: three from Madras, one from Bombay, the United Provinces, the Central Provinces and Bihar and Orissa and two from Bengal. All were Hindus. We reserved in addition four posts for nomination, and on this occasion utilized the provision to the full. One reason was that we required a Burman recruit; it has been considered desirable that Burma should be placed on a separate basis, that is to say, if no Burmans succeed in entering by the open competition, that we should nominate a Burman candidate. One of the four was a Burman, one was a Muhammadan from Bengal and the remaining two were representatives from the Punjab and Assam. This was strictly in accord with the general principles which I have described as guiding us in this matter. I now proceed to my conclusion, which is to give the attitude of Government on this Resolution. I have explained the very limited scope to which we now resort to nomination and the object with which we do so. Let me be clear again that it is not the intention of Government to resort to nomination in the Indian Civil Service merely to secure that advancement of minority or backward communities. Indeed, taking the matter only on its practical side, I do not myself know how we should proceed to promote the cause of minority communities. They are already many; and directly we attempted to help one, others would declare themselves. Greater communities would disclose unexpected cleavages; claims to representation based on novel and hitherto unaccepted standards would be set up. For my own part, I should shrink from so Herculean a task as an attempt to arbitrate between the conflicting claims of the different minority communities in India, and to establish standards for ascertaining their comparative value to the State. We are already engaged in a difficult enough task,—and we only make the effort because this much seems clearly justifiable—in seeing that the claims of any one Province or of any of the great communities are not entirely outweighed. I can with truth add that Government itself would be only too happy to avoid any system by which we had to discriminate in recruitment for the Public Services. We should be glad to avoid a system under which we run the risk of imputations of partiality to one community or another. We want nothing but the best men. We want men who are judged by one test only, the test of character, intelligence and efficiency, and the greatest of these is character. But facts are what they are. We have been led into our present system by the history of the past; and we have to ask ourselves whether India at large has yet arrived at that stage of social development in which there need be no consideration at all of provincial claims or the claims of the major communities. India has not, I take it, yet arrived at that stage in politics. However much some of us may desire to see the end of communal representation on the franchise, the history of the last three years has shown us that India at large is not yet ready to abandon it. There may come a time when educational and social advancement will secure that result, when there will no longer be recognition either in politics or in the Services of the claims of particular religions or particular communities, when all such differences will be lost in the larger sentiment of nationality or social service. But that time is not yet. In the meanwhile the position of Government is clear; we are proceeding on grounds which obviously lay themselves open to very little criticism; and we ourselves see nothing in the trend of current opinion which indicates the necessity for a change. The Resolution asks for a change in our present system; I have declared what our present system is; and for ourselves we see no necessity for any modification. For this reason, I could not support the Resolution even if indeed I perfectly comprehended its terms. When affairs are moving so rapidly as they are now, to again attempt to change the system of recruitment for one of our major services,—to again open the whole of this question to discussion, to again invite an interchange of opinions which, amicable as it may be in form, as it has been to-day, yet nevertheless discloses strong differences of standpoint among various communities—is in my view not desirable. I can only support the system as we have it at present, and claim that it should continue.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, with your permission I wish to state that I am prepared to accept Mr. Shahani's amendment to my original Resolution; and in doing so, Sir, I thank you for the opportunity afforded me by the Government Member of making a few remarks on the way this Resolution has been received. At the outset, Sir, when I consented to move this Resolution, I knew that I was running the gauntlet—I was perfectly aware, judging from the threats that I received from the Bombay Member that he would rap my knuckles, from the Madras Member that he would "go" for me, and, as my community is a small one, I was perfectly prepared to run that gauntlet. It was a sort of an intensive attitude of threats to me. The result has been as I expected. My Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, has addressed an admonition, and desired that I should suffer a censure for having the audacity to present this Resolution. I would have thought, and I still think, that when he goes home this evening and thinks seriously he would change his mind and pass the very opposite of a censure on me for having had the courage to expose my community to his attack, knowing fully that, by putting forward this motion before this Honourable House, I was risking a reference to certain subordinate preferential treatment for specific services rendered. I realize that that day is gone, and to-day my community is not enjoying preferential treatment. Therefore, as the representative of a minority community, I make bold to put forward this motion, feeling that my community has rights like those of the rest of India and having that feeling, with great pleasure, I accept this censure passed on me by my friend Munshi Iswar Saran. But I do feel that he should think of it, and reflect on it, seriously. Now my Honourable friend Dr. Gour, in his thunderous voice, said to me, "what do you want, you belong to the Anglo-Indian community, you are only about 100,000 in number and your proportionate claim for appointments when compared with the rest of India is 1 in 3,150 according to which you are entitled to only one-third of an appointment per annum." He seems to have worked this out with mathematical precision. Possibly Dr. Gour belongs to the Rajput community, and feels he is entitled to come here and to try and have a sword thrust at me, but, what I say is, 'we are a minority community, and therefore, in common with the rest of the minority communities in India, we ask for the protection of this House.' I am only fighting the case of a minority community, which I think should receive the solicitude of Dr. Gour. He remarks in a very scathing way that, because we are such a small proportion, we are not entitled to get one-third. Have we got a third? I want to know. He refers to all the Services. I am talking of the Indian Civil Service alone, which is the subject of this Resilution. If you scan the list of nominations, you will find that my community has not received it. Dr. Gour seems to have the right to mistake differential for preferential treatment.

Then as to my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, who belongs to that famous learned class, the Madras Brahmin—all credit to them. I believe he said his population is one million, but he did not tell you what percentage of successes that one community has obtained in the Indian Civil Service examination. There is all the more credit to them for any successes gained, but it is just to avoid a repetition of monopoly that I have brought forward this Resolution. I purposely deal with this matter on very broad lines, because I realize I am walking on tender ground and I do not wish to offend any community. When my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, turns round and says, 'what about the Railways, the Posts and Telegraphs'—I may for his edification refer him to the latest report of the Madras Presidency which was a half-yearly report, G. O. No. 613, dated the 31st December 1921. I am not talking of Railways, although it was my community that elected to work like slaves on the Railways; it was my community that elected to work on the Posts and Telegraphs when they were not attractive. The members of my community are equally with others named citizens of India, and we are prepared to run a level race with the rest of India. I do not ask for preferential treatment for them. Mr. Joshi says that when appointments are made, they are not voted. I quite agree with him. In fact Mr. Joshi said to me before I moved this Resolution, "I do not think you had better move this Resolution, I think some one else had better do so." I think, Sir, in the circumstances I deserve more praise than censure from my friend, Munshi Iswar Saran. Mr. Joshi did not stray off the right path of my Resolution, but he asked if such examinations were made on votes or for the benefit of any particular community. No one suggested or requested this. He seemed to lay great stress on the type of men who should sit on Selection Committees and I agree with him that such Committee men should forget their communal distinctiveness. But I have yet to learn of a man who sat on a Selection Committee and who could dissociate self from self. There are certain things that go to form the subject called 'human nature,' and you cannot alienate yourself from them. Then we come to the question of Education, and Mr. Joshi makes a suggestion, that is "educate yourself." In theory, it sounds very well,—'educate yourself.' Well, supposing that one educated himself, what is the prospect? I think Honourable Members will have had an idea of what retrenchments are going to be effected in Bengal,—in Education a cut of Rs. 35 lakhs; and it is conceivable that the various provincial Legislative Councils may begin to curtail the education grant for European schools—I bring this out merely to show to Mr. Joshi that it is not a question of time; it is a question of minor communities having been caught napping, Englishmen included, under the Reforms Scheme. The Englishman has been caught napping and he is still sleeping. It is my minority community I want to protect by this Resolution. He calls my Resolution a "ridiculous Resolution." It may be,—yet you have to consider those ridiculous things called "minority communities." Then my friend, Mr. Joshi, said, that I wanted to enter by the back door. I wish to do no such thing at all. The Honourable Member in charge of the Department, Sir Malcolm Hailey, has stated the procedure adopted by the Government of India. He has also explained the provisions he has made so as to get an equilibrium and satisfy all classes. They sound very nice. I have not asked anyone to transgress the law of efficiency. I wish you to accept a bar of efficiency. I do not ask you to take an uneducated man and put him into a position such as the Indian Civil Service or to put him in through any backdoor influence. I do not wish to send in a monster petition to a certain big Government official and say, "such and such a man should get an appointment as a High Court Judge, or so and so should get an appointment as the next Member of Council from Bombay or Madras." I do not wish to do that. There is no doubt that at the next Indian Civil Service Examination you will find Madras again coming up and getting the first four places. You will probably find the community to which my friend Munshi Iswar Saran belongs, securing the next two, leaving nothing for the rest of India. It is for the rest of India that I am putting forward the proposals I have submitted to the House. Unless you act somewhat on these lines, the Englishmen now administering this country will be replaced by those inhabiting the south and the east of India. The Indianization of the services was admirably enunciated by my Honourable friend, Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, and the interpretation has been slightly altered now. The fact is that the Indianization of the services in the way Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas has enunciated it, has really been to replace Englishmen in order to get a cheaper market and a cheaper return for work. It is down here as one of the reasons. But I want to attack the idea of the monopoly of 2 or 3 provinces in India, for the sake of a minority community. The Government of India have also apprehended this swamping and Sir Malcolm Hailey has shown how wise was the Public Services Commission in asking for safeguards. He has almost supported the Resolution which I have put forward here for the protection of minority communities. I put forward this Resolution for the acceptance of the House and I accept Mr. Shahani's amendment to it.

Mr. Deputy President: The original Resolution moved was :

" This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that the present system of conducting Simultaneous Examinations for the recruitment to the Indian Civil Service be changed and that a different method of conducting the Simultaneous Examinations so as to give a fair chance to candidates belonging to different communities and different Provinces, be devised, if necessary, by having a limited form of competition."

To this an amendment has been moved

Mr. S. O. Shahani: Sir, in view of the very worthy remarks which have fallen from the Leader of the House I beg to withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the original Resolution be adopted.

RESOLUTION RE SCHOLARSHIPS TO INDIANS FOR RESEARCH WORKS.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the Resolution which I propose to place before the House for its consideration runs as follows:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that twenty-five scholarships, each tenable for five years at about Rs. 4,000 per head per annum eventually costing not more than five lakhs annually, be given year after year (and with your permission I will add here 'as funds are available') from the Imperial Revenues to Indians of great promise specially for research work in any part of the world and in any branch of knowledge approved by the Central Legislature."

Sir, my task has been lightened very much by the Resolution which was moved by the Honourable Mr. Samarth on the 23rd of February last, when the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee who was then Secretary in the Industries Department, indicated the Government policy with reference to the training of Indian youths. I may perhaps here say in parenthesis that we congratulate the Government on the fact that, for the first time, an Indian official has been raised to Cabinet rank, and, because of his ability, character and integrity we find that he has been raised to the position of a Member. I hope during the period of his Membership there will be no change in the Government policy which he has once announced. Sir, the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee stated that "it is the duty of the State in India to provide adequate facilities in India itself for the training of our youth in all the different industries" and that "this is the policy that every civilised and progressive country has adopted." He further added: "No established industry in any country can prosper, if it has to depend either for its supervisory or higher labour, or for the masses of the artisans which it employs, on men imported from abroad or on men trained abroad." I quite appreciate that, because every country which wants to be self-reliant must see that their men are sufficiently trained, either in their own country or abroad in order to replace foreign experts or specialists. But the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee has stated that there must be a time when we need not send anybody abroad for training. Perhaps that is an ideal time, I do not know when it will come to India, but I can assure the House and I also mention it to the Honourable Member for Education that it takes a very long time before even a Government with all its resources can say "We have established institutions in the country so that persons need not be sent abroad." May I mention, Sir, that the expenditure incurred on all the Universities and research institutes in India by the State and otherwise is much smaller in amount than the expenditure of one University in America. Columbia University in New York spends nearly two crores every year, whereas the utmost we are able to get for the Bangalore Institute is only Rs. 4,00,000, of which the Government of India contributes Rs. 1,50,000 and there are a number of Universities in America which are spending 50 lakhs or even a crore. Besides, there are Institutes which are to be found in other countries, in England and Germany, and some in France where our people can go with advantage. I do not think it is possible for a very long time to come for us to educate our youths entirely in the country without finding it necessary to send them abroad.

But, Sir, I find certain difficulties in the matter. We know from the various speeches made by Government Members that they are very sympathetic with reference to making India self-sufficient in the matter of education, but we often notice the adoption of a timid policy by them, or what might be called "the drag and brake" policy. In a generous moment they will announce "Oh! We shall do this," but next moment they say "Perhaps we are going too far;" and they put on the brake. Now, we do not want such a policy of "drag and brake."

We want the Government with reference to this matter to adopt a clear and definite policy because we know their general views as they have been stated by Mr. Chatterjee: what we want is a definite policy as to the manner in which the training of Indians for research should be directed and developed. If we leave it to the future, it will never be done. The Government should come forward and lay down a definite programme. The Member in charge of Education, the Member in charge of Revenue (who has certain subjects under him) and the Member in charge of Industries should all three work together and obtain the approval of the Viceroy to any scheme they have worked out. They can then say "This is the manner and the method we propose to adopt in order to provide for research scholarships." I appeal to them to do this at once, because they have to do it some time, if not to-day, then to-morrow. They cannot avoid it. Next I would ask them to make sufficient provision to find out to what extent the existing institutions should be re-modelled and expanded so as to further such research. That they have to do because I may mention in this connection that there are only three institutes. One is the Sir Jamsetjee Tata Institute at Bangalore, the second the Imperial Institute at Dehra, and the third the Imperial Agricultural Institute at Pusa. I know the Indian Government have contributed something for a sugar expert at Coimbatore; but I find when I read the report submitted to the Government of India by Sir Henry Pope, Sir Asutosh Mukerjee, Sir H. H. Hayden and Dr. C. V. Raman with reference to work in the Indian Institute at Bangalore, I find they say it requires 20 or 25 lakhs of capital expenditure to make it thoroughly efficient, and an additional expenditure of Rs. 60,000 for its upkeep, while providing only a few subjects which they have mentioned—I need not enumerate them here—which they wanted to have there. Further they suggest that even with reference to persons who have to be sent abroad they should be trained in India in order to find out their special aptitude with reference to particular subjects. If the present facilities at Bangalore are inadequate, you may say there are two other Institutes. I have not got with me any public report except what was stated by the Secretary in the Revenue Department of the India Office when he was giving evidence before the Lytton Committee. Mr. Turner (that was his name) then said—page 292 of the Lytton Committee's report—that with regard to the complaint that no facilities were given to students to undertake research at the Institutes at Dehra Dun and Pusa and that they were confined only to professors and teachers he believed that the contention was broadly speaking true, but that he thought there had been exceptional cases of students undertaking research work at Dehra Dun though full information could be obtained only in India. I have therefore given notice in order to get information on this point. But the broad fact is, as I have stated, that proper facilities are not given either at Pusa or Dehra Dun for Indian students in the matter. I think that the Member in charge of Education or the Member in charge of Revenue should see to it that Imperial Institutes like those on which we are spending a lot of money should give facilities for research to Indian students. Thirdly, I suggest, Sir, at what stage and through what agency Indians whose scientific and technical equipment has been completed so far as the institutional resources of this country are concerned should be selected and deputed for further scientific training abroad. My object in making this suggestion is in order to avoid some misconceptions on the subject. When I gave notice of this Resolution that students should be trained for research, several members naturally thought that five years were unnecessary as those persons would be sent abroad at public expense. But I have taken this course with a view to meeting the objection of the Committee appointed to find out the working of the Research Institute at Bangalore. They say the students should have training in India and for that training about two years will be necessary in most cases, because we must know whether the students whom we select have the aptitude for a particular branch of work or not; and also that whatever facilities India possesses should be availed of to the full. When these boys have been trained in that manner we can send them for three years abroad for research. After all, we are not sending these people in order to get employment for them afterwards. It is not a purely service question. We want these persons as specialists or as experts. They must be persons who can develop their master-minds in order to add to the world's knowledge. Therefore we do not want mediocrities. We want great men in order to replace the great men we are getting at present from foreign countries. We find three American specialists were brought in for the Pusa Research Institute. Our object should be in course of time to train our own boys in order to fill up these important posts. Fourthly, I would suggest that the Government should also make up their minds to ensure that Indians should be trained at as early a date as possible and in ever-increasing numbers to fill scientific and technical posts for which abilities of the highest order are requisite. We were told on the last occasion that about 118 students were sent by the Government of India and that they are employed, suitably employed. I do not know how many were employed in Government Institutes but they must be very few. We know as a matter of fact when we refer to the members of the services that very few Indians are occupying important posts. Therefore it is absolutely necessary that proper men should be trained so that when they are well qualified we can employ them in their own country and avoid the unnecessary employment of foreign experts. The Honourable Mr. Chatterjee was kind enough on the last occasion to quote with approval what the Japanese Government were doing at that time. They were sending large number of students for training abroad in order to replace the foreign experts in the country. That is exactly my purpose. One objection I may mention here, that has been raised to my Resolution is whether Rs. 4,000 per annum is necessary. Some people think a lower figure would be sufficient; but I may say that the Lytton Committee themselves stated that they were obliged to increase the scholarships for Oxford and Cambridge from £250 to £350; and they thought that owing to the high cost of living which obtains at the present moment from £300 to £400 were absolutely necessary if persons are to have proper education at Oxford or Cambridge. That comes to Rs. 6,000; and I know that if it will not cost Rs. 6,000 it will certainly cost Rs. 5,000 to send a man to New York to Columbia University. If you send him to California University or to Harvard University at Boston, perhaps it would cost less. To send students at this time either to Germany or Japan would be still less. But this matter will have to be settled by the Government, as to what is required, and therefore I use the expression "as funds are available". I am only pressing the matter in order that when funds are available the scholarships may be instituted and increased from year to year. But, I may also state, Sir, that I do not think the Government would feel that there is want of talent in the country. I hope they do not entertain any such idea. The brilliant examples which we have in India do not at all discourage the Government in thinking that there is talent in the country. There are persons who, if appreciated and facilities afforded, will turn out to be experts, quite as good as any country could produce. India has in its own time produced experts, but for some reason or other we have not got the same facilities and therefore we are unable to count so many. We, however, have them in this country. If you want mathematicians, if you go to Madras, you will find any number. You have got the best professors and physicists in Bengal; we have also got Mr. Sircar, the greatest historian. We have the greatest persons in science. There are also other persons and I do not think I need name them. Therefore I think Government would not at all be discouraged that India has not got such talent for the purpose. I am asking for a modest sum of Rs. five lakhs eventually and only ask for Rs. one lakh now. If the Government are spending Rs. 12,000 lakhs every year, may I not ask them to spare out of the Rs. 12,000 lakhs, Rs. one lakh for this year for this purpose? I hope the Government would help us in securing the regeneration of the country by not opposing this Resolution and giving early effect to the Resolution and by putting into practice what they preach and what they promise.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, I am intervening in this debate at this early stage in the hope that I might be able to specify the position of the Government with reference to this question and that might assist the House to come to a fairly early conclusion on the subject raised by the motion of my Honourable friend. I wish, Sir, at the outset to express my own gratitude for the personal reference that my friend has made to me and I can only ask for the same indulgence, the same generous indulgence, from the Members of the House to me in my present capacity as they have always accorded to me throughout my membership of this House. The Honourable Mr. Raju prefaced his remarks by quoting certain statements which I had made on the occasion of the debate raised by the Honourable Mr. Samarth with regard to the training of Indians in industries outside India. Sir, I must state that neither the Government nor I have wavered in the policy that was then stated by me in this House. I can only repeat that the Government of India fully agree with the Honourable Mr. Raju that research is a very important—indeed one of the most important elements—in securing industrial development in this country and also for the purpose of the advancement of general culture in order to build up the nation. Sir, I would go even further and I think probably every Member of the House would agree with me that just as in the case of industrial training, so in the case of research, it is very desirable so far as possible that research both for the purpose of industrial development and for the purpose of culture should be conducted by indigenous agency. Therefore, Sir, it will be admitted that the question is an important one and I hope that I am voicing the feelings of all Members of this House when I say that the Honourable Mr. Raju has done a good service by bringing this question before the Assembly. Perhaps, Sir, Mr. Raju would agree with me if I make a further statement and that is that research should be conducted so far as possible in India and not abroad. I do not quite know whether Mr. Raju contemplated that students should pursue research both in industrial subjects and in cultural subjects abroad and then give it up when they come back to India. I think, Sir, it is most essential that facilities should be provided for the students to carry on their research after they come back to India. It is not much use sending students to be trained in the methods of research in European countries or in America or Japan if they find when they come back that they have neither laboratories nor libraries nor other equipment to enable them to pursue their studies. The two things, therefore, Sir, must go hand in hand. We should make every possible endeavour to send our students, men of promise, to foreign countries in order that they might obtain the very best possible training, but at the same time we must not forget to provide them with facilities in this country. Progress in the first direction must be conditioned by progress in the second direction. I was rather distressed to find a current of pessimism through the speech of the Honourable gentleman. He seemed to think that Government might make promises, but then they would follow a policy of what he called 'drag and brake' and that Government would not carry into effect what they had promised. I do not think, Sir, that there is any justification for any pessimism or despair of this kind. The Government of India have not been oblivious of their obligations with regard to the promotion of research. The Honourable gentleman himself has mentioned three institutions, namely, the Institute of Science at Bangalore, the Agricultural Institute at Pusa and the Forest Institute at Dehra. He has admitted that the Government of India give a very handsome grant every year to the Institute of Science at Bangalore. He has also admitted that large sums are spent on the institutions at Dehra and Pusa. He has given voice to a complaint that at Pusa and Dehra sufficient opportunities are not given to Indian students for training in methods of research. I am not personally acquainted with the most recent developments in these two institutions and I would leave it on some future occasion to my friend the Honourable Member for Revenue and Agriculture to defend himself with regard to those two institutions. But I have had something to do with the relations between the Government of India and the Institute of Science at Bangalore and I can assure the Honourable gentleman that the Government of India are most anxious that that institution should be utilised to the very best advantage by Indian students and every possible help that the Government of India can give in the matter has been given and will be given in the future. The Honourable gentleman has instanced the case of the Columbia University where, he said, several crores of rupees are spent, whereas all over India we spend only a very small sum. It is quite true, Sir, that the benefactions devoted to Education and Research in the United States are really magnificent, but, Sir, it is well to bear in mind that most of those foundations depend on private benefactions. I have been over the Columbia University and I have also been over the University belonging to the City of New York. I have very great admiration for both those institutions, but so far as I could learn, they were dependent practically indeed almost entirely on private benefactions and on grants from local bodies like the Corporation of the City of New York. I do hope, Sir, that Mr. Raju's Resolution and this debate will bring forward more private benefactions in these causes than we have had hitherto. I do not depreciate the endowments that have already been made by wealthy Indians in the cause of education and research. We have the Bangalore Institute in mind, and we have many more institutions like the Bose Institute in Calcutta and the Science College in Calcutta, and many other institutions all over India, but we want a great many more. I wish that my countrymen would realise that these things cannot all be provided merely by the State; that they must also come and aid the country in proper development in all directions. Apart from the institutions which Mr. Raju mentioned, there are others also devoted to research, which Government have helped from time to time. There is, as I mentioned just now, the Bose Research Institute in Calcutta to which the Central Government make an annual grant. Then, Sir, I think the House is aware from the speeches that were made on previous occasions that there is the Indian Medical Research Association, which is doing most valuable work in the field of medical research, to which the Government of India make a very handsome annual grant. Then in the pre-Reform days, when the Government of India could help the universities, in the days of peace and plenty, as some one remarked the other day, very large sums were given in aid of university education and post-graduate studies in different universities, and we hope that a very large proportion of those grants were devoted to purposes of research. The Honourable Members of the House are also aware that Government are making efforts to establish a School of Mines and Geology. There also it is hoped that a certain amount of the work of the staff, as well as of the students, will be devoted to research purposes in order to assist in the development of the mineral resources of the country.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): When will it come into existence?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: I think you will know at Budget time. Honourable Members are also aware that as one of the results of the recommendations of the Industrial Commission, a committee was appointed under the presidency of a distinguished scientist from England to go into the question of chemical research in India. That Committee made certain recommendations. I do not say the recommendations have been carried out, but I am mentioning this just to indicate that the Government of India have not lost sight of the importance of this subject in relation to industrial development. Then again, Sir, with regard to the training of scholars abroad, perhaps the House is not aware that there are already a number of scholarships given by the Central Government or by Provincial Governments for research in languages such as Sanskrit and Arabic. Then, even among the ordinary scholarships given at present by Provincial Governments to students for training in England, a number are given in order to train these students in methods of research in foreign countries. I may instance the case of Dr. Dhar, who is now a distinguished professor in Allahabad, a pupil of Sir Prafulla Chandra Ray, who was trained abroad in chemical research as a Government scholar. Then, Sir, the Committee presided over by the Earl of Lytton, of which my distinguished friend opposite was a Member, went into this subject, and if you will look at Appendix IV of their report, you will find that there are already quite a number of Indian students doing research work in foreign countries.

I find that the number of scholars who are given there as doing only research work comes to about 28. They are conducting research in such various subjects as Economics, the English language, History, Mathematics, Moral Sciences, Natural Sciences and Oriental languages. I may mention that there are at least 12 Indians who are now undertaking research in Natural Sciences in Great Britain and 9 Indians doing research work in Oriental languages. It is clear, therefore, Sir, that a good deal is already being done. I do not say that more could not be done but we are confronted with the present financial position of the Government of India. I am glad, Sir, that the Honourable Member has recognised that fact by the addition that he has suggested to-day in the Resolution proposed by him. The financial position of the country is well known to all Members of this House and it is not for me to emphasise that point. I can only mention, Sir, that it is on account of these financial difficulties that the Government of India have not been able to proceed with the recommendations made by the Chemical Services Committee; it is on account of these financial difficulties that we cannot develop the School of Mines and Geology as fast as we should like to do; it is on account of these financial difficulties that we have had to postpone a project for the establishment of an institution in Calcutta which would have absorbed the present institution for research in Tanning maintained by the Government of Bengal. Honourable Members of this House are aware that we are now undertaking an inquiry for rigorous retrenchment in every direction, not merely for economy but for rigorous retrenchment. In these circumstances, Sir, although we have every sympathy with the Honourable gentleman's aspirations and wishes, and as I hope I have indicated that all my sympathies are with him, we can only hope for better times to come when effect can be given to these ideas and to the principle of this Resolution. I have dealt with the principle of the Resolution only. The Honourable Member himself has said that so far as the details are concerned they must be left to later judgment, to fuller consideration both by the Government and by this Assembly when the time and the occasion arise. I hope, Sir, I have explained that the Government have every sympathy with the Resolution which the Honourable Member has placed before the House, but we cannot give effect to the proposal immediately; we can do so and we shall do so as soon as funds permit.

Mr. Deputy President: I think it will be better if we take the first amendment at this stage.

Sardar Gulab Singh (West Punjab: Sikh): Sir, I rise to support the Resolution so ably moved by my Honourable friend Mr. Raju. The cause which he has advocated is the noblest one possible, and the country stands in great need of encouragement to improve its industrial condition as the natural resources of India which are many could not be utilised to their utmost without having experts or specialists. I beg to withdraw the amendment that stands in my name in the list of business as the Honourable Mover of the Resolution himself has removed the defect in the original Resolution by the necessary additions of the words 'as funds are available'. I hope that this Honourable House will accept the Resolution as it stands amended.

Mr. Deputy President: I would request the Honourable Member in future if he wants to withdraw his amendment under the Standing Orders merely to say 'I withdraw the amendment that stands in my name.'

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, we rejoice that the spirit of the Government reply is sympathetic. That certainly will conduce to early disposal of this motion so far as the academic side of it, if I may so call it, is concerned. The Honourable Mr. Chatterjee has deprecated the current of pessimism underlying the speech of the Mover of the proposal. But in his heart of hearts, does not Mr. Chatterjee feel that there is more than room for pessimism in this concern that has been given expression to to-day and much more than that? I happen to know, Sir, that he feels as keenly as any one of us in this Assembly or outside, with regard to the utter lack of facilities in these directions. As Secretary in another Department not primarily connected with education, he did all he could to further research work connected with Commerce and Industries. I join again in the tribute that Mr. Raju has paid to his single-hearted devotion to educational advance in connection with commerce and industries and we welcome his advancement. I welcome his reply from another point of view, namely, that the recommendations of the Lytton Committee's Report are not likely to be adversely received by the Government, although he has taken good care to keep the expression of that sentiment from the Assembly; read between the lines, I believe that the recommendations have commended themselves to the Government here and in England. Mr. Chatterjee referred to the schedule of Research students in the Report. In Government parlance, which no Secretary or Honourable Member can avoid when he has been in Government environments for a fairly long time, he asked the Assembly to believe that quite a large number of research students are doing good work in England and that a good deal of work is being done there. I do not propose to talk shop at length, because I have had a good deal to do with this Report. But I may give the Assembly some figures which will enable them to see what quite a large number and a good deal in Government parlance means. This is undoubtedly a nation-building Resolution to which no one can demur and from which no one can differ, at all events so far as what is called showing sympathy is concerned. The whole point of the Lytton Committee's recommendations is that if India is to advance, if the Reforms are to be at all successful, India must be educationally self-contained and Mr. Raju's Resolution and Mr. Samarth's Resolution now on the shelf for more than 12 months will be one of the first steps towards the attainment of that ideal. I shall take some subjects—important subjects, that I suppose the Legislature would first consider in connection with Mr. Raju's recommendation, if accepted, when the question of choice of subjects for the proposed scholarships comes before them. In Dyeing, what is this large number spoken of by Mr. Chatterjee studying in England?—2. In Mining—8. Mr. Chatterjee will bear me out that in connection with some recent appointments relating to mining with which he and I had to do, our greatest difficulty was that we had not properly trained men out here and therefore the go by had to be given to most of the men on the spot because they had not had enough training abroad.

In Leather Manufacture the figure is 6. If this Research Institute in Calcutta that Mr. Chatterjee spoke of is ever to come, how many of these 6 will be available for work there and would even all the six be enough? In Metallurgy, upon which one of the most important key industries of the country must always depend, we had the tremendous number—1. In Naval Architecture—1. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is here and he will appreciate how much towards the naval defence of the country we are going to contribute with that one solitary single student studying Naval Architecture, whatever that may mean, in England.

And, Sir, in Oceanography we have 1. A largely growing subject in India with its tremendous ocean frontage which we shall not know how to defend when the time comes—one is studying. I hear a voice crying out "Nature will defend us." God be praised and Nature be thanked!

In Pottery, in which India can do any amount of good and useful work we have 2. And in Town-planning, which we hear of everywhere all over India the figure is 1. I do not say these are all suitable subjects and that there are not more. On the other hand, we have scholarships in Phonetics, in scientific study of the Languages, in what is called Natural Philosophy, that is mostly ordinary Physics and Chemistry, suitable for college work. We have all that, but we want a great deal more and something better. The question must be as to whether the work of co-ordination should not be undertaken and undertaken in a way that Mr. Raju's and Mr. Samarth's Resolutions suggest. Sir, I do not wish to labour the matter, but I welcome the Resolution and the spirit in which the Government is giving it its support as an earnest of recognition of what the Lytton Committee has insistently demanded—that India shall be educationally self-contained and the men who can contribute towards that must be trained abroad. Mr. Raju has been just out of the country. I am glad he has seen for himself what education abroad, particularly in research, can do. I quite appreciate that men, coming back with the newest ideas on research work and the newest methods, coming and seeking appointments in the Education or some other Department either as glorified clerks or as Assistant Secretaries are not properly placed. But whose fault is it? It is as much the fault of the Government as of the people that capital resources and co-ordination of arrangement are not forthcoming. Government has made itself responsible in various matters with regard to that, which need not be detailed here, and facilities are wanted for people who come back. This fact must not be lost sight of. I am glad, Sir, the amendment for reduction of the number of scholarships is not going to be pressed because 25 after all, even when they come, will not be at all too large a number for all India. Mr. Samarth's Resolution has been referred to. We do not know what is going to happen to it. We have been referred to the provinces with regard to the provincial subjects. Probably that is technically right. But what is happening in the provinces now? With their attenuated university resources, with their tremendous 5½ lakh cuts in educational grants, the provinces will not be able for a long while to do much. I do not say the government resources here are plentiful, but when asked for a paltry five lakhs of rupees as the first step towards nation-building processes, the Government of India's obligations cannot be ignored either by the Auditor General or by the Member for Finance or Education. We have got to make a beginning and an earnest beginning and a beginning at once, and if this Resolution is now accepted, I hope it will not meet the same fate as Mr. Samarth's Resolution action on which has been pending for the past 12 months and over. I think these matters ought to be taken up in the spirit in which Mr. Chatterjee has spoken to-day and not treated in the way in which Mr. Samarth's Resolution has been so long.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

Dr. Hand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the former part of the speech of the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee was very encouraging. The Government should be thanked for their very sincere sympathy with this motion no doubt. But I am very sorry to see that the Honourable

[Dr. Nand Lal.]

Mr. Chatterjee told us that there is a lack of funds and consequently he is unable to say when practical effect will be given to this motion. With reference to those remarks I feel bound to address the House. Sir, this is a question of education. I think the whole country and this House especially will be very glad to provide any sum for this most desirable enterprise. We want research in India and a number of scholars are quite ready to undertake that work. I think it will not be right to give this answer that we had better wait, because the money is not available. Money is being spent for a good many other matters and affairs. The question of culture, I mean to say, the question of education, industrial and scientific development, is not a whit less important than those matters, and those affairs, in which money is being spent. If this proposition may be accepted, then I believe the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee will be pleased to concede that immediate effect should be given to the spirit of this Resolution.

Mr. H. M. Samarth (Bombay : Nominated Non-Official): Not the letter?

Dr. Nand Lal: With these remarks, I support the motion which has been so very ably moved.

Mr. Deputy President: What about your amendments?

Dr. Nand Lal: I withdraw all the amendments in the light of the discussion which we have had on the motion.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division : Non-Muhammadan): Let the question be now put.

Mr. Deputy President: Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala.

(Cries of "Withdraw.")

Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala (Agra Division : Non-Muhammadan Rural): I simply want to say a few words in support of the Resolution. (Cries of "Withdraw.") Will the Honourable Members allow me to speak?

Mr. Deputy President: Does the Honourable Member wish to move his amendment?

Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: I want to support the motion which is before the House and not the amendment. Sir, I had no intention really of moving my amendment, nor do I move it. But I simply wanted to support the Resolution. I am thankful to the Government for giving us the assurances, but I wish to say a few words in regard to them. The Honourable Mr. Chatterjee has told us that scholarships have been granted for research work—in what?—in Arabic in England and other places, in Sanskrit—where?—in Germany, and in philosophy and so forth. But I wish to know what good those scholarship holders can do to the country when they come back. I want research work on the technical and mechanical lines. I want our Indian young men to be able to manufacture in India, as I have said before, aeroplanes, steamships, motor cars, spinning and weaving mills, machinery, electrical goods and also those articles which we have now to bring from other countries, and thus to make India a self-contained India. We do not want too many poets in Arabic and in Sanskrit. We do not want to count how many words appear in a particular book and so forth. I submit that the work which has been done so far by the Government on these lines is not conducive to the good of India. Further, I suggest that the Government will, at the time of making the selection, see that first class boys are sent up and not second class boys. At the same time, I hope that Government will see with clear glasses and not with coloured glasses that an opportunity is given not to only one section of the community. Of course, I do not want to bind the Government in any way, but when other things are equal, I hope that considerations of communities and castes will not be totally ignored. I have already said that I do not want to move my amendment and I simply support the Resolution as it stands, in the light of the remarks which have been made in the House.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the following Resolution be adopted:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that 25 scholarships, each tenable for five years at about Rs. 4,000 per head per annum eventually costing not more than five lakhs annually, be given year after year from the Imperial revenues, as funds are available, to Indians of great promise specially for research work in any part of the world and in any branch of knowledge approved by the Central Legislature."

The motion was adopted.

RESOLUTION RE SUPPLY OF FACILITIES TO ENABLE MEMBERS OF LEGISLATURES TO DISCHARGE THEIR PUBLIC DUTIES.

Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha (Gaya cum Monghyr: Non-Muhamadan): Sir, I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that all the Government officials should furnish every Member of the Assembly with all the necessary informations with full particulars and give all the facilities towards the discharge of their public duties."

The Resolution demands that Government officials should be required to furnish information with necessary details to the Honourable Members of this House relating to any matter of public welfare and utility and give them facilities towards the discharge of their public duties. The demand, Sir, I think is a very reasonable one and if accepted by the House is calculated to do immense good to both the Government and the public and further lessen and lighten the task of the Council. The mass outside have sent us as representatives to this body and expect that we would conscientiously discharge our responsibilities. They also expect that we would not be failing to take up their right cause whenever occasion arose and that we should keep strict watch over their rights and interests wherever they are in danger of being jeopardized. In addition to the responsibilities which we owe to our constituencies, we are further bound by oath to be faithful to His Majesty the King-Emperor and to faithfully discharge our trust in the welfare of both the rulers and the ruled.

[Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha.]

Our position therefore is a very delicate one and if we are to be honest and faithful Legislators we ought to be true and loyal both to the Government and to our constituents. But, Sir, this is not possible until and unless we enjoy the confidence of both the parties. There can, however, be no doubt in the constituents' reposing their unconditional and entire confidence in us as this has amply been proved by the fact that they have chosen us to represent their cause in the Assembly here. Now remains the question of the Government's confiding in us and this requires to be settled. I am afraid I am not able to enunciate the policy of the Government in this respect. If there is some doubt in it, it would be anomalous for the Government to expect our confidence in them without their confiding in us. Mutual trust is a source of great pleasure and satisfaction and it is mutual trust we demand and demand not unreasonably. As representatives and trustees of the people and confidantes of the Government we claim to be supplied with all information relating to a public matter, and if it is absolutely necessary in the benefit of mutual interest that the officers and servants of Government should, whenever required, allow us, the representatives of the country, to know what is being done for the public and facilitate our inquiries by enlightening us on necessary details.

It has always been seen that strict secrecy is maintained on behalf of the officials over matters of grave importance and nobody is allowed to know the real details. As a result of this, matters drift from bad to worse and ultimately the whole blame is thrown on the Government, rightly or wrongly it is for those to judge who are in the know. Blame to Government or discredit to the officials, the result is all the same and it is that the mass outside have to suffer. It becomes calumnious and goes a great way towards shaking the faith of the people in the Government. I am not a believer in the fact that the Government do wrong always, but the best of their motives are even dyed black by this attitude of studied secrecy maintained towards the people and their representatives.

During the strike over the East Indian Railway last year which was said to have sprung out as a result of an alleged assault of a European on an Indian fireman, I am informed by one of our Honourable friends that he devoted full 24 hours in running from Moghalsarai to Tundla in order to find out the real clue of the strike, but his attempt failed totally. No one gave him any information about it. None of the railway officers or employees at the intervening stations dared to give him any information relating to the strike, as they were probably afraid of furnishing such information lest their higher authorities would get offended. Now, I represent the people of Monghyr and the big workshop of the East Indian Railway Company located at Jamalpore is only a distance of about 6 miles from the place. There were troubles at Jamalpore owing to the strike, and a great exhibition of Military force was made at the railway station, but I, a representative of the people, living only next door, was never consulted. There is no denying the fact that situations could have been saved by intervention of popular leaders, but no recourse has ever been taken to this device. We are kept in the dark and the officials do not care to give us any information in the absence of any orders of the Government.

There are numerous examples and it would be needless to make mention of them here, but I must say that if the Government only trusted us and allowed us to know what we wanted to know, a vast amount of their responsibility would have been transferred to our shoulders and we would have helped to bring about a speedy and happy settlement in troublous matters. The fact of our being in the know would do much to dispel the doubts of many who, possibly, getting influenced by the harrowing and grossly exaggerated stories published in the Press, are losing faith in the present form of administration.

I know, Sir, that we have a great responsibility before the public we represent and the public has also got a right to inquire of us as to what we are doing for them and the country. If we are ourselves to remain in total darkness, how can we be expected to throw light on others. It is therefore a matter of absolute necessity that the Honourable Members of this House should be acquainted with all the facts and figures available only in the offices of the Government here and elsewhere, in the districts and in the provinces.

Sir, in order to enable us to discharge our onerous duties and the honest functions that have been imposed on us and entrusted to our care by our countrymen and the public as also by the Government, the Government must assist us and facilitate our cause.

With these few words I conclude and I hope the Resolution will meet with an unanimous support of the House.

Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah (Bhagalpore Division: Muhammadan): (The Honourable Member spoke in the Vernacular:*)

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): The Mover of this Resolution put his case forward mainly on the ground that we do not sufficiently trust the Members of this Assembly; he said that his own position and that of his friends was difficult; that they had a duty to discharge towards their constituents and towards the public, and that we give them no assistance in the discharge of it. How does he propose to supply that deficiency? We having apparently failed in our duty, having failed, answered questions directed to us, and having never put Members of this Assembly on the way to receive the information that they require, how does he propose to gain it? He would have us order all Government officials to furnish him and other Members of the Assembly with all necessary information. That is how the proposition starts. Its effects have been well illustrated in the speech of Miyan Asjad-ul-lah. He told us that village officers make great mistakes,—frequently act against the law; he considers that it would be well if Members of this Assembly had authority from Government to interfere with such village officers, and see that they do not break the law. He desires again that when he requires information from any Government office it should be immediately given. He tells me that if I desired to do my duty conscientiously I should immediately accept this Resolution; nay, more, I ought really to have initiated the measure myself. If I have to decline that invitation I have to do so mainly on the ground of practicability; for it is no use considering a principle unless you can translate it into practice; and it is no use issuing rules if they are a dead letter the minute they are printed. Now, it is impossible for us to issue any such instructions to the servants of Local Governments. Let us assume for a minute that such instructions were issued and they were disobeyed; or assume again—and it is no very wide assumption—that in reply to a demand for

* The original speech and a translation of it will be printed in a later issue of these Debates.

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

information the servants of a Local Government were to supply information so inaccurate and misleading that a Member of this Assembly would, if he took action on it here, stand in a very false position before the public. What power should we have to bring such officers to book? None at all. It is perfectly true that we are entitled to call upon Local Government for information; but we must obtain that information ourselves from Local Governments. We are not entitled to enter into direct relations with their employees. That is one difficulty. There is an even greater difficulty. Some of the Local Government's servants belong to Transferred Departments. We have no authority under the Devolution Rules for interfering even with the Local Government in a Transferred subject. The House will remember that on a well-known occasion, Parliament itself decided that it would not be right for it to interfere directly with Transferred Subjects. So much so then for the possibility of our issuing a Regulation of this nature in regard to the servants of Local Governments. There are however a large number of servants employed by us direct. We have Government servants in areas which we directly administer, Delhi and the North-West Frontier Province, and we have Postal servants, Telegraph servants and State Railway servants and the like. I take their case also on the ground of practicability. Now, it is clear that you cannot ask a Government servant to discuss orders that have been given to him by a superior, not even for the sake of earning the greater confidence of the Legislative Assembly, could we as a Government, or could indeed any other Government, allow a procedure so destructive of discipline? Then again, it is not reasonable to depend on inquiries made from any such subordinate servants in regard to facts. They do not see the whole of them; their individual information may frequently be misleading. Thirdly, and this is even more important—it is not fair to ask a subordinate Government servant to judge whether that information is confidential or not. It would place on him an unfair responsibility, since his use of it might subsequently bring him into discredit with his superiors. There are obviously therefore very substantial grounds why no such instructions should be issued to the servants whom we directly employ in the Central Government. Of course

4 P.M. it is true the Honourable Member might demand that he should be allowed to call upon the head of a Department for the information he requires. If he were allowed to do so, he would practically be using the same agency as we use ourselves, but with this difference; if on an inquiry that we make from the head of a Department we consider that his answer is misleading or insufficient, then we see that he completes it, and in the result it is we who stand responsible for that answer to the Legislative Assembly. The House will now, I hope, agree that I have brought my argument to reconciliation of practice and principle. If, as I claim, our present practice is the only procedure practicable, I claim also that it undoubtedly coincides with the true constitutional position. Members of this Legislature are in direct relation with Government and not with Government employees; and the measure of the success with which they discharge their duties to the public, is the extent to which they influence us directly or indirectly in this Assembly. I know of no country with Parliamentary institutions which has regulations such as the Honourable Member would desire to see enforced. I believe that nowhere is it laid down that Members of the Legislatures are entitled to enter into direct relations with the employees of the Executive Government. I believe that everywhere the practice is that where information is desired, it is obtained from Government itself, and for a very good reason; the information that is sought must be complete, and must be such that Government is prepared to be responsible for it, and for which the Legislature can take Government to task if it proves unsatisfactory or unreliable. For these reasons I think that the proposal of the Honourable Member is not only unpractical but also undesirable from the constitutional point of view; and if I fail to comply with his invitation to show greater confidence in Members of this Assembly in this respect, I do so on substantial grounds; for I believe that such a measure as he desires would be unwise from every point of view.

Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: On hearing the reply of the Honourable the Home Member I beg permission, Sir, to withdraw my Resolution.

The Resolution was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

RESOLUTION RE KING'S COMMISSIONS FOR INDIANS.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move the following Resolution:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

In moving this Resolution, Sir, the first thing I want is that Honourable Members of this Honourable House may not misunderstand my motive in moving this Resolution. I am not actuated by any racial feeling; I do not wish to in any way minimise the great services rendered to the Indian Army by the British officers for a very long time past. British officers in India have played a great part in teaching discipline to the Indian army and in maintaining peace and order in the country. The great quality of a Britisher of knowing his duty is well known to all Members of this Honourable House, and the whole House, I hope, will agree with me and will support me in appreciating the services which British officers have been rendering to India. They have taught such good discipline that the fruits of it were found on the battlefields of France, Mesopotamia, Palestine, South Africa, China and other places. British officers have led the Indian troops in a remarkable way, and they have won great fame for the Indian army. So I do not want in any way, as I said in the beginning, to minimise the services of British officers. My motive in moving this Resolution is a totally different one. My first object is to try and get the stigma which attaches to Indian soldiers as a class removed. This is, I suppose, the only country where we have got regiments from a civilized country and from martial races officered by men of other nations. Indian officers have played a great part and they have shown great capacity in many a field and they have proved that they can be capable officers. If such officers who have distinguished themselves in the army are promoted only up to the rank of a Lieutenant or in rare cases, to that of a Honorary Captain, I think it is not doing justice to them; it will mean that their services are not properly appreciated. Indian soldiers and Indian regiments have won battles for the Empire and it was through Indian hands and Indian soldiers that success was achieved for the British Army in countries like Mesopotamia and Palestine. I think, Sir, that when Indians have proved themselves so worthy as soldiers of the Empire, they deserve better treatment and their services should be properly appreciated and recognised and in a more liberal manner. In India we have got a particular class from among whom men are recruited for the army. It had been for a long time considered that the Indians who come to join the Army are illiterate people and they could not go above a certain status. Now, I find from that very class of people and among them there are a good many people who are very well educated. The sons of soldiers, the sons of Viceroy's Commissioned officers are very well educated now. They are receiving their education in public schools, in universities and they can be very efficient officers, if they get a commission from the King. They have got a martial spirit. They have got a tendency. They have got behind them the spirit of centuries. A son of a soldier comes to join the Army and probably the same regiment to which his father belonged. And it is happening in most cases and there is no reason why; if a sufficient number of young men can be found from amongst these people, they should not be given King's Commissions and their status should be limited to getting a Viceroy's Commission only. I think that great liberality should be shown towards these people and they deserve it. Up to now, Sir, one difficulty that was the foremost difficulty was that among the martial classes educated people could not be found and that I have explained that difficulty is being removed every day. Even if that difficulty had not been removed, was not going away by itself, it was the duty of the State to provide proper education in recognition of the services of these soldier classes so that they may be properly educated and they may be trained after the manner of their forefathers. Indian regiments were recruited in the time of the East India Company in this way. The Indian regiments of the East India Company had Indian officers among them but a certain incident—unfortunate incident which happened in 1857 took away the confidence we had in the Indian officers of the Indian regiments, and a policy was pursued after that of keeping proper control over the soldiers. And that policy was pursued on account of this that, if the officers were Europeans, they would properly control and there would be a safeguard for the East India Company or afterwards for the Crown too. I dare say, Sir, that that may not be the solitary fact, that may not have been the only guiding factor in adopting that policy. It might have been that the East India Company wanted to train their soldiers after the manner of European discipline and they imported British officers from England to train the soldiers on those lines. But times have changed since then. Now, we find in India many young men who go and receive education in England. They have received education in European style, and this has been widespread in India for the last three decades at least and a sufficient number of young men are available who can be trained like British young men are trained at Sandhurst. In this way, Sir, I have been saying that for some time past His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has shown some liberalism in getting King's Commissions for Indians in a larger proportion than used to be the case formerly and India is thankful to him for that. But I should say, Sir, that the number in which the Indians are getting to-day is not sufficient and that is not satisfying my conscience. My object in moving this Resolution is that there ought to be two bodies of army organisation in India, one purely the British Army and the other purely Indian Army. The Indian Army should be officered by Indian officers only and the British regiment should be officered by British officers. and I will not in any way go beyond what circumstances will permit. I quite realise that India at present depends largely on British assistance and British control in this country. If the British left to-day, there will be anarchy in India. But though we may not be able to defend our shores, though we may not be able to defend our frontiers, I want that Indians should receive proper education and proper training to defend their country, and the best course of doing it would be by giving effect to the Resolution which I am proposing. My Resolution, Sir, has been misunderstood in some quarters. I found some discussion in the press which is due to a misunderstanding of my Resolution altogether. My object is not that if a vacancy falls in the regiment of the rank of a Colonel, a new Indian should be brought there and appointed a Colonel or a Major or even a Captain or even a Second-Lieutenant to-day. My object in moving this Resolution is that officers of the Indian regiment should be limited now. Particular offices should be reserved for the Indian Army, and I suppose that is so, unless they are changed from the British Army. But there should be no change from the British Army. The officers who are reserved for the Indian regiments must stick to the Indian regiments. Suppose there is a vacancy in the rank of Colonel. Of course, a Major, ipso facto either in this very regiment or from the other regiment, whoever is senior, will take his place and will be promoted to the rank of Colonel. People from below will take their precedence and will have promotion. Now, the only vacancy in this way will be that of a Second-Lieutenant or a Lieutenant, and this should be filled by an Indian. All the vacancies which will occur as Second-Lieutenant in the Indian Army should be filled by properly trained Indian officers. I propose in this Resolution that Indians should be given King's Commissions in such number that they may fill all those vacancies which may occur as Second-Lieutenants in future. Now, Sir, by this process, if I am not wrong, as far as my information goes, it takes 22 years to become a Colonel—it may be something more than 22 years, it may be 24 or 26 years, but whatever period it takes, after that time, these Indian regiments will be officered by Indian officers only. So, if effect is given to my Resolution to-day, it will take at least 22 years from now to Indianise the Indian regiments only. In this way there will be no harm, and when we have got the reformed Councils, when we have got the statutory period fixed at ten years for revision which, of course, the Government have acceded to curtail sometime ago according to the debates in the Assembly—then, Sir, if it had been for ten years we would have known how much progress India has made towards getting its own army. In ten years probably we would have had all the Captains in the Indian regiments Indians, and only Majors and Colonels would be by that time British officers, but by slow process they would be replaced by Indian officers. There is another safeguard. I know that it might be argued that the English character—British character—when I use the expression “English” I hope the House will understand me to include in it the Scotch and Irish as well (A Voice: “How Irish?”)—will have to be preserved. The British character will continue and all the officers will give these young men proper education, and these young men who will come there as Second-Lieutenants will be associating with the British officers and will receive the same training as the British officers in the same regiments and preserve the British character. The same discipline will continue and that will be purely after the English style. After that period, there will be a great saving in the Indian regiment. Now, in the Indian regiments we have got a double system of officers. We have got King's Commissioned officers and Viceroy's Commissioned officers, a double system of Commissioned officers. I do not see what is the use of having two systems, two kinds of officers. The Indian officers are simply kept to help the British officers, or their chief work is, I understand, simply to get recruits. In British regiments we have not got this double system. They have got the non-commissioned officers which we have got in the

[Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan.]

Indian regiments as well, but these Viceroy's Commissioned officers are simply there for show, or to give help to these King's Commissioned officers. If effect is given, after 22 years we shall have only one kind of officers, and probably before that comes, once we have got all the Captains and Lieutenants in the Indian regiments Indians, then there will be no necessity to keep a risaldar major or risaldar or other officer of lower rank. Those people who will come as such will bring recruits or there might be a certain percentage in every regiment appointed as a recruiting officer. Now, Sir, I think that will be a great saving in the Indian revenue and the Indian Army will be able to stand by itself. This will not affect in any way the position of British regiments in India. The point which has been argued and which might be argued on behalf of the Government that there is always a fear of breach of the peace might be removed too. Last year in the Budget speech His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief said and that gave rise to a lot of criticism in this House that it would take years and years to get the Indian Army. Of course I am not going into controversial matter and I do not wish to revive the same discussion to-day. I do not wish to move this Resolution in that spirit but I wish to move this Resolution in the spirit in which I have spoken to-day. There used to be one bogey. Every time there was a question of Indianisation of the Indian Army the Afghan bogey was put forward and there is the question of Bolshevic Russia. The Afghan bogey is no more. We have got no fear from those quarters. There is a treaty settled with the Afghan King and Afghan Government is a peaceful ally of the Indian Government. Bolshevic Russia is far removed. I think even if those questions were present to-day, my Resolution would not affect them because this would not bring in any sweeping change. This would not bring a change in a day or two, in a year or two but it will bring a change certainly after more than 20 years. Then, Sir, riots may take place in India like those in Malabar. For the purpose of keeping down such things, there might be a strong British army, if that British army is really required in the strength in which it is kept. That is a question on which I do not wish to dwell because that question is covered by another Resolution of mine, which is not for discussion to-day. We find that the regiments which were employed in Malabar were mostly Gurkhas and other Indian regiments too. So I can say that Indian regiments can always be safely trusted to deal with situations like that and there is no reason not to trust the Indian officers who would be trained in the British style and according to the traditions of British regiments. This is, Sir, my chief motive in moving this Resolution, and I think, Sir, and I hope that it will meet favourably from the Government party, and I hope and I think this is not such a request which may be not granted. I hope His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief will see his way, knowing the need of the country and the object for which I wish to move this Resolution and what is my idea, to accept it.

Mr. Deputy President: Resolution moved:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: Sir, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words in reference to this Resolution. The Government are well aware that Members of the Legislatures, and indeed an even wider circle of political opinion in India, are deeply interested in this very important problem. I can assure you that the Government have taken, and are taking, an equally keen interest in it, though circumstances have so far not made it possible to make a definite announcement with regard to the matter or to state the measures that are in contemplation in order to secure the object which the Honourable Member has in view. From statements already made in this House Honourable Members are aware that the Government is still not able to set on foot any specific scheme of Indianization, or even to say really now when this will be possible. It is hoped, however, that it will be possible to make an announcement at no very distant date when the correspondence which is still proceeding between the Government of India and the Secretary of State has been concluded. The correspondence has been prolonged, and the consideration given to the matter has been very thorough, as indeed the importance of this matter deserves. The Resolution does not therefore deal with any new proposal but with one which has already been very fully explored. In these circumstances, it will be clear that it would not be open to the Government to accept the Resolution as it stands, since they cannot prejudge a matter which is still under discussion. On the other hand, the Resolution is not unwelcome, since it gives me an opportunity of placing before the House some at any rate of the considerations on which a decision must ultimately depend, and also of stating in their proper relation the measures which the Government have already undertaken to grant His Majesty's Commission to Indians. Now I presume it is thoroughly understood by every Member of this House that Indianization is a process which relates only to the Indian Army. I am not sure that there has not been in certain quarters some misunderstanding in this respect. Indianization is in no way connected with the British units which serve in India or with the question of reducing their numbers. The question of Indianization arises only in regard to a specific portion of the Army in India, namely, the Indian Army, and the object in view is, primarily, the replacement of British Officers of the Indian Army by Indian Officers holding King's Commissions.

Now, before I go any further I want to say that you cannot expect me as Commander-in-Chief in India to view with unmixed feelings the possibility of eliminating the British Officer from the Indian Army. Whatever may happen in the future, if India is in the end able to do without the British Officer in the numbers that have hitherto been employed, Honourable Members of this House and I hope also a much wider circle will recognise the inestimable value of the services which the British Officer has rendered to India in the past and of the conspicuous part that he has played in building up and consolidating the Indian Army, an army of which the people of India have every reason to be proud. The Indian Army has a traditional reputation for efficiency and reliability which is I think universally acknowledged. It will be unnecessary for me to dilate on their heroism, their self-sacrifice; for Honourable Members all know the great achievements of the Indian Army before the great war, during the great war and since the great war, both in India and overseas. And if any testimony as to the share which the British Officer has had in these achievements were required, it would be, I know, readily forthcoming from the most authoritative quarter possible, namely, from the Indian Officers and the Indian soldiers themselves. To me one of the happiest and most striking features of the British Raj in India is the respect, unquestioning obedience and, I would add, the genuine affection which for many years his Indian comrades have invariably given to the British Officer of the Indian Army. I should not do justice to anyone, least of all to the representatives of the people of India if I did not at the very least pay this tribute to the order which the Resolution of my Honourable friend apparently seeks to change. Now, it would be idle to ignore, on the other hand, the desire for change that comes very naturally with changing times, and I can readily understand that as the people of India claim increasing independence they should also claim increasing opportunities to fit themselves for self-defence. A desire that the Indian Army should be Indianized follows as a natural sequence, and Government, as I have already said, have for a considerable time recognized that a demand of this kind is inevitable and they have spent much time and pains in investigating the best means of assisting the people of India to realize their ambition without at the same time sacrificing even for a time the traditional efficiency of the Indian Army. It goes without saying that even in the transitional stage it will be essential to preserve the country's means of defence efficient and unimpaired. This is the first and the greatest difficulty of the problem before the Government. An efficient army is composed of intensely human factors, one of the chief of which is an inherent dislike for violent changes. A change of this nature which would rapidly eliminate a large number of British Officers would certainly be a violent one. Obviously a step of this kind would best be taken when the skies are clear and the process of transformation undisturbed by the presence of dangers either external or internal. And I need hardly remind the House that ever since the end of the great war India has never wholly been free from some form of external or internal menace. Neither of the difficulties which I have mentioned, however, have discouraged the Government from attacking the issue. And what I wish here to emphasise is that, while larger schemes have been maturing, definite measures have been taken to secure the grant of King's Commissions to individual Indians who are suitable and qualified. The first results of our efforts to secure suitable candidates for Sandhurst were not very encouraging. The number of Indian boys who came forward in itself was small and very few of them were found to have reached the standard of educational and physical fitness which are required to qualify a candidate for the first stage of a military career. It will probably interest the House to learn in some detail the steps which the Government have taken to overcome these difficulties. The story is one of steady and continuous progress. In the first instance, during the war and since, 371 Honorary King's Commissions have been granted mainly as war rewards to Indian Officers holding the Viceroy's Commission in the Indian Army. In addition to these, there are now some 66 Indian Officers holding the full King's Commission and serving in the Regular Indian Army, or doing the normal period of attachment with a British regiment, which is required of every officer, whether British or Indian, before he joins the Indian Army. Of these latter some were originally in the Imperial Cadet Corps and were commissioned from the Indian land forces. Others were commissioned from the Cadet College established during the war as a temporary measure at Indore; others were again promoted from Viceroy's Commissions and others have been commissioned after a regular course of training at Sandhurst. In addition to these, there are at present some 28 Indian Cadets under training in the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, who, if successful, will shortly qualify for King's Commissions. But we have dug the foundations even deeper than this. In order to enable Indian boys who desire to enter the Army to acquire the qualifications for admission to Sandhurst we have, as this House is well aware, established the Prince of Wales Royal Indian Military College at Dehra Dun. At the present moment there are 88 boys in residence in the College and by April 1923 I hope there will be 70 boys. The report on the first term's work of the Dehra Dun College was distributed to Members of the Legislature and I have only recently received a report on the working of the second term, the contents of which are most satisfactory. I should like to quote you a few passages from this Report. It says:

"The lines on which the cadets have been organised into sections and also into divisions for studies, have proved eminently satisfactory and will be continued. The Cadet Captain and Section Commander are with experience realising their responsibility, acquiring an aptitude for command and have carried out their duties in a manner which does them credit. The continuance of this system will, it is hoped, enhance their usefulness and lead to beneficial results in general."

And again it says:

"There has been an all round improvement and many cadets, who had apparently played no games before they joined, show a wonderful change in their physique, manliness and agility. The Inspector of Physical Training inspected the Cadets in November and expressed himself fully satisfied with the results."

I myself recently inspected the College and found that the school has been admirably organised and is being well administered by an exceptionally efficient staff. Nothing more could have been done, beyond what has already been done to ensure its success, and—as the Honourable the Finance Member is not here I may perhaps refer to it—I am contemplating in the not very distant future an increase to this College by a considerable amount. I hope that, perhaps within twelve months it may be possible to double the numbers that are already there.

You are also aware that the Government contemplate the establishment of other military institutions which will provide an education, preliminary to the education to be obtained at the Royal Indian Military College, Dehra Dun. We are doing this because it has been realised that, if Indianization is to be given the fullest chance of success, it is essential that Indian boys, who desire an Army career, should have precisely the same opportunities and facilities in the matter of education, both physical and mental, as have always been enjoyed by English boys who are destined for a career in the Army.

Finally, in regard to this aspect of the case, I think the Legislature ought to know that, in order to remove the possible discouragement that might otherwise have existed, Government provide education at Dehra Dun at a cost to the parent below the cost to Government of maintenance of this institution.

The facts which I have just stated are sufficient to show without any further comment from me that, in anticipation of wider proposals for Indianization, Government have adopted a markedly progressive and thorough policy, for the purpose of securing qualified Indians as officers for the Indian Army, and the only further point to which I desire to draw particular attention is that, so far as human means can devise, the Indian cadet is being given every opportunity to make himself as efficient an officer as his British confrère.

I presume by the way that Honourable Members understand why we attach so much importance to the preliminary education of candidates for King's Commissions. In all modern countries good education, as the foundation of character, has always been regarded as essential for those who desire to take up the profession of arms in the capacity of officers. An officer is first and foremost a leader of men, and it is necessary for him at the outset to acquire the knowledge and the character which will not only enable him to face danger himself, but will give him the power to induce others to follow him when danger threatens, and to inspire them with trust and confidence in his ability to lead them to success. Initiative, resolution, coolness of judgment, and capacity to command, are the essential qualities of an officer, and the education of those who aspire to hold His Majesty's Commission, must from early boyhood be designed to develop these qualities to the fullest possible extent.

Again, the profession of arms has at all times had its scientific side, but this aspect has in recent years, and particularly since the great War, become very much accentuated. The education of an officer does not cease when he receives his first Commission, as some people are very liable to think. In reality it is then only beginning and it continues throughout his whole career. I am myself still learning every day from Honourable Members in this House, whose ideas are sometimes new and the expression of them forcible. In recruiting officers for the Army, we have to look for those who will not only be successful as combatants but will be successful also in the technical, administrative and Staff Department of an Army. These considerations must, however, be familiar to all. I have laid some stress on the matter because it leads me to one of the specific objections which debar Government from accepting the Honourable Member's Resolution. To accelerate progress by the grant of King's Commissions on any considerable scale in the near future to officers who at present hold the Viceroy's Commission would not be a practicable scheme since the latter do not as a rule possess the educational qualifications or the capacity for educational betterment which are essential not only in the junior ranks of the army but also, and more particularly, in the senior ranks. The problem is not merely to get a sufficient number of Indian officers as such, but to obtain those with the character and educational qualifications which will enable them to rise to positions of trust and responsibility. To make an Army you require to have officers trained in combatant, technical and staff work capable of discharging the duties of the multifarious posts which are necessary for the successful administration of a modern Army. No one knows better than I do what a magnificent body of men are the Indian officers holding the Viceroy's Commission to-day and what superlative services they have rendered and are rendering to India and the Army. Many of them have received the King's Commission, largely as a reward for gallantry and distinguished service in the field and we shall continue to recognise such distinguished services by the grant of further King's Commissions to this class as time goes on. But you may take it from me as certain that it would be wholly impracticable to find the bulk, or even a large proportion of the officers required for the Indian Army from this source alone. There is also, as it appears to me, another obvious flaw in the proposal of the Mover of this Resolution. As I read his Resolution, he suggests that the recruitment of British officers should now wholly cease and that in future none but Indian officers should be recruited from the Indian Army. In the light of what I have said to you, in view of the paramount necessity of maintaining your capacity for defence unimpaired throughout the transition stage, would it be wise or even practicable for Government to commit themselves to the wholesale Indianisation of the Indian Army before they had had an opportunity of proving either the success or failure of such a change by Indianising some portion of the Indian Army, and by testing a wholly Indianised unit not only in peace but also in war or in some form of frontier service. Perhaps the House will allow me to quote the observations on this point of a very distinguished Member of this House whose presence we miss here to-day but whose interest in this problem and whose knowledge of its intricacies is probably unequalled amongst Indians—I refer to my friend, Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer, who, writing in the Nineteenth Century Review not very long ago, said:

"No sane Indian politician advocates the filling up of the higher ranks of the Army with Indians without training or experience."

and he adds:

"As a matter of fact, no one has asked that the commissioned ranks should be exclusively recruited from among Indians: we have been pressing only for the removal of the barriers against us and for the recruitment of Indians to the higher ranks on a liberal scale to start with progressive annual increments."

I wish he was only here to-day to take part in this debate because he has studied the question to my knowledge with great care and very profoundly.

I think I have said enough to indicate a few of the difficulties with which this problem bristles. Some of the barriers have already been removed. The attitude which Government have so far adopted in regard to this matter, though it has been prudent, has also been reasonably liberal. I have mentioned that further changes are in contemplation. What form these will take I am not in a position at the present moment to reveal. But in reference to Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution I would say to the House: "Don't try to go too fast. Don't try to run before you can walk. If you do, you will assuredly fall down." In dealing with the Indianisation of the Army, India must proceed by degrees and by well-considered stages, if her advance towards the desired independence in other departments of the administration is to progress surely and safely without undue risk or danger to the community at large.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

In the first instance, Sir, I solicit your leave and the leave of the Assembly to move a few verbal amendments to the motion put before the House by Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan and if that leave is not allowed I shall speak to the Resolution itself. The amendments that I ask your leave, Sir, to move is to substitute the word "or" for the word "and" in the second line, to omit the word "all" in the third line, to omit the word "only" in the fourth line, and to omit the word "wholly" in the fifth line.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Read the whole after filling in the amendments.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: I am going to. We have had many lectures from Dr. Gour, but that hint from him is hardly needed. The Resolution as I would amend it will stand like this:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment or by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers till all Indian Regiments are Indianised."

Have I your leave, Sir?

Mr. Deputy President: Yes.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, the Commander-in-Chief is in a learning mood

Mr. R. W. Davies (Madras: Nominated Official): But the leave of the House has not been obtained. I object to the amendment.

Mr. Deputy President: I have allowed the Honourable Member to proceed with his speech. It is for the House to accept or to reject the amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: I have leave to move the amendments. That has been given. It is too late now to object to it. Well, Sir, the Commander-in-Chief is in a learning mood and he learns even in this Assembly. We are also in a learning mood now and ever. We have learnt much from what His Excellency has told us this afternoon. Much have we heard that heartens and encourages us for the future. We recognise the difficulties of the situation and the limitations of the position. While we do that, we are anxious to place before the Government and the public some substantive and substantial form in which we make our demand. We recognise the difficulties of the Government of India. It is not merely Whitehall, as Dr. Gour cried out in the course of the Commander-in-Chief's speech, that is interfering with us. Whitehall for this purpose is a mere post office between us and what the War Office stands for—the military organisation of England. Even when Whitehall is sympathetic, it will not be able to have its own way altogether. That, however, will not prevent our making our demand.

My first amendment has reference to what the Commander-in-Chief said regarding the present position, calibre, status, and education of the Viceroy's Commissioned officers, and it will not be possible, if we retain the word "and" to have recruitment according to the military authorities requirements from that body to any very considerable extent. My amendment, however, will not shut them out in suitable cases. The matter is left entirely to the military authorities to decide whether it can and shall be by recruitment or by promotion from the Commissioned ranks of the Viceroy's Officers. That gets rid to a certain extent of the objection that His Excellency has put forward with force that I recognise.

Sir, when Indian officers are going to take the place of British officers, even though it be in the Indian regiments, I do not for one moment want to countenance the position that they shall be inferior to the British officers in any way, by education, by training and character and various other things which are inseparable from a good soldier as well as a good citizen. He ought to be able to hold his own in the Army, as Mr. Rangachariar suggested this morning they ought to be able to hold their own in the Civil Service. Therefore, that is a sine qua non which nobody will want to do away with. We are entirely at one with Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer 5 P.M. reference to whose work we appreciate. Conceded that, the Army Authorities and the Government will find it difficult to resist our demand so far as that is concerned.

Then we recognise the difficulty of rushing things. Apart from considerations of expediency, where are the men to be had immediately to take all these places as vacancies occur? It would to a certain extent be a gain for the present if suitable men, like those that gave such good account of themselves in the Bengal Ambulance Corps and the Calcutta University Corps—as they come along, are given promotions and this amended Resolution would secure this object. I do not think piling up of superlatives such as “all,” or “only,” or “wholly” will add to the force of the demand. Indianisation is Indianisation. It has a definite meaning. Whether Indian Regiments are, to be wholly Indianised or largely Indianised or mainly Indianised will be determined by the exigencies or the circumstances for the time being. Our goal, our objective, our ideal, here as elsewhere, is that Indianisation shall proceed as far as possible and as fast as possible, without detriment to efficiency, without detriment to the high standard which we must maintain in our Army, as everywhere else. If all this is conceded, where comes the difficulty in accepting the substance of this Resolution? Government is busy corresponding, framing schemes; we have indications which show what the mind of the Commander-in-Chief and the Government here is. That is encouraging, but that does not go very far, for they are handicapped. We want definitely to say that this is the ideal that we aim at and we should like to know what there is to prevent that ideal being accepted and being given effect to cautiously, slowly, if you like, but steadily and without any detriment to the goal and objective in view. Sir, the Commander-in-Chief has himself said that this is a deeply important matter. We consider this to be vital. Everything else pales in importance where nation building is concerned. If the Reforms are to be a real success, we must have an abundant part in the national defences of the country and must be prepared for it apiece, but certainly without detriment to efficiency again. That we are quite agreed about.

Sir, the Commander-in-Chief has said that it must be made quite clear that Indianisation applies only to Indian regiments. The motion before the House does not take us any further than that. But may we not some day hope that just as he wants the British officer to continue in the Indian regiments it may be possible for Indian officers to take their place alongside British officers in British regiments? What has happened in other walks of life, the civil service, commercial life, educational and medical including the Indian Medical Service, service in law, engineering, everywhere? The Indian who has been tried and found not wanting has had conceded his place above his British colleagues and the Britishers, be it said to their credit, have loyally served them. Are we not seeing this now in the Secretariat, in the Honourable Indian Members' Departments, in the High Courts, at the Bar, in commerce, in education, everywhere; wherever an Indian had his chance he has justified himself (A Voice: “and as soldiers”). And as soldiers. This was unthinkable only a few years ago and still it is so. A time may come,—who knows, why not soon—when India will have her own British regiments untrammelled by considerations of War Office Routine—of British regiments officered by British and Indian officers,—who knows that Indian officers will not be welcomed by British regiments themselves to take their place alongside British officers. Sir, that is not the objective of this amendment, but as the Commander-in-Chief has introduced the matter, I think we may be permitted to express the hope that a time may come, when by soldierly and citizenlike qualities an Indian soldier may be permitted to take his place alongside the British officer in British regiments as well. But that must be for another day.

Sir, the value of the Indian Army is recognised. Its gallant officers by war services have earned King's Commissions,—371 of them. Many more of them have given their lives and many more have fought gallantly.

[Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.]

Could not many more have been given Commissions? If the authorities had their scheme ready, if they are really sympathetic and fully prepared, they could and would have done what is or must be inevitable in the near future. Sir, I do not want to take up the time of the House too long. There must be many other Members who are anxious to speak but I think it is up to us in this Assembly clearly, definitely and strongly to say that we want something, definite, substantial and intelligible, on the lines of the amended Resolution. At one time I thought that one or other of the amendments might suit the circumstances of the case better, because one does recognise that one cannot decide in detail these things in an Assembly like this and in a hurry. But what we are proposing to-day, subject to the amendments that I move, is fairly definite but not aggressive or inadmissible so that the authorities may not have any option in the matter. They have to accept the principle and give effect to the spirit of the Resolution as soon and as well as they can. If this proposal is accepted they can do this in the near future and must.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I move that the discussion be adjourned.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): It disturbs me to have to place before you a motion which is, for me, of an unusual nature. Usually such motions come from my friends on the opposite side. (A Voice: "Not always.") The fact however is that this evening we have a very important Executive Council meeting at 5-30 p.m. at which the presence of all Members of Council is necessary; it is therefore difficult for us to continue this discussion. I would, therefore, ask you, Sir, to adjourn.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 25th January, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 25th January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.

Secretary of the Assembly: I have to inform the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. President at to-day's meeting.

Mr. Deputy President then took the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

VIEWS OF LOCAL GOVERNMENTS ON MATTERS OF PUBLIC IMPORTANCE.

250. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) whether they ask the opinions of Local Governments as a whole, that is, the Executive Members and Ministers together, or separately, when referring for opinion on matters of general public importance,
- (b) whether they have received the opinions of the Members and Ministers jointly or separately,
- (c) if not which of the Local Governments do not submit the opinions of Ministers, and
- (d) whether the Government propose to consider the desirability of directing all Local Governments to do so in future?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The normal course followed by the Government of India in consulting a Local Government is to ask for the opinion of the Local Government which means the Governor in Council in relation to reserved subjects and the Governor acting with his Ministers in the case of transferred subjects. The Governor General in Council is not primarily concerned with the procedure adopted by the Local Government for the formulation of its opinion on such references, but I would invite the attention of the Honourable Member to clause IV of the Instrument of Instructions to the Governors of the various provinces in accordance with which the Governor is directed to encourage the habit of joint deliberation between himself, his Councillors and his Ministers. Generally speaking the opinions received from Local Governments are given as the joint opinion of the Local Government, though occasionally the particular opinion of individual Members of the Executive Council and Ministers is given separately. The Government of India have no sufficient information to enable them to discriminate between Local Governments in this respect, and they do not propose to issue any direction in the matter.

RENTS IN DELHI AND SIMLA.

280. Munshi Iswar Saran: (a) Will Government state the basis on which rent for the Government houses in New Delhi is charged from the occupants of those houses?

(b) Is it a fact that a number of junior officers occupying Government houses in New Delhi are also paying rent to Government for their houses in Simla?

(c) Is it a fact that for the five months that these officers are in Delhi, they have to pay separately rents for two houses, one in Simla and the other in Delhi?

(d) Is Government aware that in such cases the combined rent for the Simla and the Delhi houses, even excluding the charge for furniture, works out to a high percentage of their salary?

(e) Do Government propose to direct that the total house rent charged by Government for residence provided by it should not exceed 10 per cent. of the officer's salary?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: As the answer to this question is very lengthy, I propose, if I have the permission of the Chair, to lay it on the table.

(a) Rents for residences in Delhi are recovered on a seasonal basis, the season being reckoned as a period of five months.

2. The rent assessed for each building is a sum calculated to cover cost of

(a) interest charges on the capital cost calculated at the rate at which Government is borrowing money at the time of construction,

(b) maintenance charges,

(c) municipal and other taxation.

The amount that can be recovered from each individual is, however, limited to 10 per cent of his pay, but over and above this, extra rent, which is not limited in any way, is recovered for electric installations, special services such as water supply and plumbing, and furniture. Each of these being assessed in a similar manner to the rent of the building itself.

3. As the rate of interest under 2 (a) above has varied considerably since construction was first started in Delhi, advantage was taken this year when revising rents—as necessitated by the introduction of the Fundamental Rules—to pool the interest charges so as to ensure all being treated alike. For the sake of convenience rents were pooled for (a) officers' residences, and (b) residences of ministerial establishment. The average rates so calculated worked out to Officers.

4½ (round) in the case of buildings and electric installations.

4½ (round) in the case of special services.

Ministerial establishment.

- 4½ (round) in the case of buildings.
4 (round) in the case of electric installations.
4 (round) in the case of special services as compared with the uniform rate of 3½ per cent in force before the issue of the Fundamental Rules. The allowance made for repairs is as follows :

	Officers.	Ministerial establishment.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Building	2	1½
Electric installations	3½	4
Special services	3½	5½

The maintenance charges vary with the specification of the work.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes.

(d) The proportion which actual recoveries bear to salaries is as follows :

- (i) Junior officers drawing Rs. 1,350 to Rs. 1,999 . . . 10·6 without furniture and 12·2 with furniture.
(ii) Junior officers drawing Rs. 900 to Rs. 1,349 . . . 12·2 without furniture and 14·6 with furniture.

(e) The matter is under consideration.

UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS.

261. Munshi Iswar Saran: Will Government state if the Hindu University at Benares and the Muslim University at Aligarh will be given the right of electing their own representatives in the coming election?

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: Government do not at present propose to take any action in this direction.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Isn't that derogatory to the principle of education, and that is one of the reasons why students are boycotting the Government Universities and they say that they should be nationalised? Isn't that so, Sir?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: It is a question of opinion.

STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Mr. Deputy President: I should like to know from the Leader of the House if he has any announcement to make with regard to the forthcoming business before the House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): We propose, Sir, to hold a meeting to-morrow, Friday, to continue the discussion on the Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment) Bill. As regards next week, it will be devoted entirely to Government business. But we do not propose next week to continue the discussion on the Criminal Procedure Code Bill. There will probably be four or five meetings, and it is proposed to take into consideration the Reports of the Joint Committees on the following Bills which were presented on the 15th and 16th January :

The Indian Boilers Bill,

The Indian Mines Bill,

The Cotton Transport Bill, and

The Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Bill.

It is also hoped to take into consideration at an early date the Report of the Joint Committee on the Workmen's Compensation Bill which was presented yesterday. It is also proposed to refer to a Joint Committee the Indian Cotton Cess Bill which was introduced in the Assembly on the 23rd instant.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Is there any meeting on Saturday next?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is not proposed to hold a meeting on Saturday.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Will there be an off day in the week following?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: In the week following we shall have an off day either on Saturday or Friday; it depends on the progress we make with business.

Mr. Deputy President: The House will now proceed to the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, the amendment which I have to move is intended merely to make clear what is apparently the intention, namely, when a person, after having undergone some portion of his imprisonment is released on condition and that condition is broken, and he is again ordered to go back, he must give security only for the unexpired portion of the period. That is the object of the amendment in clause 6, paragraph 2 and paragraph 3, section 124. My amendment has been slightly altered by the draftsman which Government accepts, and therefore, Sir, in place of the amendment as it stands, I move that the following be substituted:

"That in sub-clause (iii) of clause 23, for the second paragraph of the proposed new section 6 the following be substituted:

(c) Unless such person then gives security in accordance with the terms of the original order for the unexpired portion of the term for which he was in the first instance committed or ordered to be detained (such portion being deemed to be a period equal to the period between the date of the breach of the conditions of the discharge and the date on which except for such conditional discharge he would have been entitled to release) the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate may remand such person to prison to undergo such unexpired portion, and

(b) in the third paragraph for the word 'may' the words 'shall, subject to the provisions of section 122' be substituted; and after the words 'original order' the words 'for the unexpired portion aforesaid' be inserted."

Both these amendments are merely intended to make it clear that the bond required or to be given will only be for the unexpired portion. I want to make it clear that it should not be for the whole length of time, because he has already undergone a portion of that period. To make that clear, I move that amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, Government accepts these amendments.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That in sub-clause (iii) of clause 23, for the second paragraph of the proposed new section 6 the following be substituted:

(a) Unless such person then gives security in accordance with the terms of the original order for the unexpired portion of the term for which he was in the first instance committed or ordered to be detained (such portion being deemed to be a period equal to the period between the date of the breach of the conditions of the discharge and the date on which except for such conditional discharge he would have been entitled to release) the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate may remand such person to prison to undergo such unexpired portion, and

(b) in the third paragraph for the word 'may' the words 'shall, subject to the provisions of section 122' be substituted; and after the words 'original order' the words 'for the unexpired portion aforesaid' be inserted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): Sir, the amendment (No. 84) standing in my name . . .

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I think this amendment has been disposed of by the discussion we had the other day. It is substantially the same as the amendment moved by my learned friend Mr. Rangachariar, and the House on that amendment expressed the opinion that they would prefer to have the law as it stands in the Code maintained. If my friend is moving the proviso, that is a different matter; but the first part, the substantive amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. Deputy President: I take it that the Honourable Member is moving the second part: "Provided further that in case, etc., etc. . . ."

Bhai Man Singh: I do not propose to move the second part.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 23, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: Under the ruling I have given amendment No. 86* in the List of Business is outside the scope of the Bill and is therefore out of order.

No. 87† is also outside the scope of the Bill and therefore I have to rule it out of order.

The question is that clause 23-A stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, on behalf of Mr. Agnihotri I move:

"That in clause 24 in sub-section (1) of section 133 for the words "he thinks fit" the words "is adduced" be substituted."

The new section 133 (1) says:

"Whenever a District Magistrate, a Sub-divisional Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class considers, on receiving a police report or other information and on taking such evidence (if any) as he thinks fit, that any unlawful obstruction or nuisance should be removed etc."

Now, Sir, when a Magistrate wants to take evidence under this section it is in order to show that there is a necessity for taking action, and I think it is better that the evidence adduced should be allowed to be taken by the Magistrate. Because he may otherwise decide to take only such portion as he thinks fit and not the whole. This section leaves it too much to the discretion of the Magistrate, and I therefore suggest the addition of the words "is adduced."

* "86. After clause 23-A insert the following clause:

'23-B. To section 128 of the said Code the following proviso shall be added, namely:

'Provided that no such force shall be used to the members constituting such assembly if they do not offer resistance to their being arrested.'

† "87. After clause 23-A insert the following clause:

'23-B. After section 131 of the said Code, the following section shall be inserted, namely:

'131-A. Where under the provisions of this Chapter any person proceeds or determines to disperse any such assembly by the use of fire-arms the following rules shall also be observed:

(1) Fire-arms should be used only if such assembly cannot otherwise be dispersed and no fire-arms should as a rule be used except on the written authority of a Magistrate of the highest class available on the spot. Provided that when immediate measures should be taken to prevent imminent danger or injury of a serious kind to the public the seniormost police or military officer present on the spot may give the written authority instead and the same shall be communicated to the nearest Magistrate forthwith.

(2) Before the assembly is fired upon the fullest warning should be given by all available means to the assembly that unless it disperses within a given time it will be fired on.

(3) The person giving the authority to fire shall ordinarily give such interval between the warning and firing as he considers sufficient in all the circumstances of the case.

(4) A full report of the occurrence shall be made in all cases when such assembly is dispersed by the use of fire-arms to the nearest first-class magistrate within 24 hours of the occurrence and such report shall be a public document.

(5) If the person is himself a first-class Magistrate his report shall be made to the District Magistrate and if the person is a District Magistrate his report shall be made to the Local Government.

(6) Notwithstanding anything contained in section 132 any person injured by the use of fire-arms or any parent or guardian, husband or wife of a person killed by the use of fire-arms may make a complaint against any person for any offence committed by him by reason of any act purporting to be done under this Chapter."

Mr. H. Tomkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, in this Chapter of the Code we are dealing with public nuisances and it will be seen that the amendment proposed refers to the first step in the procedure. The District Magistrate, a Sub-divisional Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class on receiving a police report or other information and on taking such evidence, if any, as he thinks fit—is empowered to issue a conditional order. The order, Sir, is only a conditional order, an order to the person to whom it is directed to appear and show cause against or else to comply with the direction in the order after it has been received by him. It is open to him later to produce any evidence he thinks fit and to show cause against. I submit, Sir, that it is entirely unnecessary here to make it compulsory for the Magistrate to take all the evidence which is adduced, because the full inquiry follows afterwards. The words in the Code as they stand at present are, "as he thinks fit," and it is not proposed in the Bill to amend those words. I submit, Sir, that this is all that is necessary, in view of the fact that we are dealing only with the preliminary stage. It is just the same thing as if you were taking cognizance of an offence on a complaint. You merely examine the complainant and then a summons is issued and so on, and you proceed to hear evidence afterwards. The conditional order under this section has practically no more effect than a summons addressed to an accused person. In these circumstances, Sir, I submit that it is entirely unnecessary to make the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I support the amendment. The object of this clause is for a Magistrate to make up his mind on a complaint made either by the Police or it may be by a private individual. He has got to decide it himself in the first instance and he asks the man to appear either before himself or some other Magistrate of the first or second class and move to have the order set aside. So that in the first instance it is a conditional order. Therefore the Magistrate has to adjudicate on the information given by private parties, and the only option given to the party to whom notice is given is to set aside that order. It is therefore but right that the Magistrate should take the evidence which is adduced before him before he makes that order. It is not as if you issue notice on a complaint or anything of that sort. I therefore think that there is a great deal of substance in the amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I oppose this amendment. If the Honourable Members will turn to section 188 they will find that an order that has to be passed for the abatement of a public nuisance may refer, for instance, to any building, tent or structure, or any tree in such a condition that it is likely to fall. Now, if the Honourable Mover's amendment is accepted, is the structure or building to fall in the meantime while evidence is being recorded by the Magistrate? And any person who wishes to give evidence may summon and resubmon witnesses and the danger to be averted in the meantime may not be averted at all. The object of section 188 is to provide a speedy remedy in cases of public nuisance. The chapter itself beginning with section 188 is of a quasi-criminal character: the proceedings are more or less of a civil character, and I therefore submit that the amendment, if adopted, will delay the proceedings and no good will be served by taking all the evidence that is adduced in a case. The Magistrate may think that one or two witnesses are quite enough to establish a good prima facie case for immediate action. If his discretion is fettered by having to record all evidence that is adduced, it may be wholly unnecessary and it may be wholly superfluous. The evidence will be recorded and in the meantime the public nuisance may be perpetrated. I therefore submit that the discretion given to the Magistrate is a sound one and should not be interfered with.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"In clause 24 in sub-section (1) of section 133 for the words 'he thinks fit' substitute the words 'is adduced'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I beg to move the amendment (No. 89) which stands in my name, viz.:

"In clause 24 in sub-section (1), paragraph 2 of proposed section 133, insert the words "from any public place or" after the words "be removed" and omit the said words where they at present occur in the said sub-section."

The amendment is purely a drafting suggestion. If the Government is not prepared to accept it, I am not going to press it. The section would read better if my suggestion is adopted. The second clause of section 133 reads thus:

"that any unlawful obstruction or nuisance should be removed from any way, river or channel which is or may be lawfully used by the public or from any public place, or"

I am asking that the words "from any public place or" be transposed immediately after the words "be removed." If my suggestion is adopted, the paragraph will read thus:

"that any unlawful obstruction or nuisance should be removed from any public place or from any way, river or channel which is or may be lawfully used by the public, or"

That is purely a drafting suggestion. I move it and leave it there.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I suggest that it is unwise for this Assembly to make this amendment for the very simple reason that if a change is made in the law, the Courts would ask what the intention of the Legislature is. The actual transposition of the words will not affect the substance of the clause, but some Magistrates may ask why the words have been transposed now and they may come to the conclusion that the intention of the Legislature is to make the words "from any public place" governed by the words "which is or may be lawfully used by the public." I think it undesirable that we should make a change.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If the Government draftsman does not want it, I do not press it to a division.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment (No. 89) was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadsen Rural): Sir, my two amendments Nos. 90 and 98 go together and I therefore ask for leave to move them together.

Mr. Deputy President: It would be convenient to the House if the Honourable Member would move his amendment No. 90 at this stage.

Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala: Sir, my object is this. Amendment No. 90 would be necessary only if amendment No. 98 is there; otherwise it would not be necessary at all. Both go together. I may be allowed to explain this. These amendments are amendments in the proposed new section 133 about conditional order for removal of nuisance. It says: "Whenever a District Magistrate, etc., on receiving a police report or other information and on taking such evidence (if any) as he thinks fit, finds that the conduct of any trade or occupation, or the keeping of any goods or merchandise is injurious to the health or physical discomfort of the community". Now, the amendment I propose is that after the word "health" the word "morality" may be inserted and the word "physical" may be expunged, and at the end an Explanation may be added to the following effect:

"Action may be taken under this section for suppression or regulating of brothels and disorderly houses as well as places used for gambling in Satta, Badni or share-marketing as also places inhabited by prostitutes or used for storage, distribution or sale of intoxicant."

The word "physical" would become unnecessary if this Explanation is added, because there are some discomforts which may not be called physical discomforts, which may be mental discomforts. For example, if a brothel is maintained close to the house of a gentleman, although he would have no physical discomfort, he will have mental discomfort. Of course, I know that in some districts action has been taken under the section "Nuisance" in matters like this. But others think that the section "Nuisance" is not wide enough to include these matters. As the section is being redrafted, I submit that it should be made quite clear that this sort of nuisance should be allowed to be removed whenever there is any just cause for grievance. Now, I have added the words "Satta, Badni or share-marketing" with this object. In some places there is gambling and there is a law for gambling. Similarly there is gambling in shares which becomes a nuisance in certain places. Government should have power in certain cases to stop licenses or to regulate them. That is the object of my amendment which I move. It runs thus:

"In clause 24 in section 133, sub-section (1), paragraph 3, after the word 'health' insert the word 'morality' and omit the word 'physical', and at the end of section 133 add another Explanation as follows:

Explanation.—Action may be taken under this section for suppression or regulating of brothels and disorderly houses as well as places used for gambling in Satta, Badni or share-marketing as also places inhabited by prostitutes or used for storage, distribution or sale of intoxicants."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I think my Honourable friend's amendment will probably meet with little support in this House and therefore I shall deal with it very briefly. The question of morality is explained by my friend's second amendment. He intends to give Magistrates power under this section to deal with brothels. I would suggest to the House that this is a matter which is much more suitably dealt with by provincial legislation. We have numerous Municipal laws. (A Voice: 'And by the Municipalities.') There is no Municipal law in the country which does not make provision for this matter. There is a Cantonment Law which also provides for it. As regards gambling there are at present no less I think than nine gambling Acts in force in the various Provinces, and I think the Code of Criminal Procedure should not attempt to entrench upon them. In regard to intoxicants again, we have our Excise Law; every province has its Excise Law and the matter is fully provided for. It is therefore unnecessary that we should introduce this matter into the Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I move that the question may be now put, Sir.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment is:

"In clause 24 in section 133, sub-section (1), paragraph 3, after the word 'health' insert the word 'morality' and omit the words 'or second,' and add the Explanation as follows:

Explanation.—Action may be taken under this section for suppression or regulating of brothels and disorderly houses as well as places used for gambling in Satta, Badni or share-marketing as also places inhabited by prostitutes or used for storage, distribution or sale of intoxicants."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, my amendment is:

"In clause 24 in the last paragraph of proposed section 133 (1), omit the words 'or second'."

Section 133 is used in very exceptional cases, and the right of the public is rather interfered with by District Magistrates or Sub-Divisional Magistrates. Sometimes if a building is being constructed, under this order it will have to be stopped, or if any man is carrying on a lawful trade, it will have to be stopped, and many other things which are done in the exercise of the civil rights of the people are to be stopped under the orders of the Magistrate. In such cases we want a Magistrate of the first class or a Sub-Divisional Magistrate who has got ample experience of these matters to issue the orders. The section provides that either a District Magistrate or a Sub-Divisional Magistrate, or a Magistrate specially empowered by the local Government on this behalf, shall issue these orders. But the last paragraph of clause 24 (1) says:—"to appear before himself or some other Magistrate of the first or second class." My point is that these cases being so important and involving intricacies of civil law and construction, should not be tried by second class Magistrates, but only by first class Magistrates, who are Magistrates of ample experience.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, my Honourable friend suggests that in these provisions we are interfering with the right of the public. I venture, Sir, to suggest that we give power in this Chapter of the Code to interfere with the actions of single persons who are committing a public nuisance. He suggests that because we are dealing with all these matters, the inquiry should only be held by a first class Magistrate. Now, Sir, under the existing law (and the Bill makes no change whatsoever in this respect), it is a District Magistrate, a Sub-Divisional Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class who makes the conditional order. Now, as we all know, in many Provinces the Sub-Divisional Magistrates will be stationed at headquarters, and there will nevertheless be tahsildars and so on scattered throughout the district. The public nuisance may be committed anywhere in the district, and it is clear that the present law conduces to the interests of the subject by enabling the Magistrate who makes the conditional order to direct that this shall be inquired into by a Magistrate on the spot. That, Sir, is the reason why in the present law it is permissible for the further inquiries to be held by a second class Magistrate, and I submit, Sir, that it would be quite a mistake of this Assembly if they make any change in this respect.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I think, Sir, the amendment proposed is a very sound one. The matter is so very important that only a first class Magistrate should issue the conditional order. The idea is that he is an experienced officer, a man of very ripe experience and he knows what is what. And therefore, in its subsequent stages to entrust the inquiry to a second class Magistrate, a person who ordinarily resides in the tehsil or mufasil towns and not at headquarters, and has not much experience, is I think not very desirable.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I think my friend who has just spoken has provided one argument against the amendment. He says second class Magistrates ordinarily reside in the sub-divisional or mufasil towns. Is it not necessary that in these cases of preliminary inquiry, the inquiry should be made by a Magistrate who is on the spot? If this amendment is accepted, then in the cases to which my friend refers all the witnesses will have to move along to the headquarters town of the district where the first class Magistrate is. They will be put to considerable inconvenience and my friend, I think, by supporting this amendment is rendering himself liable to a charge of adding to the already long list of public nuisances.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): The question may now be put.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I oppose this amendment on various grounds; firstly that it is not convenient. Supposing the obstruction or nuisance is committed at a tehsil, will you ask the first class Magistrate to go there, or will you ask the applicant to go to the place where the first class Magistrate is? He will have to take a number of witnesses and he will have to go himself. This will not add to the convenience and expedition of the work, rather it will impede it. On these grounds I oppose the amendment.

(Several Honourable Members: The question may now be put.)

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 24 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, my amendment runs as follows:

"In clause 25 for the words 'and in the manner' substitute the words 'and substantially in the manner'."

It relates to section 130 and is a very modest and necessary amendment. That is to say, the person against whom the order is passed has to comply with it "within the time" and "in the manner" specified in the order. Honourable Members have no doubt noticed the numerous cases enumerated in section 133: to fence a tank or a well or an excavation; to repair a building; to remove or support a tree. All these [Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.] things are given. I only provide for the safeguard that if he substantially fulfils the order in the manner required, he should be deemed to have complied with the order. I mean, supposing he is asked to put up a teak-wood support and he substitutes another equally strong wood support he would have complied with the order substantially, although not exactly in the manner required, that is to say, not literally, but substantially in the manner required. Supposing he is asked to put up a steel beam and he puts up an equally strong concrete beam, why should he be deemed not to have complied with the order? Therefore, in order to make it clear, I introduce the word "substantially."

I move the amendment, as it stands in my name.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the Bill proposes to require the person against whom an order is made under section 133, either to perform the action directed within the time and in the manner specified in the order, or else to appear and show cause. The Bill inserts the words "and in the manner." These words were inserted by the Committee presided over by Sir George Lowndes and, if Honourable Members will refer to the remarks of that Committee on this clause, they will find that they say that "a small amendment is also required in section 135-A by reason of the amendments we have proposed in section 133." That is to say, these words have been proposed to be inserted in section 135 because of the changes that the Committee proposed in section 133. Now, Sir, what are those changes? They relate to the orders which may be issued by the Magistrate in the first conditional order. The first case in question is as follows:

Orders:

"to desist from carrying on, or to remove or regulate in such manner as may be directed, such trade or occupation."

The next case in which an amendment was made by the Committee is:

"To remove such goods or merchandise or to regulate the keeping thereof in such manner as may be directed."

Another case is—

"To destroy, confine or dispose of such dangerous animal in the manner provided in the said order."

Now, Sir, I would ask my Honourable and learned friend whether there can be any question of desisting from carrying on or removing or regulating substantially in the manner directed any trade or occupation. Can there be any question of regulating the keeping of goods or merchandise substantially in the manner directed or of disposing of a dangerous animal substantially in the manner directed? Sir, what we want in this case to provide for is absolute compliance.

I think that the amendment proposed is open to much graver objection on another ground. My Honourable friend wishes to permit the person to whom an order is directed to plead substantial compliance. Now, Sir, what would be the result of being able to plead substantial compliance? The Magistrate will know that compliance is to be vague. Therefore, the original order will be vague. What we want, Sir, is a precise order, from which the man to whom it is directed will know exactly what he has to do. I submit, Sir, that if this amendment is accepted, we shall be doing more harm to these people whom my learned friend desires to benefit than good.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I feel bound to oppose this amendment. In the first place the word "substantially" is very vague; it is extremely difficult to determine what is "substantially" and what is not. Therefore, it will make the task of the Magistrate very cumbersome.

In the second place, I do not find any justification for introducing this word. My learned friend, perhaps on account of lack of time, failed to see what matters and what affairs this provision relates to. The word "substantially" will be misplaced altogether, and, therefore, in brief, on these two grounds, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. E. A. Spence (Bombay: European): I move that the question be now put.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 25 for the words 'and in the manner' substitute the words 'and substantially in the manner'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 25 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I propose:

"That in clause 25A the following should be substituted for the proposed section 139A, sub-sections (1), (2) and (3), namely:

"139A. If the order made absolute under section 137, sub-section (3), or section 139, sub-section (1), is concerning the obstruction, nuisance or danger to the public in the use of any way, river, channel or place and the contention of the person against whom such order is made, is that there is no public right in respect of such way, river, channel or place, the order of the Magistrate shall be subject to any subsequent decision of a competent Civil Court."

to which I wish to add, with the permission of the House, the words "on that point".

I shall explain my meaning, Sir. To understand the section we must go back to section 133, which says:

"Whenever a District Magistrate, a Sub-divisional Magistrate or, when empowered by the Local Government in this behalf, a Magistrate of the first class, considers, on receiving a police-report or other information, and on taking such evidence (if any) as he thinks fit, that any unlawful obstruction or nuisance should be removed from any way, river or channel which is or may be lawfully used by the public, or from any public place, etc., etc."

Now, the proposed section says:

"Where an order is made under section 133 for the purpose of preventing obstruction, nuisance or danger to the public in the use of any way, river, channel or place, the Magistrate shall, on the appearance before him of the person against whom the order was made, question him as to whether he denies the existence of any public right in respect of the way, river, channel or place, and, if he does so, the Magistrate shall, before proceeding under section 137 or section 138, inquire into the matter."

[Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu.]

(2) If on such inquiry the Magistrate finds that there is any reliable evidence in support of such denial, he shall stay the proceedings until the matter of the existence of such right has been decided by a competent Civil Court : and, if he finds that there is no such evidence, he shall proceed as laid down in section 137 or section 138, as the case may require."

Well, the object of the new section is first to give the party against whom an order is made, a warning that he can set up a defence that the place or river or the way in regard to which the order is made is not a public place, and, secondly, if he sets up that plea and the Magistrate finds reliable evidence in support of that plea that he should stop further proceedings until that point is decided by a competent Civil Court.

Well, it seems to me that the first remedy that is proposed to be provided by this section is unnecessary because, according to the wording of section 133 which is that "any unlawful obstruction or nuisance should be removed from any way, river or channel which is or may be lawfully used by the public, or from any public place," the question whether the place, river or way is a public one or not is directly an issue as soon as a preliminary order is made. The preliminary order will state that there is reason to believe that a nuisance or obstruction has been created in a place, river, or way, which the public have a right to use, i.e., in regard to which there is a right of way to the public. So, whether there is a public right of way or not is a question directly in issue in the case and is a question that arises out of the preliminary order issued by the Magistrate, and I do not see any necessity for the Magistrate again warning the party appearing before him and asking him whether he sets up a defence on the ground that there is no public right of way. When the preliminary order is issued, what is the party against whom it is issued going to do? Clearly he must either say that the place or river or way is not a public one, or if he admits that it is a public one he must say that no obstruction has been created on it. These are the only two defences he can set up. The law itself makes it clear that the Magistrate has got information that the way, etc., is a public one. If there is no public right to it, if the public has no right to enter upon it, then there is no case and the preliminary order cannot be made at all. So the question whether a place is a public one or not is directly in issue and arises out of the preliminary order itself. I do not, therefore, see why the Magistrate should give a special warning to the party appearing before him. That is quite unnecessary.

Some of my friends might think that I am arguing from the bureaucratic point of view. Well, we have been acting the defence pleader rather too much during the last few days but we are here to treat the matter in a fair and dispassionate manner from the point of view of the Judge who has had to deal with these cases.

Then supposing the party sets up a plea that there is no right of public way to the place, etc., the proposed section says that the Magistrate shall not decide that point, but that if he finds there is reliable evidence in support of that contention, he shall stay the proceedings pending the decision of a Civil Court. But how is the matter to go to the Civil Court? The party against whom the preliminary order is made will certainly not go to the Civil Court. He has achieved his object. Why should he go to the Civil Court? And if he does not go, who else is to go to the Civil Court? This is a matter in which the public as a whole is concerned and the public is too diffused to resort to costly civil proceedings. Then, is the Government to go to Court? This also is impracticable. Moreover Government can, at this rate, be driven to a Civil Court in every case. My point is that the Magistrate should himself go into the question whether there is a public right of way or not. If he finds there is no such right he will discharge the preliminary order. If he finds there is such a right to his satisfaction, let him make that order absolute but subject to the decision of the Civil Court. Then it will be for the party against whom the order is made absolute to go to the Civil Court. He will be compelled to go to the Civil Court. If he can show that the place is not a public place, then the order of the Magistrate will become null and void. That seems to me to be the only businesslike procedure in the matter, and I therefore propose this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, there are very great difficulties about this amendment. If Members of this House will look at the report of the Joint Committee on the Bill they will find that the Joint Committee devoted a considerable amount of attention to this matter, and I can say from personal experience that they also devoted a great amount of time. My friend, Mr. Pantulu, wants to defer a decision as to the existence of a public right of way—to defer a decision from the Civil Court—till after an order has been made absolute. Now that is distinctly contrary to the views of practically all the High Courts. What the Joint Committee did in this case was to try and give effect to the law as interpreted by the High Courts of this country. The High Courts have laid down over and over again that where there is a denial of a public right based on substantial grounds the Magistrate's jurisdiction is ousted at once. He cannot proceed any further in this matter of removing a public nuisance. But what would be the effect of my Honourable friend's amendment? The Magistrate himself apparently (whether with or without the aid of a jury, I am not quite sure) will proceed to determine the question of the existence of a public right. Well, if he decides there is no public right, then of course it goes no further. But supposing he decides there is a public right and he makes his order absolute. My Honourable friend says, "Well, then the party aggrieved goes to the Civil Court," and after possibly very dilatory proceedings he gets his declaration that there is no public right. But will that help the man in whose interests Mr. Pantulu has moved this amendment? You have got to remember that in this case we are dealing with the removal of a nuisance or an obstruction or a danger. The obstruction may be a tree, quite a valuable tree. The Magistrate has decided that there is a public right and he has confirmed his order that the tree is to be removed. If the man does not remove it, you will see if you look at section 140 of the Code, that the Magistrate can have the tree removed himself. What good will be the subsequent decision of the Civil Court that there was no public right? The tree will have gone. It may not be a tree; it may be something of far more value. It may be a building. The building will have gone, and what compensation is the man going to get for what he has been forced to remove? The amendment made by the Joint Committee in the Bill in this respect was I think made entirely in the interests of the subject. Where 12 noon. there is a bond fide denial of a public right there can be no question of going on and taking executive proceedings to force the man to remove the obstruction or the nuisance. My friend asked what will be the effect of staying the proceedings when the Magistrate finds that there is a bond fide claim that no public right exists. The man has achieved his object. He has established his claim. The Magistrate has said, "I cannot proceed any further. My jurisdiction is ousted." Who is going to settle the matter? The obstruction continues. It is the person who is aggrieved by the obstruction who will have to take the necessary steps. If the place concerned is in a municipality, the Municipal Corporation will bring a suit. That is not an unknown thing. If it is Government property, a suit will be filed by the Secretary of State. To lay down that, even when there is a bona fide claim or denial of a public right, the Magistrate must and ought to settle that matter himself and can then proceed to make an order absolute, is, I think, most undesirable and, as I said, it is contrary to the views of all the High Courts. That matter must be decided by a competent Court. There is no question about it that a Magistrate taking an executive proceeding under this Chapter is not the proper person to decide so serious a matter as a question of title.

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith:]

Bhai Man Singh: On a point of order. I submit that my amendment No. 99 is practically just the same as 95 and I may be allowed to move it and give my views upon it.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith Amendment No. 99 is entirely different. It does not seek to get rid of Section 189A as it stands at present. It does not get rid of that part of the section which lays down that when there is a bona fide claim the proceedings must be stayed.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): I think, Sir, there is a considerable amount of force in the contention of my friend, Mr. Pantulu. It must be remembered that proceedings under this Chapter are summary and no Magistrate will have the time or the leisure to make any elaborate inquiry into a matter of a public right of this kind. Moreover that is a matter specially within the province of the Civil Court and not within the jurisdiction of a Criminal Court. The point that has to be considered in a matter like this is whether there is a public right or not. Now, if the Magistrate comes to a decision that it is a public right, even then the man against whom that order is made absolute must have the option to go to the Civil Court and the decision of the Magistrate which will be made absolute for the time being only must be subject to the decision of a competent Civil Court where the matter will have to be threshed out at some length and after taking all the evidence that is necessary. If on the other hand the Magistrate decides that there is no public right, then what happens? Who has to go to the Civil Court? So far as the person against whom the order is made, he is quite safe. He need not trouble about going to the Civil Court at all and supposing this takes place where there is no municipality, then who has to go to the Civil Court. Certainly no member of the public will go to the Civil Court and not even a municipality in a town will care to go to a Civil Court because the Civil Court procedure is very long and costly. Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith said that the Secretary of State would file a suit. For the Secretary of State to file a suit of this kind is not an easy matter and it will take a long time. A case ought to be made out and it ought to be of sufficient importance for the Government to interfere and bring a suit of this kind on behalf of the Secretary of State. Meantime the public suffers and if the matter is not of sufficient importance to move the Government to bring a suit in a Civil Court on behalf of the Secretary of State, the public suffers. The procedure laid down in the clauses of the new proposed section are clumsy and cumbersome and I believe the amendment as proposed by my friend, Mr. Pantulu, is short and to the point. I therefore support this amendment.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I move that the question be now put.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, to my mind the amendment seems to be superfluous. I do not think this is a useful amendment and deserves the support of the House. May I invite the attention of my learned friend, the Mover of this amendment, to clause (2):

"If in such inquiry the Magistrate finds that there is any reliable evidence in support of such denial, he shall stay the proceedings until the matter of the existence of such right has been decided by a competent Civil Court."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Who is to go to the court?

Dr. Nand Lal: That is a separate question. The Magistrate is quite prepared to give him time to have it determined.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Why should he go?

Dr. Nand Lal: The man, who thinks he is aggrieved, may go to the Civil Court and have it determined. If he wishes that the thing may be expedited he may do his level best to see that the decision is given on that question. Should the Secretary of State go to the Civil Court? Here time is allowed to him to have the question decided. And as I have already submitted, if he wishes the whole thing to be expedited, he may go at once and have adjudication upon that question at once. The clause says:

"until the matter of the existence of such right has been decided by a competent Civil Court; and, if he finds that there is no such evidence, he shall proceed as laid down in section 137 or section 138, as the case may require."

In the face of this provision, as I have already submitted, it seems highly improbable that this amendment may seek for the support of this House.

Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, one can appreciate and sympathise with the motive which underlies this amendment. It is this—that by the somewhat summary order of a Magistrate, a man should not be finally deprived of what he may consider to be his private rights. But we must look also at the other side of the question, and I think there are insuperable difficulties in the way of giving support to this amendment. We can understand the position best by putting forward a simple illustration. A man is ordered to remove an obstruction from a public way. He opposes that order on the ground that the way is not a public way. If an order is made against him, as the law stands, he is not prevented from going to the Civil Court to establish his title. Or, he resists the order upon the ground that, though it is a public way, his act does not constitute a nuisance. That is a totally different position. The Magistrate finds after inquiry that it is a nuisance and he orders its removal. Are we by this amendment going to allow a man against whom the order is passed to go to the Civil Court the next day and get an injunction staying obedience to the Magistrate's order. Again, who is to be the defendant in a case of that kind to show on the opposite side in the Civil Court that it is a nuisance? Difficulties arise in connection with the arraignment of parties. It seems preposterous that every time a Magistrate makes an order regarding a nuisance which is disputed by the person against whom it is made, the Secretary of State, or the Government, or some representative of the public, should be dragged into the Civil Court to answer the claim. And, again, the amendment does not touch the other side at all. What is to happen if the Magistrate decides in favour of the person against whom proceedings were instituted holding that there is no nuisance? The amendment does not provide that the unfortunate public against whom the order goes in that case have to go to the Civil Court. The amendment is one-sided. It is only with regard to the private individual against whom an order is made absolute. Therefore, I think that upon a balance of advantages and disadvantages we shall be better without this amendment.

[Sir Henry Stanyon.]

(Some Honourable Members: "I move that the question be put.")

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 25A substitute the following for the proposed section 139A (1), (2) and (3), namely:

'139A. If the order made absolute under section 137, sub-section (3), or section 139, sub-section (1), is concerning the obstruction, nuisance or danger to the public in the use of any way, river, channel or place and the contention of the person against whom such order is made, is that there is no public right in respect of such way, river, channel or place, the order of the Magistrate shall be subject to any subsequent decision of a competent Civil Court on that point.'

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I will, with the permission of the House, take the two amendments separately.

Mr. Deputy President: I think it will be to the better convenience of the House if the Honourable Member would take the first amendment first.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, my first amendment is in these terms:

"In clause 25A in sub-section (2) of proposed section 139A, omit the words 'the Magistrate finds that there is any reliable evidence in support of such denial' and substitute therefor the words 'it appears to the Magistrate that there is a bona fide dispute relating to the existence of any such right'."

I had better mention to the House in what stage we are when section 139A is to be enforced. First of all, there is a police complaint or police information or some evidence before the Magistrate; on that the Magistrate comes to the conclusion that an order should be passed, a conditional order, as it is called, should be passed; and on passing the conditional order, he calls upon the person against whom the accusation is made to show cause why he should not be restrained in a particular manner. It is at this stage this section, 139A, comes in. 139A says:

"Where an order is made under section 133 for the purpose of preventing obstruction, nuisance or danger to the public in the use of any way, river, channel or place, the Magistrate shall, on the appearance before him of the person against whom the order was made, question him as to whether he denies the existence of any public right in respect of the way, river, channel or place, and, if he does so, the Magistrate shall, before proceeding under section 137 or section 138, inquire into the matter."

Then comes this clause, namely:

"If in such inquiry"—that is after the conditional order, and when the inquiry is being made—"the Magistrate finds that there is any reliable evidence in support of such denial." The House will remember that there is to be a third inquiry either under section 188 or section 189. Therefore this is, as it were, a preliminary inquiry before the Magistrate makes up his mind either to proceed against the man or to give him a jury. At this stage to speak of reliable evidence is altogether useless. As has been pointed out by the Calcutta High Court, what ought to be done in such a proceeding is this. The Magistrate should satisfy himself that there is a bond fide dispute. The language used by me is that used by the Calcutta High Court in 31. Cal., 979. They refer to an earlier decision and say (you will find it on page 982), that the Magistrate at this stage has to see to the bond fides of the claim—then he has either to decide under section 188 by means of issuing a summons and so on, or if the person accused claims, he has to send the matter up before the jury. At this stage, to speak of reliable evidence is likely to put the accused in a very embarrassing position. Therefore all that has to be done at this stage is for the Magistrate to satisfy himself that there is an honest dispute, a bond fide dispute on the subject which requires to be further proceeded with. Under these circumstances, I submit to the House that the words 'reliable evidence' are unnecessary. I move that these words be deleted, and that the words which I have mentioned should be substituted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That in clause 25A in sub-section (2) of proposed section 139A, omit the words 'the Magistrate finds that there is any reliable evidence in support of such denial' and substitute therefor the words 'it appears to the Magistrate that there is a bond fide dispute relating to the existence of any such right'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, personally, I regard this as more or less a matter of drafting,—and naturally I prefer the drafting of the Bill to my Honourable friend's attempt to improve it. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar towards the end of his remarks explained that he had attempted to take the words used by the Calcutta High Court into the Bill. Well, in the first place, I would suggest that that is not a very good argument to advance in support of an amendment, because the High Courts, when they write their judgments, are certainly not drafting laws; they are trying to expound the law, and they try to do so in plain and ordinary language. But when Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar went on to read what the High Court said, I did not find the word 'dispute' at all in the extract he read. He said that the Calcutta High Court had said that the bond fides of the claim must be inquired into. Well, that is quite another thing. A dispute connotes two separate parties, a dispute between one person and another person. A claim is quite another thing. 'Claim' is really the word that we use in the Bill as it stands. It is not actually a claim, it is a claim of a negative proposition,—I think my Honourable friend will admit—a man comes up, and claims that there is not a public right,—and what do we shorten that into?—that there is a denial of a public right.' 'Denial' is the word used, and when there is a denial of a public right, the Magistrate inquires into that denial. My friend suggested that the word 'inquiry' which occurs in the beginning of sub-section (2) of section 139A, is the inquiry which results from the issue of the notice to him to show cause under section 188. It is not quite that. If my Honourable friend will carry his eyes back a little way along sub-section (1) of section 139A, he will find that if the Magistrate questions him—that is the first thing,—the real inquiry has not yet begun—if the Magistrate questions him as to whether he denies the existence of a public right, and if the person does deny the existence of that right, the Magistrate shall inquire into the matter, that is to say, he shall not inquire into the whole matter of the notice issued under section 137, but shall inquire into this denial. If the Magistrate inquires into the denial, what does that mean? It means that he must take evidence. I cannot conceive what is wrong with saying, "if the Magistrate finds reliable evidence in support of the denial he shall act accordingly." I can see no improvement whatever in the words proposed to be substituted by my Honourable friend. He professes to have taken them from a High Court ruling; but that High Court ruling does not contain the words. (Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: "Bona fide claim.") There is a difference between 'claim' and 'dispute.' The claim is one in a negative form; in other words it is a denial, and that is the word we are using. Moreover, as regards the words bona fide, the High Courts use it over and over again, but can my Honourable friend point out the word anywhere in the Code? My friend is rather fond of Latin tags. (A Voice: "It means good faith.") Well, let us have good faith perhaps, but bona fide is quite another matter; it is not used anywhere in the Code. I put it to the House that the Bill in this respect, as drafted by the Joint Committee, is perfectly clear. The Magistrate inquires into the denial. That involves his taking evidence. We merely say that if he finds reliable evidence in support of the denial he shall stay proceedings. I cannot see how that is improved by saying that "it appears to the Magistrate that there is a bona fide dispute" between the person who is asked to show cause and some other imaginary person who is not indicated at all. There is no ground whatever, I suggest, for making this amendment, which to my mind is really nothing more than a drafting amendment, and a drafting amendment on lines which would not commend themselves to a draftsman of experience.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"In clause 25A in sub-section (2) of proposed section 139A, omit the words 'the Magistrate finds that there is any reliable evidence in support of such denial' and substitute therefor the words 'it appears to the Magistrate that there is a bona fide dispute relating to the existence of any such right'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I feel very unwilling to move the next amendment*, for the reason that Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith who has been speaking on behalf of the Government seems to think that he has done the best thing possible in the circumstances, and that every suggestion to improve the section must be regarded as altogether unnecessary or mischievous. I think myself that my amendment No. 97 (3) would certainly make the section read better; but if the Government is of opinion that they have done the very best thing possible in the circumstances,

* "(3) A person who on being questioned by the Magistrate under sub-section (1) does not deny the existence of a public right of the nature therein referred to or whose denial is not supported by prima facie evidence as to the right claimed in himself shall not in the subsequent proceedings be permitted to make any such denial nor shall any question in respect of the existence of any such public right be inquired into by any jury appointed under section 138."

I do not press my amendment as there is no use in taking up the time of the House. I move it, Sir, formally, and if the Government does not accept it I do not press for a division.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

APPOINTMENT OF A ROYAL COMMISSION ON INDIAN SERVICES.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): With your permission, Sir, I desire to interrupt for a moment the discussion on the Criminal Procedure Code in order to make an announcement to the House. I think it necessary to take this course because the matter is of such importance to the House and to the public that I should feel myself to blame if I did not place it in possession of the information at my disposal at the very earliest moment. The House will remember that a short time ago we issued a communiqué with regard to certain reports in the press on the subject of the appointment of a Royal Commission for the Public Services. We stated that those rumours were unauthorized and inaccurate. (Mr. N. M. Sathartha: "and premature"). Our words were those I have quoted. They were certainly unauthorized; they were also in their terms inaccurate. But since then, the matter has proceeded further and His Majesty's Government have arrived at a definite decision in the matter; it is that decision which I wish to take the opportunity of communicating to the House. If you will permit me I will read the exact terms of the announcement which has been authorized by His Majesty's Government, and I would ask the House to note those terms particularly, as they show at once the intention of His Majesty's Government in the matter and the exact scope of the inquiry which is to take place. I will make a copy of this available as soon as possible. The announcement is as follows:

"His Majesty's Government have decided to appoint a Royal Commission on the Services in India. The precise terms of reference to the Commission have not yet been definitely settled but will be wide in their scope. It is contemplated that the Commission will be required, having general regard to the necessity of maintaining the standard of administration in conformity with the responsibility of the Crown and the Government of India and to the declared policy of Parliament in respect of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and having particular regard to the experience now gained of the operation of the system of Government established by the Government of India Act, to inquire into the organization and the general conditions of the services, financial and otherwise, of the superior civil services in India and the best methods of ensuring and maintaining the satisfactory recruitment of such numbers of Indians and Europeans respectively as now may be decided to be necessary in the light of the considerations above referred to."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Who pays for this Commission?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Might I suggest that a discussion on this matter might suitably be raised either by question or by motion. I have only made the announcement now because I thought it due to myself and to the House as a matter of courtesy that I should place this announcement before them at the very earliest moment that I could do so.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, while we are extremely grateful to the Honourable the Home Member for giving this House the earliest opportunity of learning of the appointment of the Royal Commission, I think I am voicing the general sentiments of this side of the House when I say that the news has come to us as a shock and that we shall take the earliest opportunity of moving the adjournment of this House to protest against the appointment of a Royal Commission. I ask you, Sir, to give us the earliest opportunity for discussing this question which is of urgent public importance, and in view of the various number of questions that have been put by Honourable Members in this connection and the discussion that has gone on in the public Press, I hope you will afford us an early opportunity of discussing this question.

Mr. Deputy President: I wish to draw the Honourable Member's attention that under the Manual of Procedure a certain procedure is laid down for the adjournment of the House and I am sure that if the Honourable Member moves it, the needful will be done at the proper time.

Mr. Deputy President then called on Mr. Agnihotri to move amendment No. 98, relating to the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Bill.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): On a point of order. Dr. Gour has expressed views on behalf of one side of the House, and . . .

Mr. Deputy President: It is open to any Member to move the adjournment of the House at the proper time and the question will be decided upon at the proper time.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I only wanted to say that the National Party associates itself with the remarks made by Dr. Gour.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Bhai Man Singh: I move, Sir, the amendment that stands in my name, which is as follows:

"In clause 25A add the following sub-section at the end of the proposed section 139A:

'(4) Nothing in this section or in section 133 shall prevent any aggrieved person from filing a civil suit about the existence of a public right in the way, channel, river or place concerned or the question of his title therein, and any order made under this Chapter shall be subject to the order of the Civil Court in such a suit.'

The learned framers of the Code have adopted the principle of the Court rulings and as a result of these rulings, 15 Calcutta 504 and 35 Calcutta 283, they have come to the conclusion that if the Magistrate thinks it proper and a bona fide objection is made as to whether there exists a public right or not in such a channel, and the Magistrate does not find that the claim is a flimsy one, he can refer it to the Civil Court or, if he thinks that there are no proper grounds for the claim, he can proceed with the case. But there has been another side to the question which has been left out, viz., whether the order of the Magistrates in regard to the public way or right is or is not final. No doubt, Sir, there exists some ruling. There are some rulings which have held definitely that if anybody thinks aggrieved on the point that there does not exist a public right, he can go to the Civil Court. That principle, Sir, has been held in that ruling:

"A Civil Court is not competent to set aside the order of a Magistrate made under section 521 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, on the ground that such order was made without jurisdiction because the land in respect of which the order was made is private property, and not a thoroughfare or public place. A Civil Court can, however, irrespective of an order made under section 521 by a Magistrate, try the question whether the land which formed the subject of such order is private property, and not a thoroughfare or public place as between the parties to such suit and those who claim under them."

Now, Sir, while lawyers were discussing this case, there was very great difficulty in arriving at this decision. There were different authorities and they had to convince their Lordships. I need not take up the time of the House in going through the history of these rulings. I simply want to submit that there is no reason why we should not lay it down very clearly and definitely that an order which refers to a right of the public in respect of the way, river, etc., should be subject to the final decision of a Civil Court. The sections of this Chapter as they stood did not make any reference to a Civil Court, but in the proposed sub-section (3) we have laid down as follows:

"A person who has, on being questioned by the Magistrate under sub-section (1), failed to deny the existence of a public right of the nature therein referred to, or who, having made such denial, has failed to adduce reliable evidence in support thereof, shall not in the subsequent proceedings be permitted to make any such denial, nor shall any question in respect of the existence of any such public right be inquired into by any jury appointed under section 138."

No doubt, Sir, we simply deny him the right to ascertain his position in those proceedings under this Chapter. But having denied him that and not having touched the existing law about Civil Courts, there is the danger that our intentions might be misunderstood, and there is no reason why while incorporating the results of certain other decisions of the Court, we should not at the same time incorporate the decisions arrived at in other rulings and make the law quite clear on the point.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Briefly put, my argument is that there is nothing in the Bill or Code which prevents a party from going to a Civil Court, and I think indeed the ruling which the Honourable Member read out confirms this statement. With regard to the latter part of the amendment, namely, that any order made under this Chapter should be subjected to the order of the Civil Court in such a suit, that question, I think, has already been decided by the House on Mr. Pantulu's Amendment No. 95. In these circumstances, I think I can very fairly put it to the Honourable Member that his amendment is not really required.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I think this is a very dangerous amendment to introduce. Ordinarily any order passed by a Magistrate would not stand in the way of the establishment of civil rights. If you once begin to introduce a provision of this nature, it would lead to trouble. The difficulty will arise as to whether Article 11 or 13 of the Limitation Act or whether the ordinary law of limitation should be availed of. I think if you once introduce an amendment of this nature and say that the order of the Magistrate should be questioned by the Civil Court, it would lead to great complications. Under these circumstances, I would request my friend to withdraw the amendment. The Courts have never found any difficulty in coming to a conclusion that Civil Courts can declare the rights of the parties.

Bhai Man Singh: I beg to withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 25A stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Bhai Man Singh: The amendment that stands in my name refers to clause 26 and runs as follows

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Amendment No. 101 will be taken afterwards?

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment No. 101 may be taken later.

Bhai Man Singh: My amendment runs as follows :

"In clause 26 (1) insert the following as sub-clause (i) and renumber the subsequent sub-clauses accordingly :

'(i) In section 144, sub-section (1), after the words 'in cases where' and before the words 'in the opinion of' the following words shall be inserted :

'on credible information received'."

I think it would be better and for the convenience of the House that I should move only the first part of my amendment at this stage. With your permission I should like to speak only on this part of the amendment first.

Mr. Deputy President: Very well.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, it is a subject which really vitally touches the rights and liberties of my countrymen. Section 144 is one of those sections of which there has been the greatest abuse, and this section is perhaps the widest possible in its scope, and against it there is practically absolutely no remedy provided. Therefore, Sir, I would beg the Honourable Members of this House to give their careful attention to the point whether we are to leave this section 144 as wide and the powers of the Magistrates under it as free as they are at present. Sir, there have been cases where the most respectable, most responsible persons have been ordered not to enter a certain town. I remember very well when our well known countryman Pundit Madan Mohan Malaviya was ordered not to go to Ambala City and not to deliver his lecture, and I know as a matter of fact that Ambala City is perhaps the most docile town in India—(An Honourable Member: "You come from it")—I come from it, of course, and if there are wrong-doers there, you may take it that they are an exception, as the history of my own city shows that there have been no sort of affrays or riots there on political grounds, and perhaps Ambala has supplied the least number of political prisoners during the last two years. So Ambala was a most peaceful place where the most innocent speech of Pundit Malaviya would never have caused any disturbance of the public tranquillity or public peace, nor would his entry into the city of Ambala have caused danger to human life or safety. But all the same the terms of the section are very wide and in the opinion of the Magistrate he has to comply with it. I submit that we must provide very strong safeguards against the abuse of the power given under this section, and this is one of the first safeguards that I am suggesting. I am suggesting, Sir, that the Magistrate should only take action "on credible information received." In the Code we find that whenever we give a power to a Magistrate, he can only move on information received. For example, I may refer Honourable Members of the House to sections 107, 108, 110 and 183. In section 107 the Magistrate is informed. Similarly section 110 says when the Magistrate "receives information" that any person within the local limits of his jurisdiction is a habitual robber, etc. For the purpose of even robbers and worse criminals where we provide that there shall be a regular trial later on, even in those cases, we want the Magistrate to go upon a certain sort of information received, and I submit that, in revising this Code, we have improved upon those words, I do not remember the exact words. If I knew we were going to amend the Code like that, I would perhaps have suggested those very words instead of my present form of "on credible information received." All the same I submit there is no reason why a Magistrate should proceed on no information being received. Certain rulings of the High Court too are in my favour. I refer the House to 38 Calcutta, page 876. In that case the petitioner excavated a tank on his own land adjoining the house of the opposite party, and the latter objected to the excavation on the ground that his house would be thereby rendered unsafe. No likelihood of a breach of the peace appeared from the police report or the written statements of the parties, but the Magistrate made the order under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code without inquiry or recording any urgency. There are two things, Sir, without inquiry and without recording any urgency. Then, Sir, in the body of judgment when the facts are being described, it is said:

"Then, on the 19th April, and without further enquiry and without recording any urgency in the matter, the Magistrate made his Rule absolute not on the ground reported by the police, but as appears from his present explanation, from his personal apprehension that the parties would break the public peace."

Everywhere under the criminal law we want to exclude the personal information of the magistracy, but under section 144, as it at present stands, the Magistrate has the right to order a person not to enter such and such a place on his own personal information. I am sorry there was no revision or appeal provided directly against this section. Whenever the matters have come before the High Courts, it has been mostly in an indirect way. In certain cases the High Courts have inquired about it while they were discussing the fact whether the Magistrate had properly exercised his jurisdiction or not, or whether he had fulfilled all the formalities laid down under this section or not. Most of the rulings under this section are concerned only indirectly with this matter, as when a man has broken an order and has been convicted under section 188 of the Indian Penal Code and those matters have gone on revision to the High Court, then the High Courts had chances to pass remarks about the work of the Magistrate. In this case the High Court have definitely held that the order was not passed on any real apprehension properly arrived at. By using the words "properly arrived at." Their Lordships definitely meant that the Magistrate should come to his conclusions by recording some sort of evidence, by getting some sort of information about it. There is absolutely no reason why the Magistrates should proceed without any information. Further on, Sir, we have got a series of rulings where the High Courts have held also that they should record evidence. I draw the attention of the House to 13 Weekly Reporter, page 46. Of course these are old rulings and they refer, therefore, to sections of the old Code.

"Section 62 of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not authorise a Magistrate summarily to direct a person to remove a wall erected on land that has belonged to any other person in the absence of evidence showing that a riot or affray was likely to occur."

[Bhai Man Singh.]

There are a number of rulings which have held to that point. One ruling says:

"There is nothing in section 62 of the Criminal Procedure Code to justify a Magistrate in making an order for the removal of a bund or other obstruction or nuisance on the mere report of a police constable."

Not only has it been held that the Magistrate is not to proceed on his own information but it has been held that he is not to proceed merely on the report of the police.

"Before making such an order he ought to take evidence from the defendant and, if necessary, on both sides."

Again, Sir, if we look to other series of rulings where cases have gone to the High Courts when there has been a conviction under section 188 of the Indian Penal Code, there the High Courts have held that, if there is no strong, no clear, evidence that the disobedience of the order would lead to a breach of the peace, then the conviction is illegal. I submit, Sir, if the Magistrate has not got good evidence to support his order, where is the use of his passing an order? Supposing he passes an order under the section, a man who breaks it cannot be punished. Unless there is very clear evidence to support the conviction and to prove that there would have been a breach of the peace on account of the disobedience of the order the man would go scot free. Where is the use of making any law behind which we have got no sanction? The last principle was held in 4 Punjab Record, 1916, and in many other rulings. So, I submit, there is absolutely no reason why we should not see what are the definite safeguards that should be provided under section 144. I may point out one more fact, Sir. No doubt an order under the section stands for two months only; but two months may mean a lot; two months may sometimes have disastrous effects on a person. Supposing, Sir, having delivered a very fiery speech on some religious matter, I have made myself obnoxious to a certain class of persons at Ambala and the Magistrate thinks that my going there would cause a riot or a breach of public tranquillity. A certain person at Ambala has filed a suit against me for Rs. 20,000. I have defended that suit, I cannot altogether depend on giving written instructions through a pleader. I want to be present personally. Well, the District Magistrate says: "My dear Sir, I do not care for that, you can appear through a pleader." There is a very clear provision in the civil law that a man can appear through his pleader. The District Judge could very well say "I do not care for the order of the District Magistrate; you can appear through your counsel." There could be another thing. Supposing a man says "I think Man Singh will become bankrupt and run away. In that case there might be an attachment before judgment. Where should I be? There can be infinite hardships through the abuse of this section. The very liberties, the very right of speech, the very right of political propaganda even within proper limits, has been checked by the abuse of this section, and there is absolutely no reason why we should allow this section to remain as it stands without providing sufficient safeguards against its abuse.

Sir, with these remarks, I recommend this amendment, No. 1 of this series, to the House.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, there has been an amount of criticism in connection with the applicability or inapplicability of this section, namely, 144, of the Criminal Procedure Code, and I think the author of this amendment has rendered some service in putting forward the amendment under discussion. May I invite your attention, Sir, to the general principle of law? It is this, that every Magistrate and every Judge has to form his opinion on some data before him. I think no Honourable Member of this House will deny the correctness of this proposition. But, when we come to the provisions of this section, what do we find? The section says: In cases where, in the opinion of a District Magistrate, a Chief Presidency Magistrate, Sub-divisional Magistrate, or of any other Magistrate (it has been amended a bit) specially empowered by the Local Government or the Chief Presidency Magistrate or the District Magistrate to act under this section, immediate prevention or a speedy remedy is desirable. If there is some sort of evidence before the Magistrate, of course the matter being so urgent, he is fully competent to take action. His opinion based on some evidence must be respected and the orders passed by him must be given the greatest possible regard. But the defect in the present provision is this, that he can form any opinion, suo motu, of his own accord, without having anything before him, and, therefore, the provisions seem to be very defective; and I think the arguments which have been advanced in favour of the insertion of the words "on credible information received" will meet the criticisms which have been, as I have already submitted, levelled against this section.

On this ground I very strongly support this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, the Honourable Mover of this amendment said a good deal about section 144 as a whole. What he said about his amendment amounted, I think, only to this, that he desired that the law should lay down that a Magistrate should not act on his own knowledge but should receive credible information from some outside person that action under the section was necessary. Sir, I doubt whether it carries us very much further, because, if the Magistrate forms an opinion, he can only form that opinion on information that he has received. If he takes action on his own knowledge, well, his knowledge was not born inside him but comes from outside. The House will

1 P.M. remember, I think, what the purport of section 144 is. In the first place, it is a power in the hands of the Executive to take speedy and immediate action. It is placed deliberately in the hands of the Executive, in the hands of those who are responsible for the maintenance of peace and order in the district, in the hands of those who are responsible for seeing that there is no disturbance of the public tranquillity. Bhai Man Singh referred to a case where a certain gentleman received an order under this section to prevent him from visiting Ambala. Well, in that case the Magistrate must have acted on information. The information as a matter of fact in that case would probably come from some other place, possibly Allahabad, where the gentleman in question lives. It must have come from there and in that case the amendment which my friend proposes to sub-section (1) would not have carried the Magistrate's case any further, nor would it have carried the case of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya any further. The House has already on one or two occasions adopted the phraseology of section 204, which is at the beginning of the Chapter, which tells a Magistrate how he is to proceed on a complaint. The words are "If in the opinion of the Magistrate there is [Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.] sufficient ground for proceedings." The Government, Sir, has no objection to introducing these words into section 144. They do not fit in very well. It would read something like this then:

"In cases where in the opinion of a District Magistrate"—or of any of the other Magistrates referred to—"there is sufficient ground for proceeding under this section, and immediate prevention or speedy remedy is desirable."

That is not entirely satisfactory because of the form of the section, but I think it would meet the views of the House?

(Some Honourable Members: "Yes.")

Bhai Man Singh: I would accept the amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Then I would ask leave to move the amendment in that form as an amendment to my friend's amendment No. 102.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Will the Honourable Member read out the amendment as he himself would have it—the whole of it?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith:

"In cases where in the opinion of a District Magistrate"—I leave out the other Magistrates referred to—"there is sufficient ground for proceeding under this section and immediate prevention or speedy remedy is desirable."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar and Dr. Nand Lal: Yes, that will meet the case.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is:

"That in Clause 26, to sub-clause (i), add the following:

'and after the words "under this section" the words "there is sufficient ground for proceeding under this section and" shall be inserted.'

The motion was adopted.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 26 in sub-clause (i) after the words 'of the' insert the words 'second or'."

It evidently means that the delegation by the Local Government to District Magistrates and Chief Presidency Magistrates should be limited to first class Magistrates. Already there is power, Sir, for Sub-divisional Magistrates but there are first class Magistrates who are not Sub-divisional Officers. This is an important section and I think it would be better to confine it to first class Magistrates. I may mention that under this section the other day in the Nellore district a second class Magistrate issued a notice that no meetings should be held in that town, and it so happened that the District Board had to meet. They did not know what to do. In defiance of the order of the Magistrate they held the meeting, and the Magistrate was unable to do anything. Subsequently the District Magistrate cancelled the order. In such an important matter as this, therefore, it is absolutely necessary that we should entrust it to persons who have much experience, and I propose therefore that first class Magistrates only should be given this power. I move the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We have already considered the possibility of the Local Government empowering a first class Magistrate. Mr. Raju would now make it impossible for them to empower a second class Magistrate. He quoted as a reason one instance in which a second.

class Magistrate issued an order which certainly seemed objectionable. But his friends here I know would be prepared, were I to invite them to do so, to produce a large series of orders by first class Magistrates and even by District Magistrates themselves which were equally from their point of view objectionable. The fact that a second class Magistrate occasionally issues an objectionable order is not in itself sufficient ground for saying that no second class Magistrate should be empowered under this section.

I said the other day—and I hope Mr. Agnihotri will not mind my saying so—that my friend is liable to a crisis of nerves whenever certain sections of the Code are touched. Our treatment of meetings is just one of those points which affects my Honourable friend in this regrettable way. But this Chapter has a very wide scope and extends far beyond the treatment of meetings. There must be many occasions in which a second class Magistrate, distant many miles from a first class Magistrate or Sub-divisional Officer, finds himself face to face with a crisis of this nature. He has not time to wait. The matter is urgent and in the words of the Code “a speedy remedy” is desirable. He cannot afford to state the case to the first class Magistrate and get his orders. I would put it to this Assembly that this is a matter which really must be decided on the spot and on first hand information, and it is necessary that, in many out of the way places where there is only a second class Magistrate, he should be empowered to pass the necessary orders. Again I would ask the House not to confine itself entirely to the case of meetings, for, as I say, the Chapter has a very much wider scope.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

“That in clause 26, in sub-clause (i) after the words ‘of the’ the words ‘second or’ be inserted.”

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, the amendment which I move runs as follows:

“In clause 26 to sub-clause (i) add the following at the end:

“and after the words ‘such Magistrate’ where they first occur the words ‘after recording his opinion that the other powers with which he is entrusted are insufficient’ shall be inserted.”

That is to say, the object of my amendment is this. This is a reserve power in the hands of the Magistrate—section 144. I ask Honourable Members to remember what all powers we have hitherto given to the Magistrate to secure public peace and public tranquillity. We have now extended the scope of the chapter relating to taking security for keeping the peace. Honourable Members will remember that breach of the peace or disturbance of public tranquillity takes place either by the direct act of the party concerned, that is, by himself committing the breach of the peace or by committing a wrongful act which will provoke a breach of the peace. Both those cases have been provided for in section 107. Persons of bad character are already provided for. As Honourable Members remember, persons convicted of offences involving a breach of the peace are also provided for by section 108. I said that the scope of the preventive powers has been extended by the amendments we have hitherto carried. I mean this. When proceedings under the security chapter are being taken, we have now given power to the Magistrates to pass interim orders pending the inquiry, so that persons called upon to give security either for keeping the peace or for good behaviour are called upon to give interim

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

bonds in urgent cases, so that urgent cases are also provided for. Now under this section 144, I may mention to Honourable Members, action may be taken against wrongful acts and also against rightful acts which are likely to create a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity. Honourable Members who have either applied this section or practised in courts where they have to apply this section will remember on many an occasion perfectly legal acts on the part of the individual have been prohibited because public peace is of more importance than the exercise of legal rights, so that temporarily even the exercise of legal rights can be suspended under this section 144. That is the object of this section. Whereas section 107 prohibits only wrongful acts, section 144 can prevent rightful acts. Let us remember that. Therefore having regard to that, the Magistrate's duty, it will be readily conceded, is to protect subjects of His Majesty in the exercise of their lawful rights. But if he finds it impossible to protect the subject, having regard to the urgent nature of the case, having perhaps regard to the fact that he has not got sufficient police force at his back in order to enforce the exercise of the right or having regard to other circumstances, he is obliged to take action under section 144, he is permitted to resort to this. High Courts have recognised this power. The legal exercise of lawful rights has been prohibited under this section because it is necessary that this reserve power in the hands of the Magistrate should exist. Now, I say deliberately that this is a reserve power because in order that he may suppress the exercise of lawful rights, he must have taken all other measures in his power, such as taking security from the person who threatens to commit a breach of the peace. Now, for instance, I have known of cases where in consequence of some religious disputes between parties or in consequence of caste disputes between parties, low castes and depressed classes have been prohibited from carrying processions in streets because it was not a mamool and the higher castes take exception to this innovation and therefore the Magistrates in Madras very often had to prevent the exercise by these poor people of their lawful rights by having resort to this section. I am not going to refer to merely political cases. In ordinary cases which come up before Magistrates, in consequence of disputes between various castes, in consequence of disputes for precedence for honours in temples and other places, section 144 is a section which is frequently used and therefore it has been laid down by the High Courts that this section should not be resorted to unless the other powers with which the Magistrate is entrusted are found to be insufficient. I have taken the language from a decision of the Madras High Court so early as in 6 Madras, where in consequence of religious disputes between Hindus and Muhammadans, in consequence of the question as to whether Hindus can beat drums in front of mosques, this question came up before the courts. This particular case was an offshoot of what is known as the Salem riots case, which originated in consequence of this dispute between Hindus and Muhammadans. There the High Court had to examine the propriety of the order. They point out there distinctly that the power conferred upon a Magistrate under section 144 is an extraordinary power and the Magistrate should resort to it only when he is satisfied that the other powers with which he is entrusted are insufficient. The authority of the Magistrate should be exercised in defence of rights rather than in their suspension. But at the same time they recognised there may be occasions when he may have to suspend, that is when he is powerless, when the other powers which he has got are not sufficient and therefore I say that before taking action under this section he should deliberately come to the conclusion that the other powers, namely, sections 107, 108 and 109 and the police force at his back are insufficient to secure public peace and he must come to that conclusion before he takes action under this section and the heading of the chapter also will support my argument as Honourable Members will notice. These are temporary orders in urgent cases of nuisance or apprehended danger. So that it is really intended for the preservation of the public peace, because the Magistrate is powerless to act otherwise. For instance, I know of a case where a person walking down a street saw a flag on the top of a house which offended his feelings and directly he passed an order to pull down that flag. Who is going to take offence at the flag being hoisted on a particular man's house? That is a right. It was a Home Rule flag. In those days Dr. Annie Besant was not a favoured person at the hands of the Government. She was a suspect and now she is the accredited representative of Government. Therefore an extremist of to-day becomes a moderate of to-morrow and the non-co-operator of to-day may become a co-operator of to-morrow and I am not sure whether Mr. C. R. Das will not be an honoured guest in this House. Therefore in the political passions of the moment action is taken. Section 144 was applied to Dr. Annie Besant as mercilessly and as ruthlessly as against other persons who did not find favour with the authorities. There was, I remember, Sir, another case where a person carried Dr. Annie Besant's portrait on his chest, and, Sir, he was ordered to take it down because he was going to offend the feelings of the loyal and law-abiding section who take offence at these trifles—these people who profess loyalty take offence at these things on mere pretences, as we all know, and on this pretext action is taken; and therefore, Sir, I ask that by all means prevent the exercise of lawful rights, the exercise of legal rights of holding public meetings; preaching to the public is a legal right, we have understood it, of British citizenship in the British Empire. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who once adorned this Chamber in its former existence, has been prevented from preaching at public meetings. By all means resort to this procedure. I have no objection. In fact the Honourable the Home Member the other day spoke of me as being the ingenious lawyer who suggested to them this extraordinary and exceptional course. I disclaim that compliment. But assuming that it is correct, then I am here, Sir, trying to undo the mischief which I have done. Will you please assist me in undoing that mischief? You say you have acted on my advice—I feel it a great compliment that you acted on my advice, that the Government of India, the mighty Government of India have acted on the advice of poor Rangachariar—assuming that it is correct, I am trying to undo the mischief which I have done myself; and therefore, Sir, I ask, not that we should prevent the use of this section. I know in many cases this section is a very useful section. I know it from my practice of 32 years, I know that section 144 is a very necessary section, but at the same time Magistrates are tempted, the police are tempted, to make use of this section, when parties, rich parties at times of religious disputes, resort to this section. Other persons resort to this section, find it a cheap method of getting an order in their favour,—one order under section 184, another under 145, and the man who is able to get the ear of the police or of the Magistrate gets an order under this section, and the lawful rights of ordinary persons are thus invaded under the guise of this section. Therefore, I ask that there should be this safeguard which I suggest—it has also been suggested by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in 6 (Madras 208) and also as early as in 19 Calcutta by the Calcutta High Court (19 Calcutta 248, 876) and also

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

I believe in other cases. I therefore, Sir, ask that these words be inserted, namely: 'he should first record his opinion that the other powers with which he is entrusted are insufficient.' I move, Sir, my amendment as it stands.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: We shall not of course object to Mr. Rangachariar's definition of the scope of this section. It does—as he recognizes—provide that the Magistrate may pass an order which will affect the subject in the exercise of his lawful acts. I shall not agree with him, however, in saying that our previous amendments of other Chapters of the Code have largely extended the scope of the preventive sections. He instances the fact that we have provided now for the issue of an interim order, but, so far from that extending the scope of the Act, I would remind him that it is entirely in the interests of the subject himself. The Magistrate always has had power under section 114 to issue a warrant at once if necessary.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: But he is bound down all the same.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: That is true,—only as an interim arrangement, instead of being arrested on a warrant. Now the Chapter of the Act we are discussing contemplates essentially that the Magistrate shall not take action under it unless he has no other remedy under the security sections. Mr. Rangachariar desires to add an additional safeguard; he desires that the Magistrate should, as it were, place on affirmation his opinion that he has no other remedy. He points out to us numerous cases in which orders have been passed under this section, which have attracted public attention. I ask him how he would have prevented such orders in any way by the addition of the precaution which he has now proposed. All that the Magistrate has to do is to say that "in my opinion I have no other remedy possible."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I expect him to be honest.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: He will be honest; you won't make him more honest merely by making him assert that he is so. You do not secure that his order is reversed if his opinion of his own powers is not correct. An appellate Court would not be able to go behind his declaration that in his opinion he has no other remedy, for all that you require from him is a mere statement of opinion. It is really very much as though the Honourable Member had suggested that the Magistrate should make an oath that he was in sound mind and health before he brought the section into operation. I would remind the House of what we did a few minutes ago, namely, to insert a stipulation equivalent to that which is applied to section 204,—that the Magistrate should only proceed if he considers that there is sufficient ground for proceeding. Is it now necessary that we should, in addition, ask the Magistrate to place on paper an affirmation on his part that he believes he has no other course but to take action under this section? Do we anywhere in our Acts find that before a Magistrate comes to a decision on a case, he must make an affirmation that he has been all through the law and he is quite sure that no other section applies? Do we make him affirm that he has searched his conscience and cannot find it possible to give any other judgment? For that is the exact parallel to what Mr. Rangachariar now asks us to do. Is it not sufficient that we should simply make it necessary for the Magistrate to state that there is sufficient ground for proceeding?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, I am entirely in sympathy with Mr. Rangachariar, but I do not think that this will improve matters. The insertion of such a clause will not improve matters because after the amendment that has been made to sub-clause (1), where it is required that the Magistrate should state that there are sufficient grounds for proceeding under the section is comprehensive enough and after that, the insertion of this clause might lead to confusion. What we have done in the Joint Committee is this. We have provided a remedy where a Magistrate proceeds under this section peremptorily. Formerly he proceeded against a person arbitrarily; he made an order, without giving any opportunity to the person against whom he passed the order, at any time to show any cause. What we have done in the Joint Committee is this. We have given an opportunity to the person or members of the general public who may be bound down, that is, against whom a prohibitory order is passed, an opportunity to show cause. I draw my Honourable friend's attention to clause (5) which we have added to the section, namely:

"Where such an application is received the Magistrate shall afford to the applicant an early opportunity of appearing before him either in person or by pleader and showing cause against the order; and, if the Magistrate rejects the application wholly or in part he shall record in writing his reasons for doing so."

Thus, we say now in clause (1) that the Magistrate must make his order on sufficient grounds and later on we give the party prejudiced an opportunity to show cause. Now, I take it that my friend's amendment which is taken from a judgment is merely a matter of interpretation. If we require a Magistrate to state that he has exhausted his powers under all the other provisions of the Code, he may merely put down a statement to that effect and that would hardly give a remedy to any person affected by the order. I would therefore leave it to the Magistrates to comply with the provisions we have already made where the Magistrate is of opinion that it is a case in which an order should be made under section 144. But that he should have to put down that he has considered or exhausted all his powers under the other sections of the Code and that the case comes particularly within the scope of section 144, is, I think, unnecessary and unreasonable. I would leave it to the superior court to judge whether a Magistrate has applied this section properly or not. I have already said that what Mr. Rangachariar proposes is a matter of interpretation and not of procedure. My friend, Mr. Rangachariar, knows that the superior courts have held that if in their opinion the Magistrate has not acted within the scope of this section then they have jurisdiction to interfere under their revisional powers. So I would leave the matter as it is and leave the Magistrate to act within the scope and limitations provided under this section. If he does not comply with its requirements, I would leave it to the superior courts to interfere according to their present practice. I therefore do not think that the addition of my friend's clause will improve matters.

Mr. B. A. Spence: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment is:

"That in clause 26 to sub-clause (1) add the following at the end:

'and after the words 'such Magistrate' where they first occur the words 'after recording his opinion that the other powers with which he is entrusted are insufficient' shall be inserted'."

[Mr. Deputy President.]

The question is that that amendment be made.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Quarter to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Quarter to Three of the Clock. Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, I suppose my amendment* No. (2) was included in the previous amendment and so I shall proceed with clause (8) of my amendment No. 102. It runs:

"Add the following sub-clause after the present sub-clause (i) and renumber the subsequent clauses accordingly:

"(iii) in sub-section (1) the words 'or tends to prevent' shall be omitted'."

* "(2) Substitute the following in place of the present sub-clause (i):

'in sub-section (1) for the words 'of any other Magistrate' the words 'a Magistrate of the first class' shall be substituted'."

If we read the terms of section 144 we will find that it is not only unchecked but it is as wide as possibly it could be; we are to see now whether there is any necessity or whether it is advisable at all to bring in all possible things under this section and within its scope. The section runs:

"In cases where in the opinion of a District Magistrate, a Chief Presidency Magistrate, a Sub-divisional Magistrate, or of any other Magistrate.....immediate prevention or speedy remedy is desirable, such Magistrate may..... direct any person to abstain from a certain act or to take certain order with certain property in his possession or under his management, if such Magistrate considers that such direction is likely to prevent, or tends to prevent, obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury, to any person lawfully employed, or danger to human life, health or safety, or disturbance of the public tranquillity or a riot or an affray."

Now, there are three things included in it, one, actually preventing, the other tending to prevent, and the third, risk to life, property, etc. Now, I submit that the term 'tend to prevent' is such a vast term that anything, even the remotest cause, may be brought within it. We are giving the magistracy a power which should be used very sparingly, a power which is highly summary. I cannot understand why we should make this section so vast that not only should we provide for an order to prevent, but for an order tending to prevent, annoyance, etc. Everything, perhaps even the remotest causes, can be said to tend to prevent a thing. A man, a perfectly good and honest man, is passing through a place where goondas live; some people come and chaff at him; his friends might object to it and they might even find a little quarrel over it. If we stop that man from going there altogether,—his motives may be perfectly right, his object may be perfectly sound, he may be going there on a perfectly lawful errand—but the order to stop him from going there may tend to prevent a breach of the peace. It is such a far-fetched thing that I at least cannot see anything to justify the inclusion of such words in the section. I think the matter is so very clear that no further discussion over it is needed and I hope the Government will see the reasonableness of the demand.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, the point here is perhaps a little subtle, but I hope to be able to make it clear to the House. The removal of the words 'tends to prevent' would undoubtedly weaken the section very much and I do not think there is any risk of their being used to meet such a case as has been cited by the Honourable Member. Of course the words 'tends to prevent' are much milder than the words 'likely to prevent,' but we should consider what the section lays down. We will take any case referred to in the section; say it is a case of obstruction; the Magistrate has come to the conclusion that a speedy remedy is desirable to prevent this obstruction; he has to do his best to provide that remedy. He thinks of a course of action; he is prepared to issue a direction under this section, but he says "This course that I propose—I cannot conscientiously say to myself that it is likely to prevent the obstruction; I cannot foresee what the result of my action will be; but it is up to me to do my best, to do all I can towards helping to prevent that obstruction." In other words, he has to do what he can; he has to take action which in his opinion will tend to prevent the obstruction. The word 'likely' in fact is equivalent to 'probable' in this case; and the wording 'tends to' is perhaps slightly stronger than 'possibly.' That is all. We cannot be certain that his action will probably prevent a breach of the peace, and yet, my friend by suggesting the omission of the words

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.]

'tends to prevent' will prevent him from taking any action, though he has come to the conclusion that an obstruction is imminent, that he must take immediate steps and if he does not he will be called into question, no doubt by his own Local Government, for not having after all done anything whatever to prevent the obstruction. Therefore, I suggest that these words 'tends to prevent' must remain and that there is no risk whatever of their being used in the fashion in which the Honourable Mover has suggested.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That in clause 26 add the following sub-clause after the present sub-clause (i):
'(iii) in sub-section (1) the words 'or tends to prevent' shall be omitted'."

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, my next amendment is:

"That in sub-section (1) the word 'annoyance' wherever it occurs shall be omitted."

I think I am treading on very safe ground in proposing this amendment. Perhaps I was quite safe in my previous amendment also, but it has met with a contrary fate; but I think I am on the safest ground in proposing this thing. In giving such summary powers, such clear executive powers, why should we give power to order not only something that removes any annoyance but something that is likely to prevent, that tends to prevent an annoyance?

We have got here the words 'obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury to any person lawfully employed, or danger to human life, health or safety.' Therefore 'annoyance' here means something that is not covered by injury to human life, injury to human health or injury to human safety. Sir, if there is anything that causes annoyance the doors of the regular courts are open to everybody to take any steps he likes. So where is the reason, where is the justification for saying to a man 'Look here, I am annoyed by such and such action of yours. I will go to the Magistrate and get an order issued against you.' Suppose there is a marriage going on in the house of a rich man, and the tom tom is being beaten near by. Another man may have some influence with the Magistrate; he goes to him and writes a letter saying that 'so and so is beating his tom tom, which causes great annoyance to me.' The Magistrate goes forth and says 'thou shalt not beat thy tom tom!' No doubt the order is only for two months, but to a person who is stopped from celebrating his festivities in connection with his son's or daughter's marriage, it means a great thing. Similarly, a man gets up at 5 o'clock in the morning and begins to sing. It causes annoyance to me. Well, the Magistrate to whom I complain, goes forth and issues an order to stop him from singing in the mornings at 5 o'clock because a speedy remedy is necessary, because so and so is annoyed. I really cannot understand what you mean by speedy remedy and immediate prevention consistently with the idea of annoyance where no danger to human life or health or safety or obstruction or injury is concerned, or where there is no danger of a disturbance of the public peace or tranquillity. I for one really fail to see how on earth we can put in this word in this section. I hope therefore that my Honourable friends will consider well and vote for this amendment.

Mr. R. A. Spence: Sir, I oppose this amendment for the reasons put forward by the Honourable Mover of it. I consider that if this word 'annoyance' is left out, and if the Magistrate has not got powers to prevent people from committing annoyances, there is a very great danger of loss of life and possibly of loss of property. What we propose to do in our law is to prevent crimes as far as possible. There might be many other crimes committed, because people lose their temper owing to annoyance caused by the beating of tom toms, and I think that, should a Magistrate be of the opinion that annoyance is being committed which is likely to cause some one to commit a breach of the peace, then it is a very sensible law that the Magistrate should be able to stop that man from committing such annoyance. Therefore, if this clause is left out, I think there will be a danger of loss of life and loss of property to which the Honourable Mover of the amendment so feelingly referred. Therefore, I hope that Honourable Members in this House will not be of the opinion of the Mover of the amendment and that they will not give him that favourable consideration which we should like to give him if only we agreed with him.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I should like to supplement, if I may, in two words, what my Honourable friend, Mr. Spence, has just said. I must say that when I heard Bhai Man Singh's speech, it did occur to me what a bad Magistrate he would make; for he thinks of a variety of things which would never enter the mind of one of our Magistrates. Could he really imagine that a Magistrate would pass an order in favour of a rich man that no body should beat a tom tom in the vicinity of his wedding?

Bhai Man Singh: Such orders are daily passed.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: All I can say is, that if Magistrates do exist to whom such considerations occur, then I have never met them.

But, why do we desire the retention of the word 'annoyance'? I can answer it by referring to what Mr. Rangachariar said this morning. He realised that under section 144 a Magistrate has very often to deal with cases of a religious origin, and there is no greater source of trouble in certain parts of the country than cases in which one person sets out to cause annoyance to another religious community. I put it that action of this kind is not and would not be covered by the words of the section unless we retain the word 'annoyance'. It is simply for that reason that I think the retention of this word is salutary, and I commend it to the Assembly on that ground and on that ground alone.

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, the amendment that stands in my name reads as follows:

"In clause 26, the present sub-clause (iii) in the proposed sub-section (5) omit all the words after 'showing cause against the order' and re-insert them as sub-section (7) in the form given below, and add the following and re-number the sub-section (5) as sub-section (8):

'and on his so appearing either in person or by pleader, the Magistrate shall proceed to inquire into the truth of the information upon which action has been taken and to take such further evidence that may be adduced'."

I think the last words "that may be adduced" have been omitted, and I may be permitted to add them, because the sentence is incomplete without them.

"(6) Such inquiry shall be made, as nearly as may be practicable in the manner hereinafter prescribed for conducting trials and recording evidence in summons cases."

[Bhai Man Singh.]

"(7) If, upon such inquiry being made the Magistrate is satisfied that the order should stand wholly or partially it shall pass an order to that effect, otherwise it will accept the application and while passing any such order about the application the Magistrate shall record his reasons in writing for doing so."

I also beg leave of the Chair to alter the word 'it' to 'he', because it is a clear mistake—I do not know whether it is my mistake, or it is my typist's mistake or it is of the printers here.

The object of my amendment, Sir, is very clear. I want that when a man is asked to show cause, and when he appears and objects to the order and files an application, that order should stand, and he should be given full opportunity to produce his evidence as in a summons trial, and the order of the Magistrate in disposing of the application should be like a judgment, really speaking in the sense in which we have got the word 'judgment' in the Criminal Procedure Code. I do not know, Sir, how the learned members of the Joint Committee in this respect 3 P.M. tried to keep on the section as a mere executive thing in the Criminal Procedure Code. I should like to read out the note of the Joint Committee on this clause:

"We accept the amendment made in section 144 by this clause. It was suggested to us that section 144 should be elaborated so as to enable a person aggrieved on an order made under the section to require the Magistrate to make a judicial inquiry regarding the truth of the information on which he had acted and thereby to bring in the revisional powers of the High Court. With the exception of Saiyid Raza Ali we think this proposal goes too far and that it is necessary to maintain the executive character of the provisions under section 144."

This shows clearly, Sir, what is the object of avoiding such like provisions in the section and keeping it the mere summary thing. We are, however, prepared and we have proposed an amendment to this effect, to lay down that a person aggrieved shall be entitled to apply to the Magistrate and show cause against an order and that the Magistrate shall give him an opportunity to be heard in person or by pleader and shall record his order in writing giving his reasons for his rulings. Sir, there is absolutely no use in taking half-hearted measures in adopting half measures in such matters. If it was the business of the Magistrate to see to it, where was the use of providing that he should record his reasons or anything of that sort, if you think that he should be altogether unchecked and uncontrolled in this matter? If his discretion is to be a judicial discretion in the real sense of the word, I see absolutely no reason why we should avoid the writing of evidence in such cases.

Sir, while speaking on my first amendment to section 144 I submitted to the House a long list of rulings wherein the High Courts have consistently held that the Magistrate should take evidence before passing orders and in cases where there had been convictions the High Courts have required that there should be very credible evidence on the file to show that such and such dangers were actually apprehended otherwise they have quashed the convictions under 188 for disobedience of such orders. I submit, Sir, that, if the Magistrate shall have the right evidence, if the man disobeys the order in order to secure his conviction, I see absolutely no reason why he should shrink from doing so at this preliminary stage when the original order is being passed. It is all very well to say: "all these are summary proceedings, these are very minor things." But, Sir, how on earth is it to be tested? At present, as I submit, Sir, there is only an intricate method of testing the validity of such orders, that is through revision. Some of us have sent in amendments to provide for revision or an appeal against this order by itself and if we are to have any revision or appeal to this order we must make this provision here also that the Magistrate should take the proper evidence in the case. I cannot imagine why such evidence should not be taken. If there is danger of annoyance, if there is danger to the public safety, if there is danger of a breach of the public peace, why should the Magistrate try to keep his information secret? Why should the executive action fear the light of the sun and try to issue its orders in darkness? Where is the ground in giving such powers to the Magistrate that he should not write any evidence and should maintain or quash his own orders. I should really feel obliged if any of the Honourable Members from the Government would tell me the substantial injury, the substantial loss that would occur if the Magistrate is required to write evidence in such cases. The worst criminals, when they are required to procure security, are given that chance. Their trial is to be according to a summons trial as provided in the courts. I for one, Sir, cannot understand why on earth should we leave this section as it is and let the Magistrate decide arbitrarily whether he should or should not do. I submit, Sir, that this is just in the spirit of what our highest courts have held and while we are amending this section, we should not let this point escape and should bring in the spirit of these rulings in the courts itself.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 26, the present sub-clause (iii) in the proposed sub-section (5) omit all the words after 'shewing cause against the order' and reinsert them as sub-section (7) in the form given below, and add the following and renumber the sub-section (5) as sub-section (8):

'and on his so appearing either in person or by pleader, the Magistrate shall proceed to inquire into the truth of the information upon which action has been taken and to take such further evidence that may be adduced.'

'(6) Such inquiry shall be made, as nearly as may be practicable in the manner hereinafter prescribed for conducting trials and recording evidence in summons cases.'

'(7) If, upon such inquiry being made the Magistrate is satisfied that the order should stand wholly or partially he shall pass an order to that effect, otherwise it will accept the application and while passing any such order about the application the Magistrate shall record his reasons in writing for doing so.'

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, with regard to the provisions which have been so strongly criticised by my friend, Bhai Man Singh, I think it is necessary to remember that under every criminal law, under the criminal jurisprudence of every civilised country, there are first the penal provisions which punish a man who has committed an offence, and there are other subsidiary provisions which enable the authorities to prevent the commission of crimes and also others which will prevent the disturbance of public tranquillity. Now, the question is whether we should have in this Code provisions which come under the head of those that prevent disturbances of public tranquillity. Now, if in enacting those provisions, we were to take up the position that we were trying offenders and the inquiry should assume the form of a trial, whether a summons case or a warrant case whatever it may be, that it should take the form of a trial, we must then contemplate to what extent this inquiry will be enlarged. Now, I ask you, apart from being technical lawyers—as ordinary men—do you think that provision like these should assume the form of trials? Are not these provisions intended to be taken when a responsible officer thinks that there is a disturbance of tranquillity and the other things mentioned in the clause? Now, when he suddenly comes to the conclusion—and these conclusions can only be come to on the spur of the moment or on the occurrence of things which could not be anticipated—then what advantage is there for the men who are prevented from exercising those alleged legal rights to let the proceedings take the form of a regular trial. Will it profit them, will it advance the cause of peace in the locality, or will there be any good in giving these the form of trials? Now, it is in that view that this section is very important. And the amendment that was made, that is the addition that was made, was in reference to the view which has been frequently expressed that this section has been put to uses which were not originally so fully contemplated, in order to enable those who are interested in these proceedings to know and also the higher authorities to judge whether officers taking action under these sections had exercised a fair amount of discretion and applied their minds to the facts which gave occasion for the order. Therefore, if the House approves that this provision is a provision which is to be used in an emergency in order not to punish people but to prevent an apprehended danger or disturbance, then I think the line of criticism adopted against this provision would not be justified. But if this provision is to be treated as a penal provision and subjected to the scrutiny of an appellate court, if this order is to be treated as a sentence on conviction against the person and higher authority is to sit on this matter as an appellate court, then I think those who bring themselves into this provision are not likely to be benefited, because the action would have been taken, and after the action has been taken and the prevention has been enforced the inquiry is going to begin. What is the advantage? Immediate action is, what is wanted and what is probably not refused even by my friend, Mr. Man Singh. After that immediate action has been taken what is the advantage of having a regular inquiry? Is it to demonstrate to the world that the Magistrate has exercised his discretion wrongly or is it to benefit the person aggrieved? Therefore, I think that these elaborate provisions which my Honourable friend wants to tack on to this section will really do no good, and so I think it is best to leave the clause as it stands.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I differ from the last speaker, the Honourable Mr. Subrahmanayam that in the case of preventive measures no proof or evidence is necessary. I agree with him that this is a preventive step no doubt. In emergent cases, where promptitude is required, as I have already submitted, that preventive measures are generally effective. But when he says that no judicial proof is necessary, and that no inquiry, so far as the taking of evidence is concerned, is necessary, I join issue with him. When I see the opinion of the Select Committee, when they say in clear words that the character of these proceedings is executive, I feel surprised. If any witness in those proceedings tells a lie he will be hauled up under section 193 (of the Penal Code). If you hold, Sir, that these are judicial proceedings, then any statement which is made will be made on oath, and in order to come to a determination in regard to the conduct of the man proceeded against, the proceedings will be given the character of a judicial proceeding, and in spite of there being no proof, a decision is given against him, then that decision, I submit, will be wrong. The argument that has been very strenuously set forth by the last speaker is, "Of what avail would it be if an elaborate inquiry and a proper investigation be made." In reply I may say that the good of it would be that the man who is feeling aggrieved, and who is affected by that order, will realise that he put forward the whole of his evidence, and that the Magistrate has come to the conclusion after hearing them. This will more or less be a satisfaction to him. But if he is debarred from putting forward his evidence, then certainly he will say that justice has not been done to him. And on the top of it what will be the effect on the public mind? They will think that orders are being passed simply in accordance with the whim or sentiment and opinion of the Magistrate and no proof is taken. Then the Honourable the Opposer of this amendment says, "It is purely discretionary. The Magistrate is allowed to exercise his discretion." Certainly the Magistrate should be allowed to exercise his discretion. In connection with an amendment which was moved some time back I submitted to the House and I am reiterating the same submission that the discretion should be based on some data. The discretion should not emanate from the mentality of the Magistrate alone. The discretion, in any case, must be based on the inference which is to be drawn from the material on the record, and if this discretion is based on some proof on record, and has been exercised judicially, then certainly it must be respected. The Court of revision will take it as a true and proper discretion, namely, the High Court will then feel reluctant to interfere. But if this discretion is to be exercised in the manner in which my learned friend wishes, then, I say, his view is erroneous. It is altogether wrong. My learned friend opposed this amendment on this ground and I think that that ground is a fallacious one. Look at the stringency of the law which is embodied in this section. Arguments have already been advanced by the Mover, with reference to certain words and the natural consequence thereof, and I, sympathising with those arguments, submit that the present law, as is incorporated in section 144, has invited a great amount of criticism. It has evoked that criticism which it is extremely difficult to meet with. I submit that the amendment, which has been proposed, is a very modest one and will be a good safeguard, and I think the Government will be pleased to accept it. Where is the difficulty in accepting this sort of amendment? It (the amendment) suggests, "and on his so appearing either in person or by pleader, the Magistrate shall proceed to inquire into the truth of the information". Are the Government Benchers really serious to say that he should not inquire into the truth? I think they will accept my contention that the Magistrate ought and should inquire into the truth of the information. Unless and until he finds the truth of the allegations he should not pass the order. Then clause No. 6 says:

"Such inquiry shall be made, as nearly as may be practicable, in the manner hereinafter prescribed for conducting trials and recording evidence in summons cases."

All of you know, Sir, that this is a very innocent form of procedure. It does not mean that a regular charge will be framed and after framing the charge the witnesses will be recalled for cross-examination once more.

Then my learned friend, the Opposer of this amendment, says, "Oh, what is the use of a regular trial?" I may tell him that real trial begins after framing the charge. But here trial means that evidence will be recorded and the Magistrate will come to certain conclusion after having gone through that evidence. It is not a regular trial which we find in warrant cases, because a charge is framed, the accused is called upon to explain and then to adduce evidence. Similarly sub-clause (7) is also of a very modest nature.

"If upon such inquiry being made the Magistrate is satisfied that the order should stand wholly or partially it shall pass an order to that effect."

[Dr. Nand Lal.]

I think the whole House will agree with this view which has been suggested and recommended. If after having gone into all these materials he is satisfied, that the order should stand, it may be done so. Now what is the difficulty in the way of accepting this innocent sort of amendment? It will set at naught the criticism which has been levelled against section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Therefore with these few remarks I support this amendment very strongly.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I rise to oppose the amendment. I believe it will not be necessary to make more than a very few remarks to support those made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam. Let us remember, Sir, what this section deals with. It deals with cases in which immediate prevention or speedy remedy is desirable. In such cases the order absolute has already issued. That order will only remain in force for 2 months. Under sub-section (4) of section 145 of the Code as it stands at present, the Magistrate has power to rescind or alter the order which he has made. The Joint Committee inserted a provision in that sub-section to enable the Magistrate to take such action either suo motu or else on the application of the person aggrieved. Then in sub-section (5) the Joint Committee has provided for the action which they consider should be taken when the person aggrieved appears before the Magistrate. In place of these provisions, the Honourable Member proposes to introduce the whole paraphernalia of a summons trial, and that, in a case of an order which is to remain in force for two months only. I submit, Sir, that the proposal would entirely change the character of the provisions of this Chapter and would involve a gross waste of time.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Much as I have reason to be despondent, I rise again with full optimism in moving my amendment which is as follows:

"In clause 26 after sub-clause (iii) insert the following sub-clause:

'(iv) after sub-clause (6) as renumbered the following shall be inserted as sub-section (7), namely:

'(7) In all cases where action is taken under this section preventing a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings a report shall forthwith be made to the Sessions Judge who may call for and examine the record of any proceeding for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the same, and pass such orders as he thinks fit.'"

When I look behind me for my followers, they have deserted me. They have deserted me, nearly 60 of them are quietly absent in their homes—60 of the so-called people's representatives. Is it any wonder that people outside threaten to repudiate debts contracted by this Assembly when their representatives choose to absent themselves like this, on important occasions? Sir, I said I am not despondent. Although I am like a general without soldiers, I see in front of me gentlemen to whose intellect I am going to make an appeal and I rely on their sense of gallantry that they will receive a general without soldiers with open arms and make honourable peace with him. Sir, the amendment which I move is an old friend, he is coming up again. (Mr. J. P. Cotelingam: "Sessions Judge.") It is with reference to the use of these executive sections for preventing meetings being held or preventing people from addressing meetings. Sir, it must be admitted that the credit for applying this section to public meetings and to public speakers belongs not to the Government of India but to the Burma Government, the Upper Burma Government. Some Magistrate in Upper Burma in the year of grace 1916 for the first time applied this section to prevent a meeting being held. That was the solitary instance in which section 144 was applied till the eventful year of 1921, the latter part of which saw the use of this section spreading like plague and other diseases all over the country. One of the objections raised the other day was that we single out this out of the lot, as my Honourable friend for whose opinion I have got very great respect pointed out, I mean Sir Henry Stanyon. Why we single out this out of all the rest is answered by this fact, namely, that it is a novel use of this section—you will agree with me that it is a novel use of section 144 to prevent citizens from exercising their elementary rights of either addressing their co-citizens or holding meetings. Sir, some of my legal friends had their legal conscience very much perturbed, especially my Honourable friend, Mr. Mukherjee, that I spoke of action being taken, that I spoke of action being taken to prevent a person from addressing or holding meetings. They said, "Oh! What bad language you have used? Under section 107 action is not taken, but order is passed. Therefore your language is wrong. Under section 107 action is not taken to prevent a meeting being held or to prevent a person from addressing a meeting, but to get security for keeping the peace. Therefore your language is unhappy." Therefore, they said it is out of place in section 107. I am glad to be able to satisfy them in that respect so far as section 144 is concerned. Magistrate acts under this section. Magistrate prevents a person from doing a particular act. Therefore, those two technical objections which were taken advantage of even on the Government Benches disappear. Now, the third objection taken was, "What an ineffective remedy you are providing? A report to the Sessions Judge!" Well, he reports to the Sessions Judge. It may be based on materials or it may be based on no materials. What is the Sessions Judge to do? It is said what is the object of this remedy? It is so ineffective. Do you really believe that the Government think it is ineffective? If it is so ineffective, why do they oppose it? If it is such a harmless remedy that I am proposing, why do they oppose it? Have we not got reason to suspect that there is something behind this opposition? Do they not think this is going to be a good remedy? Are they not afraid of it? When you find the Government arguing that it is an ineffective remedy, we are men, we are not children, and we might suspect really that they believe it is going to be an effective remedy and that is why they oppose it. Therefore, Sir, these are the objections taken to this provision when applied to section 107. Under section 144 there may be an ex parte order; there may be a final order afterwards. In both those cases the Magistrate will have some material to go upon because he has to record his reasons, he has to record the statement of facts. And moreover further proceedings are contemplated by later amendments to the Procedure Code which provide for revision. Therefore it will not be a case in which there will be no papers for the Sessions Judge to act upon. There will be records to go upon. Therefore the Sessions Judge will be able to cancel proceedings in case they are improperly taken; when he is satisfied the proceedings are improperly taken. There is one other objection. I look with trembling feet to my friend, Mr. Samarth, who is now out of his place. I hope he will be out of his place in the lobby also this time. He thinks this is a weapon I am inventing for the benefit of the non-cooperators. I am not sure my friend will not one day be caught in the same meshes in which other people are caught. I know his sense of patriotism. When this Royal Commission comes along and when perhaps we shall have to organise a procession to the Viceroy's residence in the same way as the unemployed did to the Premier's house, I am not sure he will not join that procession. That section will then come into effect, and the District Magistrate of Delhi, who is I think called the Deputy Commissioner, will serve an order on my friend, Mr. Samarth: "How dare you lead a procession protesting against the appointment of the Royal Commission?" I heard my friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, saying this was a power which belonged to other countries. I have yet to find a section in the English procedure which empowers the Magistrates to interfere in processions or meetings.

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Rao Bahadur O. S. Subrahmanayam: The police, not the Magistrates.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The police have power to interfere in case of actual disturbances. They are ready with their batons and not with their fire-arms. Batons are their weapons when these enormous crowds assemble in the various squares. Magistrates of the first class do not serve orders on Mr. Ramsay Macdonald or even on Mr. Keir Hardie preventing them from holding meetings. And my European friends, whose assistance I also implore in this connection are noted for their love of liberty; I know they will not lose their liberty in this country or in any other country, and I appeal to them also to join hands with me in this matter. Sir, liberty of speech, liberty to hold meetings is a sacred right. When that right is sought to be destroyed, when it is sought to put it down under foot in this manner in which it has been done, when the Government confesses its impotence to deal with crowds while they have got such eminently highly-paid police and military to look after the peace of the country, when they think action under section 144 is necessary in order to prevent some speeches in a country where mild Hindus predominate, Sir, I am despondent about the Government. I ask them to look at it from that point of view. There are Magistrates and Magistrates who take different views of different matters. Why, Sir, the wearing of khaddar is obnoxious. If you put on a Gandhi cap, as it is called, it annoys, it wounds, and directly an order is passed under section 144 to remove the cap. Is our Indian Government so weak that they should resort to such silly method? Sir, I therefore say we must provide a remedy for this. I hope I have not over-stated the case. If I have, please forgive me, but this is a very vital matter. I hope you will find some remedy for the extraordinary use of these sections. I am confident that the remedy I have proposed is not as efficient as I might have made it. I purposely refrained from other remedies. I purposely refrained from suggesting that the section should not be used for such purposes, because, as I stated the other day, there may be cases when actual incitement to rebellion may take place in meetings, in which case section 144 might legitimately be used. Short of that I do not think it should be used. When it is used for such a purpose, is it not just, does it not occur to you that it is necessary that there should be some safeguard by some superior authority? What is the harm in providing this remedy I suggest, namely, that the records go to the Sessions Judge, who is a senior servant of your own, to bring his judicial mind to bear on the subject and see whether the action has been rightly taken under this section or not. May I therefore in my despondent spirits appeal to the Government Benches and my Honourable colleagues who are presenting an organised front before me, and a disorganised force behind me, to give to this modest motion the treatment which it deserves. I move the amendment which stands in my name.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Sir, I confess to a novel and refreshing feeling of pleasure when I hear a leader of that large and compact body of voters, whom we see so often leading his cohorts into the lobby against us, appeal to us to be merciful and not to use our strength. We are so accustomed to come into this Assembly a faithful little band of voters, prepared to encounter an enormous and determined majority on the other side, that we can hardly credit our ears when we hear that it is we who are strong, we who must not use our voting power, we who must for once listen to reason. But I feel great sympathy for Mr. Rangachariar. As he pathetically says, he stands alone. His forces are dissipated; his followers are gone. Might I suggest a remedy to him? Here is a place for him on the Government Benches; let him join us over this Bill; he may be certain that we at all events do not neglect our posts. Our faithful few are always here, and, if you do not see their faces, yet you know that they are close at hand, within call of a bell. If he will join us, he will never want followers.

But to the point, we have been through a great deal of this amendment before. We have heard before, in regard to section 107, many of the arguments which Mr. Rangachariar has addressed to us to-day. If we were hard-hearted then we curiously enough found adherents in the House. Could it have been that we and not Mr. Rangachariar were for once in the right? At all events, we are equally hard-hearted on this occasion also. Mr. Rangachariar might perhaps have had some arguable case in regard to section 107, by which an order can be passed against an individual, binding him over for a period of a year. He might have had some justification for claiming that the circumstances justified this new revisionary procedure, the order to protect the liberty of action of that particular person. But here, what does the Magistrate do? He issues an order for two months only. Mr. Rangachariar would have the proceedings of the Magistrate sent to the Sessions Judge. Meanwhile the person affected will under our new clause have asked the Magistrate to review his own order; by the time the order has become absolute some considerable period will have elapsed. Three-quarters of the mischief will be done, at all events before the Sessions Judge can get to work on the case. Mr. Rangachariar suggests that he and some of his friends might intend to go in procession to-morrow to His Excellency the Viceroy to protest against the appointment of Royal Commission; and draws a picture of the District Magistrate issuing an order under this section against him. I would advise them not to do so, because, I understand, that His Excellency will be absent from Delhi to-morrow. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "We will wait on you then.") But even if they should contemplate doing so, I do not think they need fear that the District Magistrate of Delhi will issue an order against them; for judging by to-day's confession the band will be so small that he will hardly notice its existence in the street. But seriously even if we had this procedure Mr. Rangachariar desires to introduce, what would happen? The District Magistrate would issue his order to Mr. Rangachariar. Mr. Rangachariar, using our new sections (4) and (5), would go to the District Magistrate and make an application for review. The District Magistrate after making due inquiry, would make his order absolute. The papers would be sent to the Sessions Judge. Clearly, even if Mr. Rangachariar secured the good offices of the Sessions Judge, it would be a long time before he had access to His Excellency the Viceroy.

I have used this illustration to show really how little ground there is for applying this revisionary procedure in the case of proceedings so essentially emergent in their nature and temporary in their effect. I do not here again seek to defend any action that we have taken under section 144. I do not again refer the House to the fact that Mr. Rangachariar himself advised us to use section 144. He had, I may say, predecessors in the advice which he gave us. I remind him of the debates in the Legislative Council on the subject of the amendment of the Seditious Meetings Act. On that occasion, there were authorities no less than the late Mr. Gokhale, who advised that we should use the existing sections of the Act, and I remember that it fell from the lips of Mr. Mazrui Huque himself that section 144 was sufficient for all our purposes. But that, Sir, was section 144 as it then stood. When our friends advised us then to use section 141, they contemplated section 144 in its original form; they did not, I think, ever contemplate that it should become a semi-judicial proceeding, liable to a new form of revision at the hands of the Sessions Judge. Regretfully then, in spite of all my sympathy with Mr. Rangachariar in the unhappy circumstances in which he finds himself, I ask the House to re-affirm the decision on this subject which they gave three days ago.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, there has been so much good humour in the speeches which have been delivered on this amendment, that I am afraid to sound a note of seriousness in the discussion in regard to this question. Sir, none the less, there is a feeling of consternation in the country regarding the use of section 144 and I do not think I would be justified in keeping the Government ignorant of that feeling. Mr. Rangachariar's amendment would have this effect—it would check the vagaries of the Magistrates; it would enable the Sessions Judge to examine the records and come to a conclusion whether the Magistrate has acted rightly or wrongly. It is for that purpose that my Honourable friend has brought forward this amendment.

Sir, I should like briefly to explain the reason for the enactment of this section and how it is being misused. I think I am right in saying that you do not find a similar power in England, a power similar to the one which is given by section 144. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "That is right.") I think I am right in that, and I am glad to hear the Honourable the Home Member supporting me in that. The reason why section 144 has been enacted in this country is this. It was felt that the rights of advancing the ordinary citizen's rights should be secured as against the possible attacks of turbulent and unruly men who may feel tempted to take the law into their own hands. It was felt that in a country like India, where there are numerous sects and numerous religions, it is possible that the rights of one sect may be interfered with by persons belonging to another sect who are larger in number, more disciplined and who have got larger resources at their disposal. Therefore, the object of enacting section 144 was to enable the minority, who have got rights, to exercise those rights without being harassed or put down by the larger section which has got money and influence behind its back. It was for the purpose of giving this facility for the exercise of rights of the minority that this section was introduced, and you will find in the case which was quoted this morning, 6 Madras, that the Judges of the Madras High Court pointed out that the section must be used for the purpose of advancing rights and not for curbing or putting down rights.

Now, that must be the position which ought to be taken up by the Government. But, unfortunately, the section has been so used during the last two years that Magistrates have begun to forget why it was enacted. They have begun to forget that the object was to advance the rights of citizens; and they have begun to think that the object is simply to put down the exercise of those rights. And you will find all over the country that Magistrates are on the alert and are on the look-out to get police information or some other information for the purpose of preventing the exercise of these rights. Sir, this has gone on too long and it has created, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, a sort of consternation in the country; and it is desirable that the Government should know what the feeling in the country is. I believe they know it and, as we have not the power of saying that this section cannot be used at all, I think we should accept the modest amendment that Mr. Rangachariar has brought forward that there should be a power vested in the Sessions Judge to call for the records and examine for himself as to whether the section has been used for the purpose of advancing justice or for the purpose of stifling it.

Sir, there is only one other word I should like to say and I will sit down, and it is this.

It has been said, and very rightly, in responsible quarters that the Government is doing itself injustice by allowing this section to be used in the manner in which it is used. I believe the Government is aware of what is known as the "safety valve." It would be very much better for the machinery itself, for the proper working of the machinery as well as for the safety of the machinery, that there should be a safety valve. If the safety valve is not allowed to work, the result will be that the machinery itself will break down; and I think that by putting down public meetings, by not allowing persons to speak at public meetings and by not allowing them to have their say, the Government is not doing justice to itself, but are rather impairing the efficiency of the administration. There is already great discontent in the country and I believe the Government can do a great deal to allay that discontent by modifying section 144 in the way we have suggested; and as Mr. Rangachariar would have put it, I implore the Government to see that some safeguard is provided; otherwise I fear there is great danger of the whole machinery of Government being wrecked.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, there is just one aspect of the case which, I think, has not been fully brought out. It is this—several Honourable Members say that the Magistrates are not carrying out the law properly—that is to say, they are taking advantage of section 144 to enforce certain propositions which are not intended by the Code. But I do not find any statement by Honourable Members to the effect that the High Courts have held that the Magistrates were in any way justified in doing anything which would bring the law into contempt. That is to say, the objection taken is chiefly that the Magistrates are not carrying out the law correctly. The High Courts, for instance, have laid down the circumstances calling for an order under section 144. There must, they say, be some emergency, and an order passed when there is no emergency is without jurisdiction. Then again they say that the existence of such an emergency is a condition precedent to the Magistrate having power to proceed. There must be information or evidence to that effect, and the facts must be set forth in the order fully and in detail.

[Mr. P. E. Percival.]

My observations have reference not only to the remarks of the last speaker but also to some previous remarks that have been made. In fact, the High Courts have already laid down certain restrictions. They go on to say that, if no immediate danger is apprehended, the Magistrate should proceed under section 133 and not under this section. So I submit, Sir, that the only remedy is to apply to the High Courts. The High Courts are the proper authority. If the High Courts say that the provisions of the law are not sufficient, it is of course up to Government to amend them. But what we find is the contrary. They say that in certain cases some Magistrates have not acted according to the law. The obvious inference is that the correct action to take is to apply to the High Courts and to get them to keep in check unruly Magistrates who do not act in accordance with the law as laid down by the various High Courts.

Well, Sir, turning to the particular amendment in this case, I am a little surprised that my friend Mr. Rangachariar should again bring up the same point, because it is really very similar to the one which has been decided by this House already. The chief argument, which I ventured to put forward on the previous occasion, I suggest, the Honourable Member has not really replied to. It is simply this, that cases of this sort do not go to the Sessions Judge. The Sessions Judge is quite a separate authority. The two authorities are the District Magistrate and the High Court. So why bring in the Sessions Judge, who is not the authority concerned in the case? The present proposal is that in certain particular cases involving meetings, the matter should go to the Sessions Judge, but that in all other cases it should go to the District Magistrate and the High Court. That was the view I suggested in regard to section 107. It is the same point here. As the Honourable the Home Member said, the case is stronger now. It is an order for two months, while the order under section 107 might be for a prolonged period. But the underlying principle is in either case the same. It is a matter, for the District Magistrate and the High Court. Therefore I suggest that, as on the previous occasion this House threw out the proposal of Mr. Rangachariar, the same course should now be adopted in regard to the present amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I venture to place certain points before this Honourable House. I stand up in spite of what has been said by my redoubtable friend opposite me and I do so with my courage in my hands. I want to draw the attention of the House to one feature of the proposed amendment. The portion of the amendment which requires special consideration comes last, and there I suppose lies the most contentious point in the whole amendment. I refer to the words "the Sessions Judge may pass such orders as he thinks fit." I take it that thereby a new power is proposed to be given to the Sessions Judge, so far as the revision of the orders prohibiting public meetings, is concerned. Now, Sir, looking at section 435 of the Code, to which I had the honour of drawing the attention of the House the other day, in connection with a similar point, I find that orders passed under section 144 do not come within the purview of that section. I looked at the proposed amendments in the tabled list with regard to this section and I asked myself whether it was contemplated that this section 435 should be amended so as to bring cases under section 144 within its scope. But I found there was no amendment to that effect in the list.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: There is a proposal to that effect.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I have an amendment about that.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: My friend's amendment is to the effect that the whole of sub-clause (iii) in clause 114 be deleted.

Dr. H. S. Gour: That is enough.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: That is not enough. If the amendment be carried, and the whole sub-clause is deleted, this section 435 remains as it is in the Code now, and under this section, as it stands now, revision of orders passed under section 144, Criminal Procedure Code, is not permissible. No doubt, an attempt has been made in the Bill to extend to some extent the operation of section 435 by introducing certain other sections, namely, section 143 and so forth in sub-clause (iii), but so far as section 144 is concerned, it does not make any alteration whatsoever even supposing that my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour's amendment is accepted, that is to say, that sub-clause (iii) is omitted. I wish therefore to draw the attention of the House to this point.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: That is not an insuperable difficulty.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: No, it is not. I say if the House agrees to accept the principle of the proposed amendment and decides that revisional powers should exist in the Sessions Judge, with regard to section 144, Criminal Procedure Code, means can be improvised by which that difficulty can be obviated. But the point is one, which, I think I ought to clearly bring to the notice of the House in order that something may be done to avoid the complications and the inconsistencies—if I may say so—which are bound to arise, if my friend's amendment is adopted.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, I trust that what I have to say on this amendment will not lose me the good opinion which my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has been pleased to offer about my judgment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Certainly not.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: The less one deserves a benefit of that kind the more one wants to hold on to it. The pathos in his appeal moved me very deeply, and if I allowed my heart to have any part in dealing with the manufacture of laws I should probably draw my sword and take my position behind the deserted "General".

But in my humble opinion, feelings, emotions and sentiments are out of place in dealing with a measure of this kind. What we have to see is the effect upon the administration of justice of this proposed amendment. The position of the Honourable Mover is quite different here to what it was in connection with a similar amendment which he proposed when we were discussing section 107. But, in my humble opinion it is not any stronger. I have not been impressed by the argument which has been used, more than once, that there is no provision of this kind to be found in the English law. I think it is high time that we understood clearly that what is sauce for the British goose is not sauce for the Indian gander. I do not put that forward as propaganda but merely as my humble opinion. Here we are dealing with section 144, a measure which provides for action, immediate and prompt, to meet an emergency. Any order, however absolute, under that section has a life of exactly two months. Now, suppose that this amendment were introduced in the law. Suppose that when, after inquiry, the Magistrate has made his order absolute, he is required to report the proceedings to the Sessions Judge, and the Sessions Judge thought one way, or the other, before he passed any orders. If he acted upon the usual line of Sessions Judges, a judicial line, he would issue notice to one party or the other, or to both parties, to appear before him and argue their respective cases. He would not set aside the order of the Magistrate without issuing a rule to him to show cause. He would not support an order of the Magistrate without issuing a rule to the person against whom that order was made to show cause. How long does this Honourable House think the Sessions Judge would be occupied in completing this procedure? Sir, we have heard it said that there are Magistrates and Magistrates and I myself have accepted responsibility for saying that I have met them "from A to Z." There are also Sessions Judges and Sessions Judges, and I have met them "from Z to A." But, as a general rule, they are authorities who proceed in a judicial manner with care and deliberation and take time. In nine cases out of ten, before the Sessions Judge passed his order, the Magistrate's order itself would have died from efflux of time. Then, another point against this amendment is that it is the one breach of the rule which we find in the Code of not allowing such slow judicial interference with the executive and preventive action of Magistrates; and I think to introduce it here would not do any good to the public or to the administration of justice; but would hamper Magistrates and put Sessions Judges in a position of considerable difficulty. For these reasons, even at the risk which I feared at the opening of my remarks, I venture to oppose this amendment.

Mr. R. A. Spence: I move that the question be now put.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, before this very important question is put to the vote, I should like to say a few words in support of this amendment. I was somewhat surprised to hear my Honourable friend who hails from Bombay (Mr. Percival) saying that the orders passed under section 144 are subject to the revisional jurisdiction of the High Courts. He is right so far that the Chartered High Courts exercise revisional jurisdiction on orders passed under section 144, not by virtue of any power conferred upon them by the Code of Criminal Procedure but despite that power and under the special power of general superintendence which is vested in the Chartered High Courts over all courts subordinate to them. But my friend cannot forget that all the courts in India are not Chartered High Courts and that there are courts which have to act and to derive their power under the Code of Criminal Procedure. Now, Sir, what does the Code of Criminal Procedure lay down. My friend the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee has pointed out that there is a special provision in section 435 which lays down that an order passed under section 144 is not a proceeding within the meaning of that section and what is its effect. The effect is that the order passed by a Magistrate, however wrong, erroneous and perverse it may be, is not subject to the revisional jurisdiction of the non-chartered High Courts. Can this Assembly tolerate this state of things? My friend, the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee, drew the attention of this House to an amendment tabled by me, Amendment No. 321, in which I shall ask the assistance of this House to delete that clause which prevents non-chartered High Courts to revise orders passed under section 144 and other sections of this preventive chapter of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But I do not know when that time comes whether my friend, the Honourable Mr. Percival or the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee or the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon will not forge fresh weapons from their copious armoury and find fresh arguments for the purpose of combating my amendment. If I could be sure that Sir Henry Stanyon will draw his sword and go for the Government when this amendment is moved, I shall feel some assurance that there is some hope at any rate on the other side and that they are prepared to listen to reason and give the non-chartered High Courts a jurisdiction over matters contained in section 144 and orders passed in that chapter: but can we be sure of it? Can you be sure of it? Are the Government prepared to give an undertaking that they will not use that small and compact band to vote down this amendment when it is moved and so long as we cannot be sure of it, I think we shall be justified in pressing the amendment of the Honourable Mover on my left to vote. Now, Sir, the Honourable Mr. Percival has given away the whole case by saying that an order passed under section 144 is revisable by the High Court; and when I have pointed out that it is not revisable by all the High Courts, this ground upon which my friend, the Honourable Mr. Percival, perilously stands slips from under his feet. I have not been quite clear as to what my friend, the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee, meant when he wanted to point out some technical or super-technical difficulty in the way of the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar. If I understood him aright, his point of view appears to be that the High Courts possess ordinary criminal jurisdiction over matters of this character, and it would be setting and creating a novel precedent to arm the Sessions Judge with similar revisional powers. Now, Sir, I beg to ask—it has been said this morning and said with a certain amount of cogency—that these preventive sections require a Magistrate to pass an immediate order. If that is the case, the Sessions Judge is nearer to the Magistrate than the High Courts; and I submit, therefore, if we confer upon the Sessions Judge the power to revise an order passed under this section, the procedure may be novel but it is necessary. I was somewhat surprised at that champion of popular rights and ex-Judge, Sir Henry Stanyon, standing up and saying, that though his heart was with the Mover of this Resolution, his head turned away from it. I am sure, Sir, that if he will visualise for one moment the history of the misuse of this section during the last six months or a year, and if he will bring himself to think for a moment of the huge political and public clamour that exists against the misuse of this section, I am perfectly certain, Sir, that his head will second his heart. He has said that there is no doubt that the proceedings of the Sessions Judge are judicial but they involve delay. I ask, Sir, Members of this House, what will they have,—speedy injustice or dilatory justice? I should not be unwilling to sacrifice time, I should not be unwilling even to cause a little delay if in the end the person against whom an order is passed is assured of justice. It has been said that this order is very short-lived, it can only be in force for two months, but I am sure my Honourable friend will remember cases after cases in which this order on the expiration of two months was re-affirmed and repeated, and there is nothing in the Code of Criminal Procedure to disentitle a Magistrate from passing that order again and again—and it has been done, I am told by my friends that it has been done, and I know that it has been done, and then what happens, Sir? My friend will say that if the order was of a longer duration, the Sessions Judge would be entitled to interfere. I ask him, Sir, is not that an argument in our favour for voting for the amendment when we know as a matter of fact that the short period of two months can be prolonged indefinitely by the Magistrate passing the same order on expiry of the period of two months allowed by the Statute. (An Honourable Member: "A separate order is passed each time.") We have been told, Sir, and told with a certain degree of insistence that this is an order calling for urgency, and the Honourable the Home Member has said that this is a preventive section, but I beg to ask what is the difference between a preventive and a punitive section when you repeatedly use this section for the purpose of preventing a man from the lawful exercise of his legal right? The Honourable Mover of this Resolution has pointed out cases in which this section is liable to be abused—and we know as a matter of fact that the magistracy in this country have not wisely used this section on numerous occasions. Knowing that full well as we do, will this House be oblivious of the cries raised during the last year and the year before asking for some redress in the direction of curbing the vagaries of the subordinate judiciary of this country? Are we here, small and scattered a band though we may be, are we here to lay the conviction of our minds and sacrifice our convictions on the shrine of delay, prevention and urgency? I am sure, Sir, that the Members of this House will rise to the height of this occasion. I beg of the Members to remember that this is a section which involves a great principle, and I hope that Honourable Members will conjointly rally to its support. The Honourable the Home Member, when he has a weak case, has a strong humour: not being able to defend a position assailed by a General without any host, he said that the Viceroy won't be here to-morrow,—as if my friend would be undisturbed if he allowed the procession. I am perfectly certain that if the Honourable Home Member had to grapple with the main issue, he too like Sir Henry Stanyon would draw his sword and come to our support. He has invited, Sir, the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar to a seat on the Treasury Benches and promised him the support of his small but consistent cohort. May I, Sir, reciprocate the compliment by inviting the Honourable the Home Member to an honoured place on this side of the House, if only for this occasion and support us not in the name of prestige, delay, prevention, urgency or power, but on the broad ground of commonsense and justice? Sir, I support this amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the whole of the remarks of the last speaker were based upon the difference between a High Court of Judicature and other High Courts which fall within the provisions of clause (j) of section 4 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It is true, Sir, that the Code of Criminal Procedure provides no remedy by way of revision, and that nevertheless the High Courts have held that if a Magistrate exceeds his jurisdiction under this section, then they have power to interfere in the exercise of their powers of general superintendence and control given to them by section 107 of the Government of India Act. Now, if my Honourable friend would refer to the Central Provinces Courts Act establishing the Judicial Commissioner's Court at Nagpur: if he would refer, Sir, to the Lower Burma Courts Act establishing a Chief Court in Lower Burma, and to any other of the Courts Acts in question, he will find that these powers of superintendence are given to all those High Courts.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, may I just rise to a point of order. I can inform the Honourable speaker that there has been a recent decision in the Central Provinces by a Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court negating the power of that Court to revise proceedings under this Chapter.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I would suggest, Sir, that perhaps if the case had been more fully argued before the Judicial Commissioner a different ruling would have been given. We will proceed, Sir. The basis of the interference by the High Courts with orders passed under this section is that the Magistrate had no power to pass such orders under the section; and I would suggest that there is not a single lawyer in this House who would not be able to go up to any High Court and get that Court to interfere because section 144 does not apply, which is the only reason, Sir, why the High Courts of Judicature have interfered in cases under this section.

There is another point to which I should like to refer and that is the argument that one order could be extended. I see here, Note 49 on page 262, Sohoni, that it was held in Calcutta that a Magistrate cannot by passing successive orders under this section extend the operation of an order indirectly beyond the time limited by sub-section (5).

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Sir, if I were satisfied that this clause which my Honourable friend wants to tack on would do any good, I should certainly have supported him. But I am fully convinced that this clause is not going to do any good even if, with the eloquent support it has received, it is passed. Now, the cases in which this section is frequently used are cases in which religious or caste disputes arise. Take a few concrete instances which have come under our own observation. In a place which is a Hindu stronghold a missionary comes and preaches the impropriety of worshipping idols and so on. Some years ago it was not an uncommon thing. That would naturally tend to a breach of the peace: that is, the preaching party being small and in the midst of a Hindu stronghold it would very likely be molested. In a case like that what ought a Magistrate to do? Should he not restrain the enthusiasm of the preacher? (A Voice: "Apply 107.") Well, section 107 applies to individuals, but this applies to the whole meeting. And it so happens that sometimes individuals who are restrained retire but others take their place. Or take the case of two sects of Hindus. That is not an uncommon thing, and you will find such cases reported in the Law Reports of the Madras High Court. They may have very serious differences of opinion which may have led to considerable litigation; one of these sections wants to hold a meeting, or what amounts to a meeting, in the midst of the opposing section. What is a Magistrate to do? Is he to stop it or allow it go on and permit the people to break each other's heads? After all there is a good deal of confusion and error about the right of public meeting and all that sort of thing. Where do we get this right? Which constitutional lawyer has told you that you have a right of public meeting? I can quote you Professor Dicey. He will tell you that what is called a right of public meeting is not the right which you have been describing here in this Assembly and a question like that is not a question which can really be discussed in this Assembly. As for the rights of public procession and public meeting, you have read Professor Dicey just as well as I have. But if for a moment you want to rise to heights of eloquence and appeal to the sentiments and feelings of Honourable Members here, you may, I suppose, say that our rights are being disturbed if action is to be taken under this section. But what will happen? A Magistrate passes an order and you go to the Sessions Judge. What materials will the Sessions Judge have before him for examining the propriety of the order? The Magistrate does not record detailed evidence; he has information and knowledge of all kinds placed before him: many a thing is said before him which helps him in forming an opinion: often he has his own private information and ideas: he knows the district, the area in which he is working and the temperament of the parties to the dispute. Those are the conditions under which an order like this would be passed: and if you ask the Sessions Judge to examine that order, how can he do it? That is the real point. Suppose the Sessions Judge disagrees with the order of the District Magistrate or the Magistrate who has taken action under this section, and he passes an order saying that the meeting may be held. What will happen? The Magistrate is responsible for keeping the peace, but he is told that a particular sect is to be supported in the exercise of its right to hold a meeting. In other words, he has to muster a sufficient force to support these people at a public meeting and so uphold the order of the Sessions Judge who had upset the Magistrate's order. Is that feasible in the districts? Has a Magistrate got sufficient forces under him for these sort of skirmishes? Let us examine both sides of this matter. Do not let us assume hastily that a Magistrate always exercises this power erroneously. That is not a fair assumption to make in arguing on a legislative enactment. If this Assembly were here discussing the particular case of Magistrates, then it would be a different matter. But when a change in the law is proposed, are we to set out with the assumption that a large number of these responsible men are going to use their powers erroneously and that therefore the law must be hedged in in various directions. (A Voice: "Take away all right of appeal.") If there is no right of appeal I think it would be a good thing.

There cannot be a right of appeal. The appellate Courts would not have the proper and fullest materials to judge. Therefore, I think, apart from sentiment, apart from the question of political rights, the rights of public meetings, apart from all these appeals to sentiment, I think this clause, if added to this section, is not going to do any good except probably create a certain amount of protracted litigation, probably the benefits of which will appeal to a certain class of people. Except that, there is absolutely no advantage. It is all very good to talk of the abuse of the section some time ago. Now, there is one effective check on the abuse of these executive powers, that is the check we have been forgetting, viz., the local Councils. If the sections have been misused by any province, the local Councils could have taken action. I ask which local Council has taken action? (Voices: "How?") It has various provisions. It has got more powers than probably you and I are now prepared to mention. No local Council has protested against what you call the abuse of these sections. In my province this section has been used very considerably. Has the local Council said a word about the abuse of this section? And is this Assembly to sit in judgment on the action of Magistrates in my province? What materials has this Assembly, constituted as it is, to judge the action of the Magistrates who have used this section in my province? Now, take any other province. Has any local Council passed a vote of censure against the local Council for the abuse of this section by its executive officers? That has not been done. That is the only constitutional check. Now, you will say that the local Council is so packed with men who do not allow the exercise of rights at public meetings. That is not a point which can be solved by amending this section. Therefore, I think, apart from sentiment, apart from all the patriotic feelings which my friend for the first time has aroused in this Assembly during the discussion of this Code, I think the amendment which my learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has put forward is unnecessary.

Mr. R. A. Spence: I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"In clause 26 after sub-clause (iii) insert the following sub-clause:

'(iv) after sub-section (6) as renumbered the following shall be inserted as sub-section (7), namely:

'(7) In all cases where action is taken under this section preventing a person or persons from holding or addressing meetings a report shall forthwith be made to the Sessions Judge who may call for and examine the record of any proceeding for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of the same, and pass such orders as he thinks fit'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. Venkatapatriaju: Sir, the next amendment, which stands in Mr. Agnihotri's name, runs as follows:

"(a) In clause 26 insert the following sub-clause (iv):

'(iv) in sub-section (4) of section 143 insert the word 'judge' between the words 'magistrate' and 'may'."

"(b) Add the following sub-clause (v): 'insert the following as sub-section (7), namely:

'(7) The words 'certain act' in this section does not include the making of political speeches or the doing of political propaganda work which would be otherwise lawful'."

[Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju.]

I do not move clause (a); I propose to move clause (b). Now, Sir, after full discussion on the previous amendment it is unnecessary on my part to dwell upon the object of this section, or the scope of this section and the way it is exercised. The Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has already pointed out how this section was abused and misused. Now Sir, whatever be the other causes for which it was intended, this section was never intended to shut the mouths of those who wish to speak on the constitutional changes in the Government. If this Bill were to be introduced with that object in view, to put an end to all constitutional agitation, I think it is high time for the Government to come and frankly say they do not want any political agitation in the country. If they do care for the progress of the country, it is absolutely necessary, that so long as there is a foreign Government, so long as there is discontent in the country, that there should be a proper opening for the people to express their views, and they can only express their views in such a way as may not gladden the hearts of the Magistrates, but to point out the defects in the administration, which annoys the Magistrate when stating the matter plainly, but all the same they are acting constitutionally. And when I say constitutionally, though I am aware that there are certain sections which may act unconstitutionally, and that is the reason why the last clause was added. When it is lawful, why should this section be utilised for the purpose of stifling constitutional agitation? I do not wish to take up much time at this hour, but I think it would be well that Magistrates should not use this section for this purpose. Do you know, Sir, that all meetings, even the reception of Members, are prevented by the Magistrates? A Magistrate has been known to issue an order that men should not go to a particular meeting, and that they should not wear Gandhi caps, and that a meeting should not be held in a particular town. Is that at all necessary and is it advisable for the good administration of the country? Is it at all likely to bring contentment to the people? If the Government wish to secure the contentment of the people, I think it is high time that the Magistrates should be deprived of these weapons where they want to exercise against constitutional political agitation, and unless this is safeguarded, I think you may pass any law now and there will be a time when everything will be changed.

Mr. Deputy President: The amendment moved is :

"Add the following sub-clause (r): 'insert the following as sub-section (7), namely :

'(7) The words 'certain act' in this section does not include the making of political speeches or the doing of political propaganda work which would be otherwise lawful'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that clause 26 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Friday, the 26th January, 1923.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

RETENTION OF MINISTERIAL OFFICERS AFTER 55.

262. Dr. Nand Lal: (a) Is it a fact that the rule regarding the retention of ministerial officers in service after the age of 55 years has been liberalised since 1918, and that such officers should now ordinarily be retained in service so long as they remain efficient until they attain the age of 60 years, and even after that age in very special circumstances?

(b) Is it a fact that the retention of ministerial officers in service after the age of 55 years is now the rule rather than an exception as it used to be formerly?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The reply to second part of the question is in affirmative.

RETIREMENT OF MINISTERIAL OFFICERS IN MILITARY ACCOUNTS DEPARTMENT.

263. Dr. Nand Lal: (a) Is it a fact that in accordance with the rule in Civil Service Regulations, as it stood prior to its revision in 1918, when the grant of extension to ministerial officers after the age of 55 years was treated as an exception, scores of officers of the Military Accounts Department were granted such retention, in some cases up to the age of 64 years?

(b) Is it not a fact that in 1921, certain officers in the Military Accounts Department were refused extension of service after the age of 55 years, although they were reported efficient and recommended for retention by the Heads of their offices, the reason for refusal being that "Government are averse to the retention of officers and men after they attain the age of superannuation as this retards the promotion of juniors"?

(c) If the reply to part (b) be in the affirmative, is it a fact that certain other officers at Simla in the same Department and similarly situated as those to whom extension was refused, were granted extension of service at about the same time?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) During the war all retirements, except on medical grounds or on grounds of inefficiency, were suspended in the Military Accounts Department and several officers had to be retained in the Department and granted extensions of service after they had attained the age of 55 years. These extensions were necessary in the exigencies of the public service.

(b) In 1921 certain subordinate officers in the Military Accounts Department were refused extension of service after they had attained the age of 55 years. Under the revised scheme of organisation, which was being gradually introduced in 1921 and which is now in force, officers holding the appointments of Deputy Assistant Controllers are not purely ministerial officers, as they are in independent charge of branches of the office and are also extensively employed on local audit. The reason for restricting extensions of service in the case of officers of this class was that under the re-organisation scheme the number of officers of the superior service in the Military Accounts Department was reduced in spite of a growth in the volume of work, and it was necessary therefore that subordinate officers should possess sufficient energy to discharge efficiently their new responsibilities.

(c) Extensions have been given to subordinate officers in the Military Accounts Department in cases where it was found absolutely necessary to retain their services in the interests of the State.

LOSSES INCURRED BY M. A. DEPARTMENT OFFICERS ON RETIREMENT.

264. Dr. Nand Lal: Is the Government of India aware that the Officers in the senior grade of the Subordinate Accounts Service of the Military Accounts Department who were working as temporary Deputy Examiners and who have been refused extension of service have suffered the following losses in consequence of the refusal of extension to them :

- (a) Immediate loss of between Rs. 450 and 500 per month or between Rs. 5,400 and 6,000 per annum in income, as also of future increments of pay.
- (b) Heavy loss of pay and pension due to loss of promotion to the grade of permanent Deputy Examiner (now Deputy Assistant Controller of Military Accounts)?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The refusal to grant an extension of service to an officer involves his being placed on the retired list and his income is necessarily reduced as compared to what he would have continued to draw had he remained on the effective list; but the reduction of his income is no reason for his retention in the service when such a course is opposed to the interests of the State.

DIFFERENTIAL TREATMENT ACCORDED TO RETIRING OFFICERS.

265. Dr. Nand Lal: (a) Is the Government of India aware that the temporary Deputy Examiners in the Military Accounts Department who have been refused extension of service have received pension amounting to about Rs. 240 per mensem, but a large number of Accountants whose pensions, with reference to their permanent pay on 1st April, 1920, would have come to between Rs. 60 and 100 per mensem and who were far junior to the former and have been promoted to Rs. 500 per mensem with effect from that date will be entitled to a pension of Rs. 250 per mensem on completion of 3 years service on this pay?

(b) Is it a fact that some of the temporary Deputy Examiners of the Military Accounts Department, who on account of their superannuation were granted leave preparatory to retirement, were subsequently allowed to resume duty, granted extension of service and made permanent Deputy Examiners, thus allowing them the benefit of higher pay and pension and the advantage of full average salary, whereas representations, even to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India, of other officers, similarly situated, for extension of service, were rejected?

(c) If the reply to question (b) be in the affirmative, will the Government of India be pleased to state the cause of differential treatment accorded to quite similarly situated officers of one and the same Department?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) In the few special cases officers have been retained in service after they had attained the age of 55 years in the interests of the public service.

PENSIONS CALCULATED ON INCREASE DUE TO DEARNESS OF LIVING.

266. Dr. Nand Lal: (a) Is it a fact that increase of pay of clerical and Subordinate Accounts Service of the Military Accounts Department, sanctioned with effect from 1st April, 1920, was on account of dearness of food-stuffs and other necessities of life and is it also a fact that this increase equally occasioned proportional increase in their pensions?

(b) If the reply to question (a) be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state whether any increase was sanctioned for the holders of the appointment of permanent Superintendents who were equally affected as others in regard to pay and pension? If not, was there any special reason for this, beyond the abolition of the appointment, and was it taken into consideration that they would be worse off as regards pension, as compared with their juniors?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The reply is in the affirmative.

(b) It was not considered necessary to raise the maximum pay of accountants in which category Superintendents in the Military Accounts Department were included.

PAY AND PENSION OF RETIRED OFFICERS IN M. A. DEPARTMENT.

267. Dr. Nand Lal: Will the Government of India be pleased to place on the table a statement showing the following particulars in regard to the establishment of permanent accountants and Deputy Examiners (now Deputy Assistant Controller, Military Accounts) in all India, including those who have been made to retire from service since 1921:

(a) Their names.

(b) Rates of permanent pay they were in receipt of immediately prior to commencement of War in 1914.

(c) Rates of permanent pay, their promotion, if any, between August, 1914, and 1st April, 1920.

(d) Rates of their permanent pay fixed on 1st April, 1920, owing to revision of pay.

(e) Approximate rates of pension they would have been entitled to if they had retired on 31st March, 1920.

(f) Approximate rates of pension they would draw if they retire on 1st April, 1923?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The statement required by the Honourable Member will necessitate special compilation involving labour which would not be justified in the public interest.

EXPENDITURE ON WAZIRISTAN OPERATIONS.

268. Mr. P. L. Misra: Will Government be pleased to lay on the table the following information:

- (a) Expenditure incurred during the last three years (year by year) on the Waziristan operations;
- (b) Loss of life as regards—
 - (1) British officers and soldiers,
 - (2) Indian officers and soldiers?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) Prior to the year 1920-21, expenditure on the Military occupation of Waziristan was not distinguished in the accounts from expenditure on North-West Frontier operations generally. In 1920-21, the expenditure on Waziristan, including the Wana Column, amounted to approximately Rs. 14,40,00,000 and in 1921-22 to approximately Rs. 6,98,00,000.

(b) The information desired by the Honourable Member is being compiled and when it is ready I will communicate it to the Honourable Member.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): May I ask a Supplementary Question, Sir? Is it not a fact that His Excellency the Viceroy, Sir William Vincent and Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi went to the North-West Frontier Province after we had dispersed when the September Session was over in Simla to review the situation?

Mr. E. Burdon (Army Secretary): The answer is in the negative.

OFFICE ORDER BY MR. DEWAR, A. G., PUNJAB, re ABSENCES FROM OFFICE.

269. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Is it a fact that Mr. D. Dewar, Accountant General, Punjab, has signed an office order in which it is stated that he is “Tired of having his hands forced by men who have sick wives and who cannot work just when they are wanted.”

“In future when employing new men we will take only those who sign a declaration requiring that in the event of their wives being ill it will not be an absolute necessity for them to absent themselves as they are able to make satisfactory arrangements for their being looked after while they are at office.”

“No one who is unconfirmed is to be confirmed unless he signs this declaration.”

(b) Will Government be pleased to state if such order is warranted by any sanctioned authority?

(c) If not, do Government propose to have this order rescinded?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I understand that the facts are as stated in the first part of the question. Accountants General are entitled to use their discretion in the matter of the recruitment of their offices, but there are objections to laying down hard and fast rules of the kind in question and the Auditor General is communicating with the Accountant General, Punjab, with a view to the reconsideration of the terms of the order.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: A supplementary question, Sir. Did Government enquire from this officer whether he himself will sign the declaration which he wants the other people to sign?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I trust the officer will do his duty in all circumstances.

Mr. S. O. Shahani: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? Will Government be pleased to state if there are any European or Eurasian employes in the office of the Accountant General, Punjab?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I did not catch that question.

Mr. S. O. Shahani: Will Government be pleased to say if there are any European or Eurasian employes in the office of the Accountant General, Punjab?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: That does not arise out of this question and obviously I shall require notice.

ABOLITION OF DIVISIONAL COMMISSIONERSHIPS.

270. Mr. P. L. Misra: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if they have received any opinions from Local Governments on my resolution moved at the Delhi Session last year regarding the abolition of Divisional Commissionerships?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to lay the same on the table?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Opinions from all local Governments have not yet been received.

(b) Government do not propose at present to lay the correspondence on the table.

Mr. K. Ahmed: One supplementary question, Sir. Are the Government aware that the Retrenchment Committee in Bengal have abolished these appointments?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member has guessed right.

Mr. R. A. Spence: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? Can Government give any information as to the loss of money caused by the waste of time of this House by the supplementary questions asked by my Honourable friend.

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order.

PERIOD FOR DISCUSSION OF BUDGET.

271. Mr. P. L. Misra: Do the Government propose to allot full 15 days this year for the discussion of the budget in view of the fact that:

(a) The time allotted hitherto was inadequate to discuss the demands; and

(b) The shortness of the time also caused undue strain and inconvenience to the Members?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I may point out to the Honourable Member that it is the Governor General and not the Government who in the exercise of the powers conferred by rule 47 of the Indian Legislative Rules allots days for the discussion of demands for grants. The Government is not in a position to make any statement on the matter at present.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask a supplementary question, Sir? Will Government be pleased to approach the Governor General and inform him on behalf of this Assembly that the Members want more days for the discussion of the Budget?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The matter will be duly considered at the right time.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Has the Governor General determined the interval that should elapse between the presentation of the Financial Statement by the Honourable the Finance Member and the time to begin the discussion on the Budget?

Mr. Deputy President: Order, order. May I ask the Honourable Member to address the Chair?

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: I apologise, Sir.

May I ask a supplementary question? Is Government prepared to state what interval will be allowed by the Governor General in Council, under the rules between the presentation of the Financial Statement and the discussion on it by the Assembly?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I understand the actual dates have not yet been considered.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: May I ask another question as to when those dates will be considered and information conveyed to the Assembly?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: At the earliest convenient opportunity.

RENTS IN RAISINA.

272. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Are there any rules for fixing rents on houses in Raisina? If not, what are the determining factors for fixing such rents?

(b) Is the value of land on which such houses stand and the compounds thereof taken into account?

(c) Is the total cost of the buildings, the fittings and the furniture taken into account in fixing such rents?

(d) What percentage is charged as interest upon total investment?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) There are no rules special to Raisina. Rents are assessed in accordance with the principles enunciated in the Fundamental Rules, which govern the assessment of rents throughout India.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes, but the hiring of furniture is optional and rent for it is quite separate from the rent of the building.

(d) The percentage charged on account of interest is $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the case of buildings occupied for the first time prior to 19th June 1922, and 6 per cent. in the case of buildings occupied after that date.

The pooled percentages are as follows:—

I. Officers' quarters.

$4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. (round) in the case of buildings and electric installation.

$4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. (round) in the case of special services. .

$3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the case of furniture.

II. Quarters for ministerial establishment.

$4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. (round) in the case of buildings.

4 per cent. (round) in the case of electric installation and special services.

$3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the case of furniture.

In this connection I would refer the Honourable Member to the reply given by me to a question by Munshi Iswar Saran, M.L.A., at a meeting of this Assembly on the 25th instant.

MUNICIPAL COMMITTEE IN RAISINA.

273. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is there any Municipal Committee in Raisina? If so, what are the sources of its revenue?

(b) What are its functions?

(c) How are its members chosen?

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: (a) Yes. Apart from a small income from miscellaneous fees and fines, the revenues of the Imperial Delhi Municipal Committee are chiefly derived from grants-in-aid made by the Chief Commissioner.

(b) The Committee performs the usual functions assigned to Municipalities by the Punjab Municipal Act. Owing to the paucity of its resources these are at present confined to education, sanitation, vaccination and the maintenance of cattle-pounds.

(c) The four members of the Committee are officials nominated by the Chief Commissioner.

ROADS, LIGHTING, ETC., IN RAISINA.

274. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) What is the total annual cost of (i) Estate office, (ii) maintenance of roads, lighting and drainage and other services in Raisina?

(b) Do tenants contribute towards the upkeep of the same?

Colonel Sir Sydney Brookshank: (a) The information is being collected and will be furnished as soon as possible.

(b) No, except through general taxation.

RENT OF HOSTELS IN RAISINA.

275. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Have the rents of the rooms in the two Hostels for Members and the quarters at Windsor Place been recently enhanced? If so, what were the reasons or circumstances justifying the enhancement?

(b) Have the rents of other houses been similarly revised? If not, why not?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) A readjustment of the rents of the quarters for Members of the Indian Legislature was originally undertaken in compliance with the recommendations of an informal meeting of the House Committee, held on the 19th March, 1922, as a result of a few individual complaints which had been received by Government in the matter. In this connection the Honourable Member is referred to the reply given by me to a question by Mr. Beohar Raghurib Sinha, M.L.A., at a meeting of this Assembly on the 13th February, 1922. These rents had not been assessed in accordance with the principles enunciated in the Fundamental Rules, and a further revision was undertaken in common with a revision of the rents of all other accommodation in Raisina and Old Delhi. As a result there has been a general enhancement of rents.

(b) Yes, the rents of all other houses and quarters have been revised in accordance with the principles for assessment of rents laid down in the Fundamental Rules.

ALLOTMENT OF QUARTERS TO MEMBERS OF LEGISLATURE.

276. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that allotment of rooms and quarters to Members of the Assembly for the current session, were made by ballot?

(b) Is it a fact that no such ballot was held for Members of the Council of State, but that they were given a preference? If so, for what reasons?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the second paragraph of Legislative Department Circular No. LXXXIV, dated the 18th December, 1922, issued to all Members from which it will be seen that the quarters at Windsor Place only were allotted to Members of the Legislative Assembly for the current session by ballot, the reason being that the number of applicants for these quarters far exceeded the number of quarters available.

(b) The Honourable Member will also see from the Circular referred to that Members of the Council of State were not allotted quarters by ballot but that those Members of the Council of State who had applied for quarters at Windsor Place and who could not be accommodated at Metcalfe House were allotted quarters there. The reason for this was that, whereas there was, after allowance had been made for those Members who as a matter of practice make their own arrangements, ample accommodation for Members of the Legislative Assembly, the accommodation in Metcalfe House for Members of the Council of State is inadequate.

OCCUPATION OF ROOMS IN HOSTELS.

277. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that rooms in the two hostels are not much in demand by Members either of the Council of State or the Assembly?

(b) How many rooms are there in each of the two hostels; and how many in each have been occupied by Members for the current session?

(c) How many allotments have had to be cancelled in consequence of the Members declining the offer?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) It is a fact that some of the quarters in the two hostels are vacant each Session.

(b) There are 55 quarters in the Western Hostel and 44 quarters in the Eastern Hostel. So far 18 quarters in the Western Hostel and 25 quarters in the Eastern Hostel have been allotted to Members but as Members are still arriving in Delhi it is not possible to say how many quarters will eventually be occupied.

(c) Ten allotments of quarters made for the present Session have been cancelled, but in only three cases was the allotment cancelled because the Member concerned stated that the accommodation offered was not suitable for his requirements.

TREATMENT BY CANTONMENT MAGISTRATE, AMBALA, OF A PLEADER.

278. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to an article in the Cantonment Advocate detailing the circumstances under which the Cantonment Magistrate at Ambala drove away a pleader from his Court? Are the facts given in that periodical correctly stated? If not, what are the correct facts?

(b) Is it a fact that the pleader in question has applied to the Punjab Government for sanction to take legal proceedings?

(c) Do the Government propose to take any action in the matter?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) to (c) The Government of India have seen the article in question but have made no inquiry whether the facts have been correctly stated. The matter would be one which concerns primarily the Punjab Government to whom, as it appears from the Honourable Member's question, the complainant has already made application.

ALLEGATIONS OF CORRUPTION AGAINST CANTONMENT SUBORDINATES, AMBALA.

279. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that the Government appointed only one Military officer to conduct the enquiry into allegations of corruption against some Cantonment subordinates at Ambala in the first instance; and subsequently on the representation of the Cantonment Association, Government agreed to appoint a second member if the Cantonment Committee agreed to pay his expenses?

(b) If so, is it a fact that the said Committee declined to bear the charge? If they did decline, for what reasons?

(c) Did the Association offer to bear the expenses? If so, did the Government accept the offer? If not, will Government be pleased to state its reasons?

(d) Is it a fact that in the event no second member was appointed?

(e) Is it a fact that the Association applied to the Punjab Government to grant a general pardon to all witnesses who appeared before the Committee of inquiry and gave evidence against the alleged delinquents?

(f) Is it a fact that the Punjab Government declined the prayer?

(g) Is it a fact that the proposed enquiry proved abortive in consequence?

(h) Do Government propose now to hold a departmental enquiry into the matter? If not, what do they propose to do?

Mr. E. Burdon: The facts are as follows :

(a) The Government of India appointed a senior officer of the Cantonment Magistrates' Department to inquire into the allegations in question. The local military authorities later suggested the appointment of a lawyer to assist the investigating officer in his enquiry.

(b) The Cantonment Committee declined to bear the expenses connected with the appointment of this lawyer. They considered that the expenses of the proposed enquiry should not be paid from the Cantonment Fund.

(c) So far as the Government of India are aware, the All-India Cantonments Association did not offer to bear the expenses in question. The Government of India themselves were prepared to accept the liability but in the end the investigating officer found that he did not require a special legal adviser.

(d) Yes.

(e) On the representation of the Association, such an application was made to the Punjab Government.

(f) The Punjab Government declined to grant immunity from prosecution except to witnesses in regard to whom there was good reason for believing that the bribes said to have been given by them, if given, were extorted by pressure.

(g) The enquiry failed to produce any immediate result as no one was prepared to give evidence in support of the charges of corruption.

(h) The matter is at present under consideration.

AUDIT OFFICERS IN RAILWAY SECRETARIAT.

280. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it a fact that there are at present no less than three officers of the Indian Audit Department on deputation in the Railway Secretariat and that one of them has been on deputation for over 18 years; if so, (a) what is the period of deputation fixed for each, (b) for what specific work has each been so deputed and (c) what deputation or other allowances each is paid in addition to his pay?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The facts are as stated by the Honourable Member. There is no fixed period for these deputations. The three officers in question are employed as Secretary, Joint Secretary and Assistant Secretary in the Railway Board's Office and receive, in the case of the first two, the pay sanctioned for the posts and, in the case of the latter, the usual duty allowance of Rs. 250 per mensem given to all Assistant Secretaries drawing departmental rates of pay.

CATERING ARRANGEMENTS OF WESTERN HOSTEL, RAISINA.

281. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state the terms on which the catering arrangements for the Western Hostel, Raisina, were made with the caterers for the years 1921 and 1922?

(b) Were they paid any compensation or contribution by Government to meet alleged losses in those years?

(c) Who were the caterers in those years and which department of Government made arrangements with them?

(d) What are the terms agreed upon for the current year and which Department of Government has made the arrangements?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) Copies of the agreements entered into with the caterers in 1921 and 1922 are placed on the table.

(b) In 1921 the caterers were paid a sum of Rs. 5,000 in full settlement of their claim for compensation for loss in catering for Members. No compensation was paid by Government to the caterers in 1922.

(c) Messrs. Bestoso and Alasia, Kashmir Gate, Delhi, were the caterers in 1921. Arrangements were made with them by the local Public Works Department. Messrs. Hoosain Buksh and Co., of the Elysium Hotel, Delhi, were the caterers in 1922. Arrangements were made with them by the Legislative Department of the Government of India after consulting the House Committee.

(d) A copy of the agreement entered into with the caterer by the Legislative Department of the Government of India for the current year is placed on the table.

AGREEMENT made the 6th day of January 1921 BETWEEN THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL (hereinafter called the Government) of the one part and Mr. NICOLA AZZOLLINI, Manager of Bestoso and Alasia, Kashmere Gate, Delhi (hereinafter called the caterers) of the other part.

Government is however under no obligation to provide furniture should there be none to spare.

(8) (b) The caterers will be responsible for the Government furniture in the Dining rooms and service rooms and for keeping these rooms clean and orderly.

(10) That should caterers commit breach of any of the above conditions, the Government will be at liberty to cancel this contract forthwith without payment of any compensation whatsoever. UNSTARRED QUESTION AND ANSWER.

MESTON COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

111. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the Meston Committee's report dated 2nd December 1908 and of the Government of India, Home Department Resolution No. 52-61 (Establishments), dated 21st January 1910?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Report and the Resolution are not published documents, but I will give the Honourable Member copies.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. Chairman: I have received notice of the following motion from the Honourable Munshi Iswar Saran:

"I beg to inform you that I desire to move the adjournment of the House, on Friday, the 26th of January next, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation created by the Despatch of the Secretary of State regarding the Resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly in September 1921 regarding the re-examination and revision of the constitution at an earlier date than 1929."

Under Standing Order No. 21 at page 14 the matter must be a definite matter of urgent public importance. Having regard to the nature of the subject and the procrastination which has taken place already, I decide it is not a matter of urgent public importance and therefore I cannot allow Munshi Iswar Saran to make that motion.

There are two other motions received—one from the Honourable Dr. Gour and the other from the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I wish to know from Dr. Gour whether he does not consider his motion covered by the Resolution of which I have given notice already.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I have adverted to the Resolution of which you gave notice and the ipsumque verba of which are now before me. The Resolution of which you gave notice, Sir, ran as follows:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to move the Secretary of State for India to suspend the proposed appointment of a Royal Commission on the conditions and alleged grievances of the All-India Services and that the Government of India be pleased to undertake such inquiry with a view to meet legitimate grievances and limit outside recruitment, and, pending such inquiry and report, recruitment outside India to those Services be limited to the bare minimum proportion of the annual requirements."

This Resolution was tabled by you, Sir, before the appointment of a Royal Commission and it is for that reason that the Resolution is worded to the effect that the Government of India should suspend the proposed appointment of a Royal Commission. The announcement made by the Honourable the Home Member yesterday has settled, so far as this Resolution is concerned, its fate. It is no longer a proposal to appoint a Commission for that is a fait accompli, and my motion yesterday to the Chair, followed by a written request addressed to the Chair and to the Secretary, is to protest against not a proposal to appoint a Royal Commission but against the appointment made of a Royal Commission. I therefore submit that there is no Resolution before this House which blocks my motion for leave to grant me an adjournment. I therefore submit, Sir, that my motion is in order.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): May I say, Sir, on behalf of Government that we regard this as a matter entirely for your discretion and on which we do not wish to argue.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): May I say a word, Sir. If for any reason, having regard to the language used by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, his motion is considered as contravening Order 11, Rule 4, I submit, Sir, that, so far as my motion is concerned, that difficulty will not arise. The language of my letter to the Secretary is this:

"I have been asked by the Democratic Party to move the adjournment of the Assembly to-morrow to discuss the announcement made by the Honourable the Home Member on the subject of the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the financial and other conditions of the higher services in India"

It is as regards the announcement made yesterday that I have given notice of this motion. The Resolution, Sir, to which you referred contemplated the possibility of the appointment of a Commission. Here, a Commission has apparently been resolved upon, and it is only the names that have to be filled in. It is that announcement that I want to discuss. Under these circumstances, my motion cannot be affected by the Resolution of which you as a Member of this House, had given notice previously.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I, Sir, just point out that my learned friend's motion protests against the announcement. My motion protests against the appointment, and I therefore submit that my motion is not only strictly in order but is in full conformity with constitutional practice, and there is absolutely nothing in the language of my notice which contravenes either the letter or the spirit of any rule published in this Manual.

Mr. Chairman: It is with some hesitation that I give my ruling on this matter. I consider Dr. Gour's motion somewhat offending against the rules as it is too general and makes no reference to the decision announced and I consider Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's motion in order as it relates to the decision recently announced about which no notice has been given. I therefore rule that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's motion is in order.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Then, Sir, I ask for leave of the House to allow me to move the adjournment of this House in order to consider the announcement made by the Honourable the Home Member yesterday.

Mr. Chairman: May I ask whether the Honourable Member has leave of the Assembly to move the adjournment? Unless any Member objects there is no need to stand. I will read out the motion to the House:

"For leave to make a motion for adjournment of the business of the Assembly for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the decision of His Majesty's Government to appoint a Royal Commission on the Services in India."

(No Member objecting) leave is granted and the motion will be taken up at 4 P.M. to-day or at an earlier hour with the consent of the Honourable Member in charge if our business terminates earlier. The House will now proceed to consider the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. B. N. Mishra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the amendment that I propose runs as follows:

"In clause 27 insert the following at the end of sub-clause (i):

'and in the first proviso for the words 'such order' the words 'such report or information' shall be substituted.'"

It is really very short but it relates to a very long section. I am afraid there will be some difficulty in drawing the Honourable Members' attention to my point and I think I shall have to trouble them with section 145. The section is a very long one and contains about seven clauses and two provisos, if the present amendment is allowed it will contain about nine clauses. Section 145 contemplates that whenever a District Magistrate, Sub-divisional Magistrate, or other Magistrate of the first class is satisfied, from a police report or other information, that there is a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace, he will issue certain proceedings, call upon the parties and declare possession of a party until any of the parties has obtained the decision of a proper civil Court. There you will find after clause (4) there are two provisos. The first proviso is:

"Provided that, if it appears to the Magistrate that any party has, within two months next before the date of such order, been forcibly and wrongfully dispossessed, he may treat the party so dispossessed as if he had been in possession at such date."

My amendment relates to this proviso. This proviso contemplates that if the Magistrate finds that a party had been dispossessed two months before the date of the order, which is called the preliminary orders served upon the parties, then the Magistrate will decide the actual possession to be with that party and declare possession to that party. Several cases have arisen where actually between the date the Magistrate issued the preliminary order and the actual dispossession took place, it was about more than two months, or three months or two months and fifteen days, or sometimes there was some difficulty to prove actual possession exactly just before two months. In these cases the Magistrates have always committed an error and have declared possession of the party whom they considered to be in possession at the date of the order and within two months. This has really placed rather a premium on high-handedness and taking forcible possession by some party. I shall illustrate this. Now, Honourable Members many of them have left their homes and have come here and I think will continue to be here from January till the end of March. As soon as I came away say, somebody, my neighbour, trespasses upon my land and perhaps my servant is not able to protest or to bring evidence enough to induce the police or the Magistrate to issue a preliminary order asking the parties to lay their claims about possession. After my return, say, after three months, I find that really my land has been trespassed on. Then I go on my land and the other party comes and a sort of a breach of the peace is apprehended. Then a report is made and the Magistrate issues an order. By that date, by the date the Magistrate issues the preliminary order, as I was absent, the possession had been taken by the other party before three months. The law lays down that the Magistrate will take evidence about the fact of actual possession and this proviso says:

"Provided that, if it appears to the Magistrate that any party has, within two months next before the date of such order"

[Mr. B. N. Misra.]

My point is this. He issues the preliminary order three months after and evidence is taken. He finds that the opposite party, my opponent, has been in possession for three months from the date of the order I am referring to, although some information was given by my servant or some report was made and the Magistrate did not make up his mind to issue the order earlier. It happens in many cases that whenever there is some trespass accompanied by any violence, cases are filed for trespass or for hurt and the Magistrates generally make it a point to await the result of such cases, then go through those records and issue a preliminary order. In such a case also, 3 or 4 months elapse before the actual dispossession and the Magistrate's preliminary order. Strictly speaking, it was practically a delay due to a certain procedure and not due to the party, who was dispossessed, putting forth his case after some delay. If this proviso is allowed to stand, it really does not give power to the Magistrate to go beyond the two months. Unfortunately the Magistrates regard this provision to be a two months' limitation. It is an advice given by the Legislature that they would not go beyond two months. If they find that a man was dispossessed beyond two months from the date of the preliminary order, then he must go to a Civil Court and the Magistrate actually puts in possession the party whom he finds in possession on the date of the order. Really it is doing harm to a man who has been dispossessed wrongfully and it is assisting the highhanded and the oppressive aggressor who had somehow or other taken possession and it may be even without the knowledge of the owner in some cases. There are several cases in the Allahabad Law Journal and in Indian Cases, specially in 19 Indian Cases. I would have read that last case but unfortunately I am told the Legislative Assembly Library has not got that book. It is still at Simla. Therefore I cannot procure the book. In that case it so happened that there were two zamindars. One party was practically absent and the other party tried to collect rent and there was a sort of disturbance and one Magistrate came and told the parties without issuing a formal order not to create a disturbance and so on. They kept quiet for some time and then the situation became rather serious and the parties began fighting. By that time actually four months had passed and then the Magistrate issued a preliminary order in writing. It was contended that as the opposite party was in possession for four months prior to the date of the order, the Magistrate had no power to put that party in possession because we find in the proviso that the Magistrate can put him in possession under section 145 if he finds that the man was dispossessed only within two months. Really this wording gives very often sanction to violence and aggression on one party and if somehow or other a party can manage to get the two months to pass away from the date of dispossession to the date of the preliminary order, the Magistrate finds that he is unable to put the party who was wrongfully dispossessed, in possession. Therefore I have brought in this amendment that instead of 'such order' the words "such report or information" shall be substituted. Take the case of a man who knows the law and he says 'If I somehow or other can manage to be in possession for two months, the Magistrate cannot dispossess me and the other party will be driven to a civil suit' and we know the difficulties of going to a civil court and the expense to be incurred and the long delay to be incurred. Suppose a man wants to buy a piece of land from a man who has encroached on it and the man has somehow or other kept his possession concealed and the other party does not know it. He comes to know after some time and then both parties fight and there is a dispute. In such a case the report is made but so far as actual possession is concerned, the wrong doer has been already in possession for four months and this entitles the Magistrate to declare actual possession under 145. My submission therefore is that we should give speedy remedy and if the Magistrate finds that if really a man has been wrongfully dispossessed, then he should put that party in possession. The two months criterion should not come in here and the two months should count only from the date on which the information was given or the report was sent. Sometimes mischief is made in the Magistrate's office. Sometimes a man knows that such a report has been made by the police. Somehow or other the record is kept concealed from the Magistrate and the two months pass away. Then the Magistrate sees the record and he issues a preliminary order as is contemplated and then practically the Magistrate has no power under this proviso to put that party in possession. Under these circumstances the two months criterion works as a hardship and causes failure of justice and the object of the section fails. So the words "such report or information" should be substituted for the words "such order." I therefore move:

"That in clause 27, at the end of sub-clause (i) and in the first proviso for the words 'such order' the words 'such report or information' shall be substituted'."

Sir Henry Moncreiff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): I think this House will be prepared to admit that it is the duty of the House as a whole to examine with great care every amendment that is proposed to be made in the law and particularly is that obligation laid on a Member for the examination of an individual amendment for which he is responsible. When I received notice of this amendment I doubted whether Mr. Misra had considered the effect of his proposal on the law as it stands. After listening to his remarks in support of his motion, I am certain that he has not considered it. I shall now try to explain to the House what the effect will be. The case Mr. Misra contemplates is a case where the Magistrate has been satisfied that a dispute regarding land exists, which is likely to cause a breach of the peace. He has called on the parties to put in their claims regarding possession of the property. Then, when they appear, without reference to claims as to title, he examines their claims as to actual possession on the date of the order. I want the House to bear that carefully in mind. He has to ascertain which party was in possession on the date of his order. That is the law as we have now got it. These three sub-sections (1), (2) and (3) are already on the Statute Book and Mr. Misra does not propose to amend the first part of (4). Therefore the Magistrate is setting out to find out who is actually in possession on the date of his order. Now Mr. Misra comes in and proposes an amendment in the proviso to the effect that if the Magistrate finds that there has been wrongful and forcible dispossession within two months before the date of the information, then he may presume that the party wrongfully dispossessed was in possession on the date of the information. Now, is that going to help the issue at all? What the law lays down is that the Magistrate has to find out the fact of actual possession on the date of his order and any presumption as to possession on the date on which he received information will not enable him to decide the case or issue any order whatever. I suggest a case to the Honourable Member. Suppose that there has not been any forcible dispossession before the date of the information, but after the Magistrate gets information, and before he issues an order one party goes on the land and forcibly dispossesses the other. There will be no presumption in that case at all. The dispossession was not previous to the date of the information and though it was previous to the date of the order the Magistrate has to find that the party who had forcibly occupied the land had actual possession on the date of the order and has to confirm him in his possession until the Civil Court ousts him. I think if Mr. Misra had considered the effect of his amendment, he would have saved the time of this House by not moving it.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I do not think Mr. Misra's amendment is so very unreasonable as Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith's remarks would lead one to believe. I think it is really a good amendment, and I beg to support it. This section relates to disputes about immoveable property in regard to which there is an apprehension that there would be an immediate breach of the peace unless the Magistrate intervenes. Now all that the Magistrate has to find out in this case is, who was in peaceful possession of the property in dispute at a particular time, and he has to keep him in possession of that property until he is evicted by an order of a competent Civil Court. Proviso 1 says that if there is evidence to show that one of the parties who claims possession of the property had been forcibly dispossessed of it within two months immediately preceding the date of the preliminary order the Magistrate may treat the party so dispossessed as if he had been in possession at such date for the purpose of this section. What Mr. Misra proposes is that if the party who had been forcibly dispossessed of the property within two months immediately preceding, not the preliminary order issued by the Magistrate but immediately preceding the complaint made by the party dispossessed the Court should find that he was in peaceful possession either to the police or to the Magistrate. I will quote a probable case. Suppose there is a dispute about a piece of immoveable property between two parties. Suppose that one of the parties which had been in peaceful possession of the property has been wrongfully dispossessed of it. Suppose that that party complains to the Magistrate, and suppose the Magistrate does not feel justified in issuing a preliminary order simply on the strength of that complaint, but sends the complaint to the police for investigation and report. I quote this as a hypothetical case but it is the sort of case which very commonly happens. Suppose the complaint is sent to the police for report. The police take their own time over the matter and then send up the report. Suppose thereupon the Magistrate makes up his mind and issues a preliminary order; and by the time the Magistrate issues the preliminary order, it happens that the dispossession becomes more than two months old. Therefore, the Magistrate cannot give possession to the man that was dispossessed. But the delay in the issue of the preliminary order was not due to the party which had been dispossessed but to the Magistrate or, it may be, due to the police. Why should the party which has been forcibly dispossessed be prejudiced by the delay on the part of the police or on the part of the Magistrate in issuing the preliminary order? What is there sacred about the date of the preliminary order? The law says, if a man has been dispossessed within two months immediately preceding the issue of the preliminary order, he shall be considered to have been in peaceful possession of the property. But why should he not if he comes to the Court within two months after being dispossessed, be considered to be in time? If there is no default on his part, if there is no delay on his part, if he comes and complains before the Court in time, and the Court takes long in arriving at a decision, it is not the fault of the party. Therefore I think it is quite just that dispossessions made within two months immediately preceding the complaint by the party should be treated as wrongful, and the man who has been forcibly dispossessed should be put in possession of the property. Therefore, I support the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I do not know if Mr. Pantulu has realized that the whole object of this Chapter is, to allow the Magistrate to decide the facts of actual possession of the subject in dispute. I quote the exact words of 145 (4):

"Whether any and which of the parties was, at the date of the order before mentioned, in such possession of the said subject."

That still stands; nobody proposes to amend that; and therefore the object of the Magistrate is to decide simply one point: who was to be considered in possession at the actual date of the order? There is an obvious reason: that the future conduct of parties has to be regulated on that order of the Magistrate. It is of no value to the parties or to anybody else if the Magistrate decides that some three months before—it may be four according to Mr. Pantulu—such and such a person was in possession. That helps no one. What you want for the purposes of this section is that you may get an order which will regulate the position of the parties in regard to the fact of possession as from the date of the Magistrate's order.

Mr. Chairman: The motion before the House is:

"To insert the following at the end of sub-clause (i) in clause 27 'and in the first proviso for the words 'such order' the words 'such report or information' shall be substituted.'"

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatnam; Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, on behalf of Mr. Rangachariar I beg to move the following amendment:

"To clause 27, sub-clause (i), add the following:

'and at the end of sub-section 6 insert the following Explanation:

'Explanation: A person shall be deemed to be in actual possession where he is in possession of the disputed property through an agent, manager or servant or such other person.'"

Sir, the object of section 145 is to prevent a breach of the peace in order to preserve the actual possession of the party. The question now is, who is in actual possession?—naturally, the person who was in actual possession or any other person on whose behalf the person was in possession, as he was in possession on behalf of the rightful owner; and even in cases where the complaints were obliged to be brought up before higher tribunals on account of a misunderstanding or misapprehension of the rule by the lower Court or Magistrate,—I will quote an authority, not one but a number of authorities wherein it was stated that naturally possession includes the possession of a servant on behalf of his master or of an immediate tenant on behalf of his landlord and of the usufructuary on behalf of the mortgagor. It is not a question whether we have to consider about the rights or wrongs of the parties or the lawful or unlawful possession but in order to make the legislation clear that this was suggested; so that Magistrates may not think that there is an absolute necessity that the person who complains or puts in a petition should be in actual possession while his servant is in possession on his behalf. The complainant should be permitted to state that he was in possession through his servant, and therefore, Sir, in order to make the point clear which has all along been accepted by the highest tribunals. I move this Explanation which would serve the purpose of elucidating the point more clearly.

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member has not moved the amendment.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: I move the amendment, Sir:

"That in clause 27. (ii), add the following:

"and at the end of sub-section (6): insert the following Explanation:

"Explanation: A person shall be deemed to be in actual possession where he is in possession of the disputed property through an agent, manager or servant or such other person."

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, out of compliment to yourself, I should have been very glad if I 12 Noon, could have been able to accept this amendment, but I am afraid that I am not able to do this. I think of the position of the poor Magistrate who has to decide what was the object of the Indian Legislature in inserting this explanation in this section. He will think, that it can scarcely mean merely that the Indian Legislature wished again to affirm the ruling reported in 9 Bengal Law Reporter at page 229, which has already been read by the Honourable Mover of this amendment. In that ruling it was stated that by "actual possession" is meant possession of a master by his servant, the possession of the landlord by his immediate tenant, the person who pays rent to him, the possession of the person who has the property on the land by the usufructuary. Now the Magistrate will say, "this cannot have been the intention. We all know that. We have been brought up on it. There must have been some other reason." He will refer to sub-section (1) and will see that that is the sub-section in which the words "actual possession" are used. He will see that the words have to be applied in determining the parties concerned and he will turn, say, to the Full Bench ruling in 31 Calcutta, page 48, Dhondhai Singh versus Follet. That was a dispute relating to an indigo factory. Mr. Follet was the Manager of the factory and Dhondhai Singh was the other party. The case came before a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court. It was held that there was jurisdiction in the Courts under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code to make an order in favour of persons who claimed to be in possession of the disputed land as Agent or Manager for the proprietor when the actual proprietors are not resident within the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court. He will begin to think, "does the word "deem" in this explanation mean that it must be the proprietor who has to be made a party? Is it impossible for the Manager to be made a party? Did the Indian Legislature intend to overrule that Full Bench decision?" Or perhaps, Sir, he will think of the case reported in 32 Calcutta, page 287, Bhola Nath Singh versus Wood. Mr. Wood was the Manager for the Nawab of Murshidabad. One point taken in the High Court was that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to make the Manager a party instead of his employer, the zemindar. As regards this point it was held that the course adopted by the Magistrate was a mere irregularity or at most an error of law which does not affect his jurisdiction. Perhaps, Sir, he will think that the intention of the Indian Legislature was to prevent a tenant being made a party. Then he would think, perhaps, of the case of Beni Prasad Koeri versus Shahzada Ojha, reported in 32 Calcutta at page 856. There the Magistrate had taken possession under section 146 in a dispute between two sets of rival tenants. It was held that it was quite within the law for him to apply section 145 in such a case, and it was held that the Magistrate's attachment under section 146 was an attachment on behalf of those tenants who might subsequently be found to be entitled to the possession. Perhaps, Sir, he would take the other side and think that the intention is that the zemindar, the proprietor, shall never be a party; that we must have the man who is in immediate possession. It is perhaps unnecessary to refer to rulings on the point, but in 25 Calcutta at page 423, it was held that a person who was in possession of land merely as the Manager for the actual proprietor could not be made a party to the proceedings under section 145 when the circumstances are such that the proprietor himself can readily be made a party. Of course, Sir, these proceedings are usually proceedings preliminary to a civil suit, and it is clearly advisable as a general rule that the proprietor himself should be the party, because it is no use, or very little use perhaps, to say that the Manager is the party in possession when in the subsequent civil suit it must be the proprietor who moves. Perhaps, Sir, the Magistrate will have a brain wave and think that the word "Manager" refers to the Manager of a Hindu joint family. He will have heard perhaps that the amendment was made at the instance of an eminent Hindu lawyer and will think he possibly was thinking of such Manager. Well, Sir, I do not think it is necessary to proceed further. I think that if we add this amendment we shall not make the position of the Magistrate any better. He knows quite well the old ruling in Bengal Law Reporter which has been recited to us, and if once he begins to think of what was the intention of the Legislature in putting in the explanation, his last stage will be worse than the first.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, with the gracious permission of the Chair I rise to oppose this amendment. It seems to me that the introduction of this clause, if it was made law, would not merely place Magistrates in great difficulty, but it would be in the direction of carrying the provisions of this section beyond the scope of the Chapter to which it appertains. What is the primary object of this magisterial interference in disputes over immoveable property? This country has a long record of broken heads and bones and lost lives in disputes over immoveable property? The sole and primary object of this section is to prevent breaches of the peace. It does not exist merely for the settlement of disputes, even as to lawful possession. A Magistrate can only interfere when he finds that the dispute is of such a kind as requires immediate settlement to prevent a breach of the peace. Now, the first part of the section requires the Magistrate to inquire into the fact of actual possession. There is nothing particularly technical about that word "actual". A good deal of forensic argument and judicial learning no doubt have been expended on the word. But here it means, in my humble opinion, what one would understand it to mean in the ordinary affairs of life. If I go to the club in the evening leaving my house in charge of my servants, my actual possession is not interfered with or disturbed. If I go to Mussoorie for the season and sublet my house to a tenant my actual possession so far as this section is concerned, with all respect for the contrary opinion whether expressed in rulings or elsewhere, is certainly suspended. All that remains is what lawyers call constructive possession. I am one of those who think that the clause which allows a Magistrate to interfere with a trespass one month and twenty-nine days old is a clause foreign to the purpose of this section, because, suppose even during my short absence at the club, my servant's possession is interfered with by a trespasser, a Magistrate can restore the servant's possession just as well as my own. I need not go and claim; it is quite enough to put up my servant and the Magistrate will restore actual possession and thereby restore my constructive possession. With regard to my friend's illustration in his earlier speech that when a Legislative Member comes to Delhi leaving his land in the possession of his servant or agents and someone dispossesses him, it would involve a hardship not to treat his possession as actual possession for the purposes of this section, I submit that it is quite unnecessary to do so. It does not follow that the apprehended breach of the peace should be with a person dispossessed. The danger of a breach of peace may be with anybody. It may be when a servant is dispossessed that the danger arises when the master wants to get his property back; that will be danger of a breach of peace between trespasser and owner; but the Magistrate will inquire into the actual possession of the servant. If he finds that it has been illegally disturbed, within his jurisdiction, he can restore it. Where a constructive possession is interfered with and a Magistrate is not inclined to use this Chapter, the argument that the owner is left only with the delayed procedure of a regular civil suit entirely overlooks section 9 of Act I of 1877, a suit for summary possession. There need be no delay. But if we introduce here this particular clause, we shall then be giving a particular definition, as it were, to the word "actual" which in practice—especially in magisterial practice—will create tremendous difficulties; and for that reason in support of the principle that these preventive sections should be kept as simple and as straightforward as possible, I would oppose this amendment.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): There is some little difficulty, Sir, in understanding the position of the Government. An earlier decision was referred to by Mr. Tonkinson in which it was pointed out that the possession of the tenant is the possession of the owner, and the possession of the agent is the possession of the owner. Later on there have been some doubts, in Calcutta itself. They have held that the object of the section is not to deal with constructive possession. Unless the section is made clear, it is likely to lead to further difficulties. If the possession is with the tenant and the dispute is between the tenant and the principal, it is doubtful whether this section should be applied. There are authorities which hold that this section should not be resorted to where the dispute is between the principal on the one hand and the tenant on the other. But where the possession is by the tenant on behalf of the landlord and a third party encroaches upon it, then the possession of the tenant will be regarded as the possession of the landlord and the matter should be inquired into. There would therefore be difficulties if we leave the section as it is, and it is, I take it, for the purpose of making it clear that this amendment has been put forward, namely, that where the dispute is between a person who is in possession of the property through one of these subordinate agents of his, e.g., the tenant, and if that possession is sought to be disturbed by a third party, the matter should be inquired into. That would bring the law into conformity with what has been decided in the earlier cases, and it would to a certain extent, weaken the force of the later decisions which point out that constructive possession is not what was intended. I believe, Sir, it is desirable when we are revising the Code to make this position clear. There are two points which ought to be made clear, one is that where there is possession in the tenant and that possession is disputed by the landlord the section has no application; the other is where there is possession in the tenant and that possession is on behalf of the landlord and a third party disputes it, then this section can be resorted to. That must be made clear. I do not see, with all deference to the draftsman of this amendment, that that position is made clear by him. But it is desirable to clear it up. If that is done, I think, it would avoid much trouble that is likely to arise in the construction of this section.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"To clause 27 (ii) add the following:

'and at the end of sub-section (6) insert the following Explanation:

'Explanation: A person shall be deemed to be in actual possession where he is in possession of the disputed property through an agent, manager or servant or such other person.'

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, I beg to move the amendment which stands in my name, viz.

"Omit the whole of sub-clause (ii) of clause 27."

Sub-clause (7) of the same section 145 runs thus:

"When any party to any such proceeding dies, the Magistrate may cause the legal representative of the deceased party to be made a party to the proceeding, and shall thereupon continue the inquiry, and if any question arises as to who the legal representative of a deceased party for the purpose of such proceeding, is, all persons claiming to be representatives of the deceased party shall be made parties thereto; and

My friend is asking me to withdraw the motion. I am sorry my conscience does not allow me to withdraw it without placing it before this Honourable House. The object of this section is to prevent a breach of the peace. Whenever breach of the peace is likely to be caused, section 145 is resorted to. If a man is dead, where is the cause? If a man dies, has the widow to come to fight or has she to mourn the loss of her husband? I am putting it to you. A man has got little children, two or three babies, two or three daughters and sons aged 3, 5 or 10 years, will they not be mourning the loss of their father? Are they going to fight? Will they be able to fight? Why are you dragging these innocent representatives, legal representatives, to be brought on record? The Criminal Procedure Code has never contemplated the civil rights of parties to be decided by Magistrates. If you say in a case like this that the legal representatives must be brought on record, what will be the effect? There are three children; they cannot come. In law, they are minors. They cannot represent themselves. You must appoint a guardian. Then, Sir, the Magistrate will see who will be their guardian. Ten persons might claim to be guardians of a particular minor. The brother will claim to be the guardian; the father's brother will claim to be the guardian; the mother's brother will claim to be the guardian, and so many others will also come claiming to be the guardians. Is the Magistrate to decide that? And without deciding that guardianship, can you bring a minor on record? The greatest legal difficulty will arise to bring a minor on record. Of course you bring in the criminal court such minors as are capable of committing some offence or crime, but in a case like this how can you bring the minor into the record of this case unless you appoint a guardian of that minor? Supposing there is a family of four or five brothers. One brother is dead, you need not bring the children of the deceased, or his widows because there are the other brothers. Supposing there are five brothers and one of them is a quarrelsome fellow who likes to create a quarrel and the others do not like to quarrel, why should you drag the others in who do not wish to quarrel simply because they happen to be the brothers of the man who is dead? I consider, it is very unjust to drag in such legal representatives who have no reason at all to be represented, because with the death of the man the likelihood of committing a breach of the peace has ceased. Suppose a man is dead who has left some property and there are two or three daughters, what happens ordinarily? One says, the deceased had adopted him and he must be made a legal representative? Is the Magistrate going to decide the question of adoption? If the representatives come to fight there will be a report and this section aims about the likelihood of the breach of peace at bringing such persons on record and nothing but that. You say "and shall thereupon continue the inquiry." If the party who was fighting is dead why should you continue the inquiry? You stop there, unless and until you get others coming forward to fight. Of course the object of the Criminal Procedure Code is never to allow any claims of right to be decided by a Magistrate. Clause (4) of section 145 says:

"The Magistrate shall then, without reference to the merits of the claims of any such parties to a right to possess the subject of dispute, peruse the statements so put in, etc."

In clause (4) you say he will not go into the merits of the claims; now you are going to consider the claims. The one is contradicted by the other. The magistrate is concerned only with actual possession and the likelihood of there being a breach of the peace. I submit if we allow power to the magistrate to consider claims as regards the legal representative, of an adopted son, or illegitimate son, or any relation, or all these conflicting claims, this will be giving a really dangerous civil power into the hands of the magistrates. In these circumstances I move my amendment,* that this clause should be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the speech made just now is one against my amendment†, not against the section as drafted by the Government. The Government do not want that there should be any decision by the magistrate, on the other hand they in the draft want everybody to be brought in and want the proceedings to go on. It is I, Sir, who want the magistrate to decide summarily as to who is the legal representative, so that there may be a speedy termination of the proceedings. The reason of my amendment is this. If one of the parties to the dispute takes it into his head to prolong the decision, he can easily set up a third party, and as this section is worded by the Government every objector should be made a party.

* "Omit the whole of sub-clause (iii) of clause 27."

† "In clause 27 (iii) in the proposed sub-section (7) omit all words after the words 'and shall thereupon continue the inquiry' and substitute therefor the following:

'and if more than one person claims to represent the deceased, the Magistrate shall forthwith decide who shall be the representative for the purpose of the proceeding before him; and it shall be open to the Magistrate to remove, add or substitute representative or representatives in the course of the same proceeding'."

Sub-section (7) proposed in clause 27, sub-clause (iii), says:

"When any party to any such proceeding dies, the Magistrate may cause the legal representative of the deceased party to be made a party to the proceeding, and shall thereupon continue the inquiry and if any question arises as to who the legal representative of a deceased party for the purpose of such proceeding is, all persons claiming to be representatives of the deceased party shall be made parties thereto."

Therefore once you say the proceedings shall continue, it will be open to one of the parties to the dispute to set up a person who claims to be a legal representative, and thereby prolong the inquiry. The object of this chapter is that there shall be a speedy determination of the dispute between the parties. It is on that ground that I have given notice of this amendment, that where there is a dispute among the legal representatives, powers should be vested in the magistrate to decide summarily as to who is the true legal representative, and to put that representative on the record to continue the proceedings. I provide that if it is thought by the Magistrate that the legal representative brought in is not the proper one, nothing should prevent him from removing such legal representative and substituting another in his place. I want to bring the rule into conformity with the civil practice in regard to this matter. The old Civil Procedure Code, section 367, says:

"If any dispute arise as to who is the legal representative of a deceased plaintiff, the Court may either stay the suit until the fact has been determined in another suit, or decide at or before the hearing of the suit who shall be admitted to be such legal representative for the purpose of prosecuting the suit."

It has been made simpler in the new Code, and it has been held that where once a party has been put on the record, the proceedings shall be continued in his presence and the decision shall even act as res judicata against the true representative. For that purpose, there must be a summary decision. And having regard to the fact that a proceeding of this nature is not final, and the rights of the parties in the Civil courts are not affected, I think it would conduce to the administration of justice better if we give power to the Magistrate to arrive at a summary decision. My object is as far as possible, to expedite matters, and as the object of Chapter XIII is to give a summary remedy, and as the section, as now worded, will put into the hands of a person who is disposed to prolong the inquiry, the power of bringing in a person who may have a very shadowy right to come in, I have drafted my amendment. It is in these terms:

"In clause 27 (iii) in the proposed sub-section (7), omit all words after the words 'and shall thereupon continue the inquiry' and substitute therefor the following: 'and if more than one person claims to represent the deceased, the Magistrate shall forthwith decide who shall be the representative for the purpose of the proceeding before him; and it shall be open to the Magistrate to remove, add or substitute representative or representatives in the course of the same proceeding.'"

As I said before it is only, Sir, for the purpose of carrying out the object which the Chapter has in view that I have brought forward this amendment. I know at the same time that the Government think that they alone can draft a section rightly and that no one else is competent to do it. There is that difficulty in my way.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the Honourable Member proposes to substitute another sub-section for the proposed sub-section 7 of section 145. He suggests, that Government consider that they are the only people who can draft these provisions properly and that he therefore understands that they object to this provision. I would submit, that this provision was not drafted by Government; it was drafted by Sir George Lowndes' Committee

[Mr. H. Tonkinson.]

(Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: "It was a Government Committee.") Not a Government Committee at all, Sir. Sub-section (7) of the present section 145 provides that "proceedings under this section shall not abate by reason only of the death of any of the parties thereto." Sir George Lowndes' Committee noted:

"We have expanded this sub-section, which deals with the death of a party while the proceedings are pending, in accordance with sub-clause (iii) of the Bill."

That is to say they thought their amendment was an obvious one, and I suggest that that is strictly the case. The Bill says:

"All persons claiming to be representatives of the deceased party shall be made parties thereto."

I suggest, Sir, that that is entirely in conformity with the spirit of the whole section. If we look at sub-section (1) it will be seen that the Magistrate requires all the parties concerned, all the persons claiming, to put in written statements of their claims. For example, take a recorded case, two parties had been summoned and appeared in Court. A tenant happened to be present; he claimed to be put in as a party and he was allowed to be put in as a party. All persons who have a claim are allowed in these proceedings to put in their respective claims. Further, if we adopt the suggestion of my Honourable friend, we will only be prolonging the proceedings. I remember, Sir, the papers about the amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure, which was passed in 1920, relating to the steps taken to do away with the delays in appeals to the Privy Council. One of the main reasons for delay that was referred to in those papers was the delay in putting in legal representatives. I have here, Sir, the letter received from the Madras High Court on the subject. They say: "Much of the delay is incurred in bringing on the record the legal representatives of deceased parties."

Sir, we have a summary proceeding provided for in this section and we do not want to lengthen those proceedings by adding to the labour of the Magistrate the question of deciding who is the legal representative of the deceased party.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I also oppose this amendment. In addition to the reason given by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, I would point out to the House that, if the amendment is permitted, it would in some cases tend to destroy the effect of the order passed under section 145. Suppose A and B both claim to be legal representatives and the Magistrate in a summary inquiry holds that A is the legal representative and passes an order against him. B institutes a civil suit and says that he is the legal representative, being, let us assume for the sake of argument, the adopted son of the deceased. Will this order bind B who is excluded under the inquiry made under section 145? (A Voice: "Not at all.") Not at all. Very well. The order therefore would be rendered nugatory if all the persons who claim to be legal representatives are not brought on the record. That is my additional objection to the amendment.

Lastly, I ask what is a legal representative? The present Civil Procedure Code defines a legal representative in very wide language. Any person who is in possession, even in wrongful possession, of the property of the deceased is a legal representative, and, if my friend's amendment prevails, there would have to be a definition of a legal representative and then an inquiry as to who is a legal representative. If the definition is enlarged to the extent it has been by the Code of Civil Procedure, it will let in all comers, real and pretended claimants to the property, and the inquiry, however small, is bound to be a protracted one.

I therefore submit, Sir, that this amendment should be negatived.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, the question raised by this amendment is by no means free from difficulty, and the amendment is not one to be lightly brushed aside by this Honourable House. As section 145 stands at present, we have these words only as sub-section (7):

"Proceedings under this section shall not abate by reason only of the death of any of the parties thereto."

These words do not bind the Magistrate in any way. A Magistrate has reached a point in his proceedings where he finds in a dispute between A and B that A was in actual possession of the property on the date of the order. B's death would not prevent the Magistrate, without taking any steps to bring any representative of B on the record from passing the order maintaining A's possession. Now, the framers of the Bill propose to amplify this clause so as to make it necessary in every case, where one of the parties dies, to bring his representative or all persons who claim to be his representatives, jointly or in rivalry, upon the record. A tenant is in possession of a plot of land which his landlord claims to have been obtained by trespass. Within two months of the date on which, at the landlord's instance, the Magistrate made an order under section 145, that tenant dies. From the four points of the compass come four claimants to represent him, each perhaps armed with the usual lathi, and each is thereupon brought on the record under this new clause by the Magistrate. What is the Magistrate going to do?

I think, Sir, that in a case like that he will have a case within a case. He will have, first of all, to settle the peace between these four threatening lathials before he goes on with the original case. Not only that, but it is a difficult thing at all events, it strains my imagination too much,—to understand how the heir of a deceased person, except in the limited cases where he was joint with that deceased person, was, on the date of the Magistrate's order, in actual possession of the property so as to be entitled to get an order in his favour. The whole of this arrangement of representation is out of place, whether (as put in the amendment) it be on the basis of a summary decision in favour of one person, or lets in, temporarily, everybody who claims to be a representative. I fail to understand how such procedure carries out the original purpose and object of the section. The man who was, or claimed to be, in actual possession on the date of the order is dead. If there is another person on the spot who claims to have been with him in joint possession or claims to have acquired possession at the moment of his death, one can understand the proceedings being continued, though even in the latter case you would be dealing with the actual possession of a new person and not the original possession upon which the matter came before the Magistrate. But why should they be continued for heirs or claimants not in actual possession. Therefore, without absolutely committing myself to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mover, I would strongly suggest to Government that this point of introducing representatives in a preventive case of this kind should be very carefully considered.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I would not have stood up unless I was of opinion that there are certain points in this very difficult matter which require to be cleared up. I should like to make my position clear by stating at the outset that I am rather inclined to support the amendment of my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and that I do so upon a balance of all the difficulties that seem to me to exist on one side or the other of the question. Now, Sir, my Honourable friend Sir Henry Stanyon has pointed out some of those difficulties. But it seems to me, that this section 145 Criminal Procedure Code, as it is, was enacted with a view to obviate some, at any rate, of the difficulties which crops up in connection with the proceedings under it, and which require speedy solution, in case of death of one of the parties to a proceeding during its pendency. Now, Sir, I will take up the question of actual possession, first. In this connection, the difficulty that was pointed out is a difficulty which has not been created by the proposed amendment itself, but it is a difficulty which already exists within the four corners of section 145 itself in enacting that the proceedings under this section shall not abate by reason only of the death of any of the parties thereto. The Legislature evidently contemplated that there should be some sort of decision as to representations after the death of one of the parties to the proceedings, and it evidently contemplated that the actual possession of the person in respect of whom proceedings were drawn up, and who was arrayed either on one side or the other, was the actual possession contemplated by the proceedings. The possession of his legal representative is practically a continuation of the possession of his predecessor in such cases. The next point for consideration is—who should carry on the proceedings, and adduce evidence in support of the case for the party who is dead? There must be some sort of adjudication on that point, and I suppose, the legal representatives of that party must be considered to be the persons who are likely to be interested in the matter and are calculated to adduce proper evidence in support of the possession of the person who is dead. Here again, Sir, I would point out to the House that if my Honourable friend Mr. Misra's amendment had been carried out, what would have been the effect? Supposing there is a powerful party who contests the possession of the opposite party and the latter dies during the pendency of the proceedings and after the death of the original party his successor in de facto possession, happens to be his widow, who may be in her bereavement, crying and shedding tears, and being busy with taking care of the fatherless children may feel helpless in asserting her possession. What would be the effect if the proceedings abated by reason of such death? The strong party, though wrongfully attempting to assert his possession, would at once take possession of that land in dispute. . . .

Mr. Chairman: Order, order. We have disposed of that amendment. The Honourable Member must speak to this amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I am coming to that, Sir. I submit the law as it stands contemplates that there should be some sort of adjudication as to representatives upon the death of a party pending the proceedings. Now, I will pass on to the point raised by Sir Henry Stanyon. He pointed out some of the difficulties. We have here according to him a case within a case under the circumstances because the Magistrate will be called upon to come to a decision as to representative of a deceased party. Suppose there are four persons who are trying to assert possession in respect of the land or immoveable property of a deceased party. Now questions which such contentions raise have to be decided, under the existing law, first of all, between the sets of contending persons amongst the four claimants to the property left by the deceased, the original party now dead, and the Court, in order to do justice, must decide that question, and it must be decided, not in the presence of fictitious claimants, but of persons who have a real interest in the matter. Therefore it will be necessary to find out who is the legal representative of a deceased party to a proceeding under this section 145. We cannot in the instance in point admit all the four contending claimants because thereby they would succeed in getting a footing as regards the property in question, by reason of the assertion of their false claims, which they would never be able to do, if left out of the proceedings. If all the four claimants were allowed to represent the deceased, they might all be declared to be in possession, in the event of the Magistrate deciding that possession was on the side of the party who is dead.

Dr. H. S. Gour: How?

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: The case as to possession has to be decided amongst two contending parties. On the one side is the original party who is not dead. On the other side is a party who is dead. Three false claimants have sprung into existence and the fourth happens to be the rightful claimants. Now what happens? By declaring possession, to be on the side of the deceased party, all the claimants get a footing as regards possession. That is a result which the amendment of my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar deprecates. That is to say, instead of giving indiscriminately all the false claimants a chance of asserting a false claim through magisterial declaration of possession, the proposed amendment suggests that a third party, however summarily it may decide the question, come to a decision as regards the legal representative of the person who is dead. Now, balancing all the inconveniences and difficulties, it seems to me, that although the determination of the question as to who the legal representative of a deceased party may be, may cost a little time and a little energy on the part of a Magistrate, it is better to have that done at that little cost, than to bring into existence a fresh dispute, among contending claimants to a deceased person's property and to give a footing to wrongful claimants, in that way. Therefore, Sir, I submit that if a third party,—a Court or a Magistrate,—be vested with powers to give some sort of decision as to who the legal representative of a party is, that, on the whole, will secure to the people better justice than in the case of all persons rightfully or wrongfully claiming as legal representatives, possession of the property which is the subject matter of the proceedings.

These are considerations which lead me to think that my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment solves the difficulty to a larger extent than in the case of the Government proposal.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I wish to refer very briefly to a portion of the speech of my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon. I understood him to deprecate any revision of the law at all for bringing the legal representative on the record. I think the House has expressed its opinion on that point by the very emphatic manner in which it threw out Mr. Misra's amendment,—the House decided that we should have some provision in this respect. Sir Henry Stanyon, if I understood him aright, suggested that there would be very great difficulty in the Magistrate's mind, after the heir of a deceased party had been brought on the record, in holding that the heir was in actual possession. Of course, Sir, the heir himself, unless he was a member of a joint family, could not have been in actual possession on the date the Magistrate passed the order; but the sole idea in providing for bringing the representative on the record is that the Magistrate shall not give an ex parte decision in the case. The House will remember that at an early stage of the proceeding the Magistrate has to serve a notice upon all persons that he knows to be interested and to have one copy posted in the locality where the property is situated. A person appears with a claim to have been in actual possession on the date of the order; that person dies; is it right that thereafter his interest should not be represented? If the Magistrate finds that the person who has died was in possession on the date of the order, he will put that person in possession through his legal representative who has taken the trouble to appear.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"That in clause 27 (iii) in the proposed sub-section (7) omit all words after the words 'and shall thereupon continue the inquiry' and substitute therefor the following:

'and if more than one person claims to represent the deceased, the Magistrate shall forthwith decide who shall be the representative for the purpose of the proceeding before him; and it shall be open to the Magistrate to remove, add or substitute representative or representatives in the course of the same proceeding'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, my amendment is that in clause 27, sub-clause (iv), omit the words 'and natural' and after the word 'decay' insert the words 'or cannot be conveniently kept in store pending final decision.' "

The clause in the Bill reads as follows:

"(8) If the Magistrate is of opinion that any crop or other produce of the property the subject of dispute in a proceeding under this section pending before him, is subject to speedy and natural decay, he may make an order for the proper custody or sale of such property, and upon the completion of the inquiry shall make such order for the disposal of such property, or the sale-proceeds thereof, as he thinks fit."

The words used are "speedy and natural decay." It seems to me that the word 'speedy' will meet all the cases. I do not really understand the necessity of introducing the word 'natural' there. If the property is subject to speedy decay that ought to enable the Magistrate to sell it; whether the decay is natural or unnatural is immaterial and I do not see that any purpose is served by the use of the word 'natural.' If the property is liable to decay and speedy decay the Magistrate will have power to sell it. That is the first part of my amendment. The second part of my amendment is to add the words 'or cannot be conveniently kept in store pending final decision' after the word 'decay.' Sometimes the produce may not actually decay but it might be extremely difficult and inconvenient to keep it; take a case—which is common in my part of the country—where the property in dispute is a cocoanut tope; suppose there are several thousands of cocoanuts that are plucked from the trees and they have to be taken care of. It would be extremely difficult to find a suitable place where to store all those cocoanuts so that they might not be spoilt. If they are not properly taken care of they will be subject to decay; therefore, you may say you can bring it under the head 'decay' but I think it will be more straightforward to say 'because they cannot be properly stored pending final disposal'; they may be sold. This is my reason for the amendment.

Mr. Chairman: I think it will be for the convenience of the House that we take the amendments separately. The question is:

"That in clause 27 sub-clause (iv) omit the words 'and natural'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"That in the same sub-clause after the word 'decay' insert the words 'or cannot be conveniently kept in store pending final decision.'"

The motion was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My amendment, Sir, is a very simple one; it simply corrects what I think is a clerical error and if the Government do not accept that improvement, I think the House should unanimously vote them as wholly incorrigible. I only want to restore the numerical sequence of these various clauses and object to the interposition of 8-A where 9 will serve an equally useful purpose, and convert 9 into 10. I do not think I need waste much time over my amendment and the least I can ask the Government is to thank me and accept it.

I therefore move:

"That in clause 27 (iv) renumber the proposed sub-section 8A and 9 as 9 and 10."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, we should be very reluctant to be condemned by the whole House as incorrigible; we have to admit that Dr. Gour's amendment is a most proper one. Dr. Gour's eagle eye has discovered what may be described as for the time being a blot on the Bill. I am surprised, however, that he has not discovered something like a hundred other similar blots throughout the Bill. The point is simply that we did not re-number the clauses, we did not re-number the sub-clauses and the sub-sections of the Code when the Bill was amended by the Joint Committee and when the Bill was passed by the Council of State, for this reason merely, that if this House had had before it another Bill with the clauses differently numbered from the Bill that was introduced and passed by the Council of State, the confusion would have been intolerable. This blot on the Bill which Dr. Gour's eagle eye has discovered we intend to remove by a general motion when the consideration of the Bill is finished, that all the necessary consequential re-numbering be made. I would, therefore, suggest that my Honourable friend withdraws his amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I withdraw it, Sir.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Clause 27 was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, the amendment standing in my name reads
I.F.M. thus:

"In clause 28, in the proposed proviso after the words 'District Magistrate' insert the words 'or the Magistrate who made an order under section 145.'"

The proposed clause reads as follows:

"Provided that the District Magistrate may withdraw the attachment at any time if he is satisfied that there is no longer any likelihood of a breach of the peace in regard to the subject of dispute."

I have simply added to this that not only the District Magistrate but the Magistrate who made the order under section 145 may also be given the power. I think the proper wordings should be "The District Magistrate or the Magistrate who has attached the subject of dispute", etc. It has been suggested to me that if I move my amendment in this fashion Government will accept it. So, I move, Sir:

"That in sub-clause after the words 'District Magistrate' the words 'or the Magistrate who has attached the subject of dispute' be inserted."

Mr. Chairman: The motion before the House is:

"That in clause 28 in the proposed proviso after the words 'District Magistrate' the words 'or the Magistrate who has attached the subject of dispute' be inserted."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We do not intend to use the bludgeon of our vast majority in this case, and we accept the amendment. The motion was adopted.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the amendment of which I have given notice is intended to enlarge the powers of the District Magistrate. New power is given to him by the proviso for cancelling an order passed by the Magistrate, on the ground that there is no longer any likelihood of a breach of the peace. Now that the matter will be before the District Magistrate, I want to give him powers to consider whether the original order was properly passed. If he comes to the conclusion that the original order was not properly passed or that there is no necessity for continuing the order, he would cancel it. I want to give him larger powers than are given by this section, because it is not desirable that his discretion should be fettered in the way the section proposes to restrict it. If the matter is once before him, he should be able to decide whether the order was properly passed or whether there is any necessity for continuing the order. For these reasons I move the amendment standing in my name, namely:

"In clause 28 (1) after the words 'satisfied that' in the proposed proviso, insert the following 'there was no reasonable ground for taking action in the matter or'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I was rather surprised to hear my Honourable friend saying that the intention of his amendment was to introduce a revision of the whole proceeding. If that was his intention, I should have expected him to move an amendment to section 145. He has in fact moved an amendment to section 146. This section merely says:

"If the Magistrate decides that none of the parties was then in such possession, or is unable to satisfy himself as to which of them was then in such possession of the subject of dispute he may attach it until a competent Court has determined the rights of the parties thereto, etc."

To that the Bill adds a proviso:

"Provided that the District Magistrate may withdraw the attachment at any time if he is satisfied that there is no longer any likelihood of a breach of the peace in regard to the subject of dispute."

Therefore, my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar merely proposes to enable the District Magistrate to revise the order of the Subordinate Magistrate who has attached the subject of dispute where he could not find that any party was in possession. Now, Sir, as far as that goes, I think that these words are unnecessary. What are the facts? The Magistrate has found for reasons he must have had before him that in regard to the subject matter of dispute there is likely to be a breach of the peace. He cannot discover himself which of the parties was actually in possession, but the fear of a breach still continues, and the Magistrate thereupon attaches the property until the parties go to the Civil Court. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar then comes in and says that if the District Magistrate finds there was no reasonable ground for taking action in the matter, he may withdraw the attachment. But surely that is inconsistent. The Magistrate's preliminary order stood. He was satisfied that a breach of the peace was likely to occur. He cannot find who is in possession. They are reasonable grounds which no court can upset. Therefore, I would suggest that this limited revision of the order of attachment in the special circumstances of section 146 is quite unnecessary and inadvisable.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, my next amendment seems to have found favour with the Government. I am thankful for small mercies. But they want as usual, their own language and not mine. I am willing to accept their language; and I do not insist upon my language. The object of my amendment, as the House will understand, is to enable the Magistrate to stay his hands when a Receiver has been appointed by the Civil Court. The proviso as drafted by the Government is in these terms:

"Provided that, in the event of a Receiver of the property, the subject-matter in dispute, being subsequently appointed by any Civil Court, possession shall be made over to him by the Receiver appointed by the Magistrate, who shall thereupon be discharged."

Now, Sir, I have had something to do with civil work: very often Receivers are appointed, but they do not take charge at once because there is the question of giving security and if in the meanwhile the Magistrate takes action by a subsequent order, it should not be binding on the parties. If there is a previous order appointing a Receiver, that ought to be enough, and the Magistrate should not interfere in matters of this nature, because a Civil Court receiver is likely to do his business much better than a Receiver appointed by the Magistrate.

Sir, the language used by the Government is this: and I move it in their words:

"That in sub-clause (2) of clause 28 for the words 'to sub-section (2) of the same section' the following be substituted, namely:

'In sub-section (2) of the same section after the words 'think fit' the words 'and if no Receiver of the property the subject matter in dispute has been appointed by any Civil Court' shall be inserted and to the same sub-section.'"

I move my amendment as Government wants it.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 28, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 29 in the proviso to sub-section (2) of proposed section 147, insert the words 'within three months as aforesaid or' between the word 'exercised' and the word 'during'."

The proviso would then run as follows:

"Provided that no such order shall be made where the right is exercisable at all times of the year unless such right has been exercised within three months next before the institution of the inquiry, or where the right is exercisable only at particular seasons or on particular occasions, unless the right has been exercised within three months as aforesaid or during the last of such seasons or on the last of such occasions before such institution."

Of course, Sir, this clause inserted by the Joint Committee is a very useful addition but as you find that they have already provided that in cases where the right can be exercised at all times of the year three months' grace is given to them in order to complain against the invasion of their rights, my amendment only goes to show that three months' grace should also be allowed where right is exercised on particular occasions or at particular seasons along with the other provisions already in the clause. I don't think, Sir, I need argue the point further because the point is very clear. I only ask you to admit to the seasonal exercise of rights the grace of three months also, so that my amendment will be in conformity with the object of the introduction of this clause. Therefore, I move this amendment, Sir.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In clause 29 in the proviso to sub-section (2) of proposed section 147, insert the words 'within three months as aforesaid or' between the word 'exercised' and the word 'during'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I want, in clause 29, in sub-section (4) of proposed section 147 to delete the words "in subsequent" and substitute the word "the." The clause, as it is, reads as follows:

"An order under this section shall be subject to any subsequent decision of a Civil Court of competent jurisdiction."

Supposing on the same day the order is passed, there is also a civil court decision which is not known to the Magistrate. Why should it be held that, unless there is a subsequent decision, the Magistrate's order should prevail? If there is a Civil Court's decision, it stands to reason that the Magistrate's order should give way. I think in those circumstances it is desirable to delete the words "in subsequent" and substitute the word "the" there. Suppose the decision which has been passed is taken in appeal or in revision. Then the appeal may be withdrawn. Under those circumstances, if you allow the word 'subsequent' to stand, it is likely to lead to difficulties. Therefore I move that the words "in subsequent" be deleted and the word "the" substituted therefor.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In clause 29 in sub-section (4) of proposed section 147 for the words 'in subsequent' substitute the word 'the'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I feel truly sorry that I am not in a position to accept the amendment of my Honourable friend. The point is quite a simple one. If the matter has been decided by the Civil Courts already, then the Magistrate should not act under section 147. It has been held by the Courts that if the question of title has already been decided, then there is no dispute between the parties as to the title. The question of title has been set at rest by a judicial decision and the Magistrate cannot conscientiously say that a dispute still exists. But, if, on the other hand, he still fears a breach of the peace, that the parties are not going to observe and follow the decision of the Civil Court, then the High Courts have said that, though he cannot take action under section 147, it is always open to him to take action under section 107. That is the simple reason why this clause does not provide that the decision of the Magistrate should be subject to a previous decision. In any case I much regret to point out that I do not find Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's drafting quite satisfactory. Surely it is not quite correct to say that the order which the Magistrate has made should be subject to a decision which has been previously passed. He could not make the order. As I have already pointed out, the Courts have laid down that when the Civil Courts have decided the question of title the Magistrate's jurisdiction under section 147 is ousted and he should not proceed at all under that section; if he does, his order would be set aside by a superior Court; he must take action under section 107.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 29 was added to the Bill.

Rai N. K. Sen Bahadur (Bhagalpur, Purnea and the Santhal Parganas: Non-Muhammadan): I move:

"In clause 30 before the words 'In sub-section' insert the following:

'In sub-section (2) of section 148 for the words 'read as evidence in the case' the words 'proved and used as evidence in the case' be substituted'."

In a proceeding under section 145 the Magistrate practically exercises a quasi-civil jurisdiction and the parties thereto are arrayed more or less as plaintiffs and defendants in civil suits. In clause (4) of that section you will find that the Magistrate has to take evidence, viz., such evidence as may be produced by the parties to the proceeding. I understand "such evidence" to mean such evidence as is adduced according to the procedure laid down in the Indian Evidence Act; that is to say, if the evidence is oral evidence, witnesses have to be examined, cross-examined, and re-examined, and if the evidence is of the nature of a document, it has to be proved in accordance with law. Now, in a proceeding under section 145, if a Magistrate considers that a local inquiry is necessary he may depute any subordinate Magistrate to make the inquiry and he may furnish him with such written instructions as may seem necessary for his guidance. What generally happens is this, that a Magistrate deputed by the trial Magistrate goes to the spot, gathers all sorts of information, measures the land and submits his report and that report generally consists of a measurement paper, a map and his opinion regarding the question of possession as he finds on the spot. This report as laid down in section 148 (2) is used as evidence without any legal proof against the party against whom the report stands. It has so happened that in certain cases the Magistrates have decided proceedings under section 145 merely on such reports, and I may cite a case in I. L. R. 31, Mad. page 82 where this was actually taken. This mischief is due to the provision in this section 148. I beg to submit to this Honourable House that I have not been able to find any justification as to why such a report should be only read as evidence when in the same proceeding a Magistrate is required to take the evidence of both the parties in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Evidence Act. There is a section in the Code of Criminal Procedure to which I would like to refer. That is section 288, where certain evidence is allowed to be taken in without proof in a Sessions court but there that evidence is taken in the presence of the parties and in the presence of the accused. He may or may not have cross-examined the witnesses, but still that evidence is recorded by the committing Magistrate in the presence of the accused. I find further in the new amendment of section 288 the following words added, "shall be treated as evidence in the case, for all purposes subject to the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act." This is the new amendment in section 288. I shall be very thankful if the Honourable Member in charge of this Bill will be pleased to explain to us the justification or the necessity of such a provision as this which has done more harm than good up to this time. If the only plea is that it has stood for a very long time, I may submit that it has not justified its long existence or long life. With these submissions, I propose to move the amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, it seems to me that the Honourable Mover of this amendment has got somewhat confused between a report and evidence. He has cited the case of section 288. That is a case, as he himself pointed out, of evidence taken in the presence of parties by a Magistrate. Now this section 148 (2) contains no idea whatever of enabling evidence taken by a Magistrate making the inquiry to be brought on the record as evidence. It is merely the report of the Magistrate which is going to be brought on the record. What Mr. Sen desires is, that the report should be proved and used as evidence. The present law says that it may be read as evidence. What will proving the report of the Magistrate consist of? The Magistrate at headquarters has thought a local inquiry necessary. He has sent directions to the Magistrate of the Tahsil or sub-division, perhaps 50 or 80 miles away, to make a local inquiry. The Magistrate inquires and sends his report to headquarters. Mr. Sen desires that that report should be proved. What will happen? The Magistrate will be asked to suspend work for two or three days and come up to headquarters and all he will say is "This is my report. I wrote it." You are not going to require the Magistrate to prove every fact in the report that he has had deposed before him. I would suggest to the House that the only effect of this amendment is to drag Magistrates to headquarters solely to make a statement that the report is his. Everybody knows that it is the Magistrate's report and to bring him to headquarters would be futile and a waste of time for all concerned. This is no new provision in the Code. I would invite the attention of the House to sections 509 and 510. Section 510 lays down that the report of a Chemical Examiner shall be taken as evidence in the case. It is not required to be proved. It is solely a report of the Chemical Examiner's opinion but it goes on the record as evidence and I see no reason why if a Chemical Examiner's report is allowed to be read as evidence, the report of a Magistrate should not also be allowed to be read.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): After hearing Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, I think this amendment is superfluous and not needed. From my experience as an Honorary Magistrate I say that ordinarily the report of a Magistrate is read; and if he lives at some distance, the procedure will be cumbrous if you ask him to come simply for the purpose of proving that. I therefore think that this amendment is altogether superfluous and uncalled for.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"In clause 30, before the words 'In sub-section' insert the following:

'In sub-section (2) of section 148 for the word 'read' the word 'proved' shall be substituted'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 30 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. Chairman (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar) was in the Chair.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, my amendment is a very simple one. It arises under section 157 as now amended. Now the clause in question relates to two cases. Under proviso A, section 157, sub-section (1) there are two cases,—one when the officer in charge of the police station does not consider the offence to be of a serious nature, and the other when he thinks there are not sufficient grounds for investigation. Now the amendment in the Bill proposed is that in the latter case when there are not sufficient grounds the informant should also be informed of the same. I do not see any reason why that should not apply to the first clause A also. My amendment is intended to supply that deficiency, that is, that in either case the fact should be notified to the informant where the offence is of a serious nature or where there are not sufficient grounds for investigation. My object is that the same reason which induces the amendment of the clause should also apply to the other case, the object being that whosoever has given information to the police officer should have an opportunity of knowing that his information has not been acted upon so that he can get an opportunity of taking further action. With these remarks, Sir, I move my amendment which runs thus :

" That in clause 31 (ii) delete the words ' in the case mentioned in clause (b) such officer '."

so that both the clauses will be treated in the same way.

Mr. Chairman: The amendment moved is :

" That in clause 31 (ii) delete the words ' in the case mentioned in clause (b) such officer '."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas will, I think, admit after he has heard our explanation that his amendment is moved under a misapprehension. Clause (a) (i) provides for two cases: in the first, if the offence is not of a serious nature, the officer in charge of the police station need not proceed on the spot or depute a subordinate officer to make an investigation on the spot, but, of course, he will make an investigation though not on the spot. Clause (b) provides that if there are no sufficient grounds for making an investigation, he will not make one at all. Now in our sub-clause (2) we provide that if he does not intend to make an investigation at all, he shall notify the informant, if any, of the fact. It is, I think, quite unnecessary that he should notify the informant of the fact that he proposes to make an investigation but not on the spot. The point is, I think, quite clear.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: After this explanation I ask for leave to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 31 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 32 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, my amendment is :

" In clause 33 for the words ' for any purpose ' substitute the words ' as evidence ' and omit the words from ' (save as hereinafter provided) ' to the words ' such statement was made '."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, may I suggest that the amendment be taken in two parts, and that we take as the first part :

" In clause 33 for the words ' for any purpose ' substitute the words ' as evidence '."

Mr. Chairman: I think it will be for the convenience of Members to take your amendment in two parts.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I think the two parts stand together, but I have no objection to moving them separately. I propose that :

" In clause 33 the words ' as evidence ' be substituted for the words ' for any purpose '."

This clause relates to section 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Sub-section (1) of that section as it stands runs thus:

"No statement made by any person to a police officer in the course of an investigation under this chapter shall, if taken down in writing, be signed by the person making it, nor shall such writing be used as evidence:"

For this the Bill substitutes the following:

"No statement made by any person to a police officer in the course of an investigation under this Chapter shall, if reduced into writing, be signed by the person making it; nor shall any such statement or any record thereof, whether in a police diary or otherwise, or any part of such statement or record, be used for any purpose (save as hereinafter provided) at any inquiry or trial in respect of any offence under investigation at the time when such statement was made:"

My arguments with regard to both parts of my amendment are indivisible. I, therefore, find it somewhat difficult to argue on the first part of my amendment only and I shall state the whole of my argument.

The principle underlying sub-section (1) of section 162 is that, although every witness who is examined by a police officer is bound to answer the questions put to him, he is not bound to speak the truth to him; so that a statement made by a witness to a police officer cannot be used as evidence of the truth of the statement itself. Therefore, the law as it stands takes care to lay down that the statement made by a witness to a police officer shall not be used as evidence in any case whatever. But the section as amended in the Bill says:

"It shall not be used for any purpose at any inquiry or trial in respect of any offence under investigation at the time when such statement was made."

That greatly qualifies the effect of the section as it stands, which states that such a statement shall not be used as evidence for any purpose whatever. The amended section limits the prohibition of the use of the statement only in connection with the inquiry or trial arising out of the investigation at the time. It is therefore greatly to the disadvantage of a man making such a statement; for there is a chance of his statement being used as evidence against himself in some other proceeding, or as evidence against other persons in some other proceeding. The principle being that nobody is obliged to speak the truth to a police officer, just as he is obliged to speak in a Court of law, a statement made to a police officer should not be taken to be such as can be used as evidence in any case except as already provided for in the proviso to the section. It can be used for the purpose of contradicting that witness in further proceedings. Therefore, I think, Sir, that the section as amended in the Bill will take away the safeguard which the existing section provides against statements made to the police being made use of to the annoyance or inconvenience of the public; not only of the person who makes the statement, but also of other people. I therefore think the amendment made in the Bill encroaches greatly upon the liberty of the people and is altogether unwarranted. I therefore propose, Sir, that the amendment which stands in my name. . . .

Mr. Chairman: On further consideration, I think the amendment, if it is limited to the first portion, will not be quite intelligible to the House. I think therefore that it is but right that the Honourable Member should move the whole amendment as it stands. If he desires to say anything more on that he may do so now.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: My objection to the section in the Bill as it stands is that it greatly restricts the effect of the existing law, which lays down that a statement made to the police is not to be used as evidence:

[Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu.]

it can only be used for the purpose of contradicting that man in the course of the same proceeding. And I submit that such a statement should not be capable of being used as evidence against the man making it or any other person in any proceeding whatever. I submit that the law must stand as it is and the proposed section is bad. Therefore I move the amendment which stands in my name.

Mr. Chairman: The motion before the House is :

"In clause 33 for the words 'for any purpose' substitute the words 'as evidence' and omit the words from '(save as hereinafter provided)' to the words 'such statement was made'."

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): Sir, the portions of this clause which my Honourable and learned friend's amendment seeks to delete may be divided for our purposes into three parts. The first portion seeks to substitute the words "as evidence" in place of "for any purpose" and the second portion seeks to delete the words within the brackets. Now, in regard to . . . (Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: "To the end of the paragraph.") No. I am dividing your proposal into three parts because our position in regard to the first two portions is different from our position in regard to the third portion. So far as the substitution of the words "as evidence" in the place of "for any purpose" and the deletion of the words within brackets is concerned, Government is prepared to accept these two modifications of the clause proposed by my Honourable friend. "As evidence" was no doubt the expression in the old Act. That was also, as far as I recollect, the phrase used in the Bill as originally drafted. The expression "for any purpose" was substituted by the Lowndes Committee, so that so far as the Government is concerned, the words "as evidence" having been the original expression proposed by them, they are willing to accept the amendment in so far as this substitution is concerned. We further agree that the retention of the words within the brackets, viz., "save as hereinafter provided" is unnecessary, for the proviso being a portion of the section itself, the repetition of these words in the first part of the sub-section is redundant.

But as regards the elimination of the concluding words of this clause, it seems to me that the position has not been well understood by my Honourable friend; otherwise, I fancy that he would not insist on the elimination of those words. It is quite true that if those words are eliminated from this clause, the result would be that neither the statements nor the record of statement referred to in this clause would be admissible as evidence in any case whatever; that is to say, neither in the trial of that case nor in the trial of any other case against that particular accused or against anyone else would those statements and the record of these statements be admissible. It is a well known rule of law that a special enactment providing for particular set of facts overrides the general provisions of a general enactment and in consequence if these words were to be left out, the clause would exclude the applicability of the Indian Evidence Act to these statements and to this record would make these entirely inadmissible in evidence. But is that conducive to the administration of justice? That is the question which the House has to bear in mind; I submit not. Now, let me give you but one or two instances, instances which I feel will appeal to those Honourable and learned gentlemen who are members of the profession to which I am proud to belong. Let us assume a case in which a Sub-Inspector of Police had concocted a false charge against a person residing within the jurisdiction of his police station who had given him some cause for offence. Or take another case. Suppose a rich and influential person residing within the area of a police station had induced the Sub-Inspector to concoct a false case against an enemy of his. Suppose yet another case; a rich and influential zemindar or other person brings about the murder of an enemy of his through one of his own dependents or through a hired villain and then greases the palm of the Sub-Inspector to let the real culprit off and substitute in his place some other person, possibly another enemy of this rich and influential zemindar. Imagine yet another case in which a murder has been committed and the real murderers have remained untraced. Honourable Members are aware that a serious offence of that kind if untraced is counted to the discredit of the Sub-Inspector in charge of a police station. It results in a blackmark against him. We have come across, those of us who have practised at the bar and have had to do with criminal cases, have occasionally come across cases in which in order to avoid the resulting censure or disgrace the Sub-Inspectors of Police run in innocent persons. Now, in all these cases where a Magistrate subsequently trying the case finds that the Sub-Inspector of Police has concocted a false case against the accused and the accused is able to establish his innocence at the trial, even though the Sub-Inspector of Police may have prepared false diaries, may have not recorded statements of witnesses produced by the accused before him or even the statement of witnesses who are subsequently produced in Court as witnesses for the prosecution correctly, yet if the law is to be amended, as my Honourable friend would have it amended, the result would be that in case the Court ordered the trial of the Sub-Inspector for having concocted a false case, for having prepared a false record, all these statements and the records of those statements in the handwriting of the Sub-Inspector of Police himself, and therefore constituting the most valuable evidence in the subsequent trial of the Sub-Inspector for having concocted a false case or prepared false documents, would be absolutely inadmissible if the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend were to be accepted. Surely that would not be conducive to the administration of justice. Indeed by the acceptance of this amendment you would be excluding from admissibility most valuable evidence which could be produced against dishonest police officers, and I submit that that is in the highest degree undesirable in the interests of justice. Other cases can also be conceived in which a sweeping provision like the one that my Honourable friend wants to retain in the Code by the elimination of the last words of the clause would be highly detrimental to the interests of justice. It should be remembered that the retention of these words which we have produced does not make these statements or records of these statements admissible in all other cases. It does not override the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act. All it says is that these statements shall not be admissible in this trial, in the trial of the case in connection with which the inquiry has been held. In order to make these statements or this record of evidence in a subsequent case, you would have to look at the provisions of the Evidence Act. Now, section 5 of the Evidence Act lays down in express terms:

"Evidence may be given, in any suit or proceeding, of the existence or non-existence of every fact in issue, and of such other facts as are hereinafter declared to be relevant, and of no others."

These words "and of no others" are very significant, so that the result of the provision embodied in section 5 of the Indian Evidence Act is this.

[Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi.]

The statements recorded under section 161 referred to in section 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would be evidence in a subsequent case only if they were either themselves facts in issue or facts relevant to the issue.

Now in a case such as I have already mentioned to the Assembly, that is to say, if a Sub-Inspector of Police were charged with having fabricated a false case or false documents the record of those statements and the statements would be facts in issue, and at any rate, these certainly would be relevant to the issue at that trial. But in another case it is obvious that they would not be admissible, they would not be admissible against a third party. And the reason is very simple. Unless those statements are dying declarations, they would not be admissible in any of those sections which relate to previous statements section 32 etc. It is obvious therefore that the circle of admissibility if I may use that expression of these statements and of this record in any subsequent case is very limited and limited only to such cases in which their admissibility is conclusive to the best interests of justice. In those circumstances I submit that the elimination of these concluding words of this clause would result not in the interests of justice, but would be highly detrimental to the administration of justice. The one case which I can think of in which these statements and this record would, without any doubt, be admissible is the case of the sub-inspector of police and in that very case the acceptance of this amendment would make these documents and these statements admissible in the subsequent case against the sub-inspector of police. I submit therefore there is not only no a priori reason justifying the elimination of these words, but on the contrary the elimination of these words would be in the highest degree detrimental to the administration of justice.

Mr. Chairman: I think before the discussion proceeds further in view of the remark which fell from the Honourable the Law Member I propose to put the first portion of the amendment namely

"In clause 33 for the words 'for any purpose' substitute the words 'as evidence' and omit the words 'as hereinafter provided'."

which are purely verbal changes. I put them to the House now, so that the discussion may proceed on the rest of the amendment that is "nor shall such statement be used as evidence."

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Division Non-Muhammadan) Sir, I wish to oppose the amendment and give some reasons for doing so.

Mr. Chairman: You want to oppose the verbal change?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Yes and show why the change is undesirable. I rise with some hesitation to oppose the amendment moved by Mr. Pantulu to substitute the words "as evidence" for the words "for any purpose." Sir, the word "evidence" is rather more restricted in its meaning than the phrase "for any purpose." This by itself is a sufficient reason for not substituting the words "as evidence," for "for any purpose." It is better to have under this section a word of a wider meaning than of a restricted one. If we look to the object of section 162 we find that this section was inserted in the Code to provide as a safeguard against an unscrupulous police officer. As Mr. Pantulu has pointed out, a witness is not bound to state the true facts to the police, he may come and state anything he likes to. It may be false or it may be true, or it may be only a please the police officer, or it may be with some ulterior motive to implicate some person. It was therefore thought necessary that such a provision should be included in the Code and that the evidence of such a person should not be an ipso facto evidence before the court, and the accused should not be convicted on such statements. It has also been pointed out by the Honourable the Law Member, that there may be certain unscrupulous police officers who may take advantage of the want of such a provision and may have such evidence brought on to the record in order to implicate certain persons. We therefore find that the insertion of section 162 in the Code of Criminal Procedure is an essential one to do away with the mischief of the police officers or of an untruthful witness. The words "for any purpose" as put into the Bill, seem to be very desirable and guard against all possible injury to accused. For instance, a man is summoned by a police officer to make a certain statement before him. He goes and makes a statement to please that police officer, and to avoid the trouble which may otherwise be the result if he refuses to state that which the police officer wants him to state. He states that such and such a man has committed this offence. Now if we do not admit this portion as evidence, that person against whom he has made a statement may not be liable to be convicted, and at least the truthfulness or the veracity of the witness could not be challenged and the witness could speak the truth before the Magistrate. Supposing I have made a statement before a police officer, and I am a witness for the defence. A police officer comes forward and says "this witness has made a different statement before me, and therefore the statement he has made in the court is contradictory and should not be believed." On that statement made by the police officer, or on that statement recorded in his diary, the judge will be perfectly justified in holding that I am not telling the truth, even though I have stated the truth on oath and I may have spoken a falsehood before the police officer to please him. So if we retain these words "for any purpose," in this section the prosecution can not produce such a statement and challenge my veracity on the ground that I had made a different statement before the police officer. Therefore the words "for any purpose" should be retained in this Bill, and should not be substituted by the words "as evidence," because in that case the police diary may be brought before the Magistrate to contradict the witness and show that he had stated something contradictory before the police officer. That would not be promoting justice and would be encouraging unscrupulous police officers and would fail in its very object. I therefore oppose the amendment.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: I also rise to oppose the amendment. It has been sufficiently demolished by the illuminating exposition of the clause in the appeal made by the Honourable the Law Member, and I rise only to draw attention to one point in connection with this clause.

The clause reads:

"Nor shall any such statement or any record thereof, whether in a police diary or otherwise, or any part of such statement or record, be used for any purpose (save as hereinafter provided)"

The only point I think which requires to be made clear, so that the House may vote correctly on this amendment, is whether these words "hereinafter provided" refer only to that proviso, because, if they do, then a most important use of these diary statements provided for by section 172, clause (2) is shut out. I see no amendment in this Bill to section 172, clause (2), which provides that for the purpose of aiding any inquiries in trials the Judge may use the police case diaries. The words "save as hereinafter provided" are ambiguous. "Herein" may refer to the Code or it may refer to the section. That is the only point I have to make.

Mr. Chairman: The question before the House is to substitute in clause 33 the words "as evidence" for the words "for any purpose (save as hereinafter provided.)"

Mr. Chairman: The rest of the clause is now under discussion. I must read it to the House so that Honourable Members may follow it. It runs:

"Nor shall any such statement or any record thereof, whether in a police diary or otherwise, or any part of such statement or record, be used for any purpose (save as hereinafter provided)."

We are carried so far.

The further words thereafter, viz.:

"at any inquiry or trial in respect of any offence under investigation at the time when such statement was made";

the proposal now is that all those words be omitted.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Sir, with your permission I should like to say a few words. My Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, and other Honourable gentlemen having agreed to the retention of the concluding words in this clause, we have, as must have become clear from the division which has just taken place, agreed to the retention of the words "for any purpose" instead of "as evidence"; and I understand the position now to be that Honourable Members are prepared to accept the clause as it originally stands in the Bill. But I must make it clear that this will not in any way affect the provision embodied in section 172.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Subject to any further amendments.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Yes, quite.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I have been placed in a somewhat false position. The leader of my party has accepted a certain compromise with the Government. I do not question that compromise, but at the same time I wish to put before the Members of this Honourable House my difficulties in the matter, and if on re-consideration the Honourable Members still agree to the compromise, then I shall be satisfied. My reasons for moving for the omission of those words are, Sir, that it may happen that an unscrupulous police officer may know that a statement made by a certain witness before him is not admissible for the offence under investigation at that time, but may be admissible in respect of some other offence that may be before him but may not be under investigation at that time,—and with this knowledge this unscrupulous police officer may record that evidence which, as the clause now stands, will make it admissible later on. This would be a very real danger if we allowed the clause to stand as it is. The Honourable the Home Member said if an unscrupulous police officer were to behave in this way he should be prosecuted. That certainly is a real difficulty, and if the Government were to make special provision to that effect, that in the case of a police officer making a false diary just as they have done in respect of section 32 of the Indian Evidence Act, such statements should not be admissible; if the Government were to make such a provision, it would I think satisfy the purpose and solve some of the difficulties. I have known a case under the Arms Act in which a man was prosecuted for not having intimated to the police about the transfer of certain arms. The police were investigating this offence—that is, his omission to report the matter to the police; but under this offence they also recorded evidence in the same diary about the arms having been exported by another man from a Native State into British territory, without a license with a view to compromise that man if the prosecution for omission to report failed. If this clause is allowed to stand, that evidence would be certainly admissible and will create additional hardships. Therefore it would be better if this clause were omitted and the Government might except the case of police officers in the second sub-clause of section 162. I therefore move the amendment that:

“In sub-section (1) omit the words ‘under investigation at the time when such statement was made.’”

Mr. Chairman: The question before the House is:

“That the words ‘at any inquiry or trial in respect of any offence under investigation at the time when such statement was made’ be omitted from sub-clause (1) of clause 33.”

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Chairman: Amendments Nos. 129 and 130 (a) fall through.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move that:

“In clause 33 in the proviso to sub-section (1) insert the words ‘allow inspection to the accused and’; after the word ‘shall’ omit the words ‘may then if the Court thinks it expedient in the interest of justice,’ and omit the words ‘if duly proved.’”

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Sir, the proviso as it stands in this Bill is to the effect that if the accused requests a Magistrate to go through the statements of certain witnesses before the police, the Magistrate shall go through the statements and if he finds that in the interests of justice a copy of such statements be provided to the accused for purposes of the defence, the copy of the statements will then be given. Sir, the statements that are taken by the police are generally made in the absence of the accused, and the accused cannot be in a position to know the statements that any particular witness may have made before the investigating officer. It therefore generally happens that though the accused knows nothing about the statements still he requests the Court to go through the statements and to find out if there was any contradictions and the Magistrate has thus to waste his time unnecessarily in going through those statements to find subsequently that the statements made by a particular witness before the police were exactly the same as he made before the Court. This procedure involves much waste of public time that could very well have been avoided had the statements of the witnesses appearing before the Court been supplied to the accused beforehand and the accused would then have found out for himself any statement contradictory to that made before the Court, and could then ask for permission from the Court to contradict that witness on that statement. I think the proposed amendment will be more wholesome and will save much of the public time than will otherwise be the case if the clause is allowed to remain as in the Bill. Secondly, Sir, there is a provision in the proviso—"and may then, if the Court thinks it expedient in the interests of justice, direct that the accused be furnished with a copy thereof." . . .

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member might perhaps put his amendment in three parts—first, allowing inspection to the accused—that will be better.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I therefore submit that the inspection of the statement ought to be allowed and with this view I beg to move that in the proviso to the same sub-section insert the words "allow inspection to the accused and."

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I strongly support this amendment. Honourable Members will observe that this clause has been the battle-ground for the last thirty years that I have been practising at the bar. In the old Code copies were furnished to the accused; later on in the consolidating Act this proviso was modified and found its place as it does in the current Code of Criminal Procedure. Ever since this proviso was inserted I have had numerous cases in which I have asked the Judge or the Magistrate as the case may be to refer to the statements of witnesses made before police; he has looked at it and he says to me "I have referred to it and thus complied with the provisions of this proviso." But I was none the wiser by the Judge's reference to the police diary, and the result was that I was not able to cross-examine witnesses with reference to their previous contradictory statements which in the appellate Court was a revelation to me, because when these very statements were read out I found in several cases that they were diametrically opposed to the statements made in the lower Court. I therefore submit that it is a perfectly innocuous provision which does nobody any good and is calculated to lead to a dereliction of judicial duty to say that the Judge or the Magistrate as the case may be shall refer to the statements made by a witness to the police, on a request being made to that effect to the Court. In the statement of objects and reasons which heralded this proviso it was stated that as the statements of witnesses to the police were very inaccurate and were not taken down by persons accustomed to the recording of evidence, therefore it was unsafe to treat them substantially and practically as pieces of evidence. On the other hand, it was pointed out that in a very large number of cases witnesses go back upon their own statements either because they are tutored to do so, or because they feel that by going back upon their statements they will improve the case of the side they represent, and if the counsel for the accused exercises his power and asks the Court to refer to the case diary, the Court does not look at the case diary from the same point of view as the accused and his counsel. He has got certain things in his mind, the Court has got quite a different thing in its mind, and the result therefore is that the object with which this latitude was allowed in the present Code has been practically neutralized by reason of the fact that the Court is not bound to give a copy or to allow the inspection of the statements of witnesses made to the police on a request being made to that effect to the Court concerned. I therefore submit, Sir, that the insertion of these words in this provision, namely, "to show the statements to the accused and to allow inspection to the accused," would be a salutary improvement and I hope the Honourable the Law Member and his colleagues on the Treasury Bench will see the strength of our arguments and accede to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mover.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, I also rise to support this amendment very strongly. Perhaps my experience of this proviso has not been as great as that of other Members of this Honourable House, but I have had a certain amount of experience in its working. The existing proviso has been absolutely useless. In many places it had been the habit for investigating police officers to write in one book their diaries interpolated by statements of witnesses examined by them during the investigation. The diary is a sealed book in such cases to the accused; yet under this proviso the accused is expected, by some process of divination which I cannot understand, to make a request to the Court to examine the statements of certain prosecution witnesses; and then discretion was left to the Court to give him a copy of those statements for the purpose of cross-examination. Now in actual practice a date is fixed for the Sessions Court to begin its labours. It starts to follow the procedure for trials laid down in this Code. I do not remember one single instance in 7 years' work as a Divisional Sessions Judge in which I was ever asked to delay the trial so that copies of these statements might be prepared and handed over to the accused. The thing was really unworkable. What I found it necessary to do and what I dare say a great many other Sessions Judges have found it necessary to do, was, where the witness's statement in Court differed widely from his statement made at the police investigation, to ask him questions on it myself. Well, that is not carrying out the section. The clause which is now proposed to be substituted is no better. Once again, it leaves the initiative in the matter to the accused person who knows nothing whatever about the contents of the statements recorded by the police. I have never been able to understand why these statements, which in a proper investigation should be recorded quite separately from the case diary but which are not so recorded in many cases, why the statements should be put any more behind the veil than that important document—the first information. They are merely statements made by witnesses in the course of an investigation—sometimes they are made publicly, sometimes they are made very privately. But they are there, whatever they are worth. Why not let the accused person see them and then, when he finds that certain of the prosecution witnesses have gone right away from what they said to the police, let him have copies and leave the cross-examination to him and relieve the Sessions Judge or the Inquiry Magistrate from the duty of cross-examining Counsel. Therefore, I urge that this amendment is entitled to the support of the House. It asks for nothing more than this that these statements which are recorded and should be recorded, apart from the diary, may be shown to the accused in order that he may be in a position. . . .

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Shall be shown, not may be shown.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: I still think that he ought to be allowed to inspect these statements because there is no question that they do influence decision. Section 172, clause 2 refers only to deposes; but Courts and Judges who look at these diaries under that clause, though they do not use them as formal evidence are still very much influenced in their judgments by what is written there in the form of statements of witnesses. Therefore, I think that this amendment ought to have the support of the House.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Sir, I venture to point out to the House that the position taken up by my friend, Dr. Gour, is materially different from the position of the Honourable the Mover of this amendment. Honourable Members will recollect that my Honourable and learned friend emphasized the fact that, when the Court had a discretion in the interests of justice to furnish the accused with a copy, there was no reason why similar discretion should not be given to the Court to allow inspection of these statements if the accused wants that inspection. There is something in that position taken up by my Honourable and learned friend. But what the Honourable Mover asks for is this that the House should introduce into this clause the words, "allow inspection to the accused" and, if you look at the proviso, the only place where those words do fit in at all is after the word "shall" "shall allow inspection" and so on. Now, if I may venture to say so, this is a case in which it would not be conducive to the interests of justice if it were to be made obligatory on the part of the Court to allow inspection in any and every case. As a matter of fact. . . .

Dr. H. S. Gour: That was in the Code of 1882.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: With all deference, I would remind my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, of what he said only a short while ago. It seems to me, Sir, that just on the very grounds on which the Code of 1898 and the present clause makes it discretionary for the Court to permit copies of these statements, on these very grounds it would be in the highest degree detrimental to the interests of justice if it were made obligatory on the part of the Court to allow inspection. In fact, the two portions of the clause would almost become contradictory of each other. To say that in one case the Court is bound to give inspection and in the very next breath to say that the Court shall have discretion to direct that a copy of that statement be given to the accused would become self-contradictory. Had the Honourable Mover chosen to move an amendment to the effect that just as the Court is given a discretion to allow copies of these statements being furnished to the accused, similarly it may be allowed discretion to allow inspection, that would have been quite a different matter,—a position with reference to which possibly the Government would have been prepared to meet him halfway. But as he makes it obligatory on the part of the Court to allow inspection, I regret that the Government cannot accept that proposition. It seems to me that in cases of this kind the Court ought to be allowed discretion, for these statements really are not part of the judicial record at the trial. Of course, if they were part of the judicial record at the trial, every accused person would be entitled as of right to demand inspection and to demand copies. But when these statements do not form part of the record at the trial but form part of an entirely different record, record prepared by the police during the police investigation, it is only where the Magistrate thinks that in the interests of justice the accused ought to be furnished with copies or ought to be allowed inspection that the Legislature ought to allow him that discretion; but to make it obligatory on the part of the Magistrate to allow inspection, I submit, would be going beyond what is required by justice as well as by the equities of the case.
